To my friend M^r. JOHN SPEED, being very sick.

Great loue, and little skill may cause me to missey.
But certainly this sickness cannot make thee die:
Though cruel symptoms, and these thirteene yeeres assay
For thy deare country, doth thy health & strength decay.
Yet stith thy toylsome labour, and thy industrie.
Is for thy Countries sake, her fame on hie to raise:
Shes shall thy temples crowne with euerlasting bayes,
And in despite of death, shall cause thy memorie
To liue in endles fame with all posteritie.

Now may thee see her beauty, and her riches store,
What erst she was in curie age, and change of state,
And present greatness such as meeter hereofore,
Since this great Monarch rul'd from North to southerne
And fith thy life is to thy country dedicate, (store,
I et none presume thy lawrell from thy head to reave
For this hir story, which thy skillfull hand did weave:
But live, & weary it [Speed] until the worlds great fate Shall bring all earthly things unto their utmost date.

ALEX. GILL.

In exactissimi huius operis Authorem, Eulogium Tho. Barkham.

Vincta diu, rumpat despecta, silentia lingua, Culmina ut immensis memor exsuperata laboris
Speide tibi: insueti iactor licet, (optime,) curâ, Quam tibi pro merito possim circumdare palmam
Qui cœcant populi, quæcunque sub orbe Britanno Digna referis, non despectu, scriptoque, loquere, Sanguineas signas, atque armorum bella, palestras;

*Nobilitantque apud patriam compagine rerum,
Ad nostra exactum deducis tempora filum.
Ergo erit hac magni merces non parva laboru,
Egredium pariunt hac quod monumenta decorem
Ipsa sibi, ventura quod hac mirabitur aetas, Totaq. perpetuas debes Respublica grates.*

To the right well deserving Mr. JOHN SPEED the Author of this worke.

IN this Booke, (Bibliothec, or Booke of Bookes; TIMES Library, PLACES Geographic)
All that is shewne for which the curious looks Touching this LAND, for Place, or Historic.

Hadst thou among the Romanes li'd when they Did signiorize the World; A Signiory Should then (at least) haue guerdon'd thy Surrey, Thy Mappes, Descriptions, and thine Historie.

*In which, thou hast with paine, with care, and skill, Surueid this Land more neere then ere it was :
For which, thy Wit thou strain'd hast to thy Will,
That wils as much as Witte can bring to passe.*

*But, thou dost lye when all Artes saue the^e eight (Illiberall liberall Arte) a begging goe;
That Arte alone, with her true friend Deceit, Gets all, then all seekes but that Arte to know.*

*The faire Hibernia that Westerne Isle likewise,
In euery Member, Artire, Nerue, and Veine, Thou by thine Arte dost so Anatomize,
That all may see each parcell without * paine.*

But, by thy Arce though nought be purchased
But emptie Fame (that feeds, but fattens not) Yet shall it feed thy NAME till DEATH be dead;
While emptie noble Names away shall rot.

*Heere Time, and Place, like friendly foes doe warre
Which should shew most desir'd Particulars;
But Place giues place, sith Time is greater farre;
Yes Place, well rang'd, gets glory by these warres.*

*The Leaues this Booke contains, and Maps here graunt,
Are still as Feathers to thy Fames faire Wings,
To fanne fresh Aire vpon the face of Heauen;
And, raise the same about all ending Things:
That when Confusion wracks this double FRAME,
A Spirit shall mone on CHAOS Call'd thy Fame*

No helps thou hadst, nor no assisting aide
In this attempt: but, Vertue gaue thee might That well to doe, that well thou hast affaide which shall (in grace) out-live immortall sight.

The vnfaigned louer of thy person,

F Him that this GREAT Taske hath done (Great for the goodnesse manie waies)
 FAME doth affirme he well hath wonne
 ARTS highest Prize, and Palme of praise.
 In Climes, and Realmes remote throughout,
 His merits merit rare report:
 For none the like hath brought about;
 Or equaliz'd in any sort.
 The Shafts of his endeours, shot
 At Gaine, and Pleasure; both haue hit:
 His Obseruations haue begot
 On priuate, publicke Benefite.
 Chiefe Cities, Townes, and Countries many (Which this vast Globe of Earth affords)
 I oft haue view'd; but, neuer any
 So well describ'd by Mappes and Wordes.
 His traueled Body, toiled Mind (To bring this VVorke at last to rest
 In Period which his Plot design'd)
 Should now rest famous with the best.
 The Romans such Deserts did Crowne
 With Lawrell, which their Soile brought forth;
 But I, of Branches farre off growne,
 Bring Wreaths to this worke, more of worthe.
 The Palme (wherein rare vertues bee,
 And, for a Conquest, Crownes a King)
 The Oliue, and the Cedar Tree,
 Faire, fat, and fruitfull; these I bring.
 In Egypt, Syria, and the Land
 Of Promise, (named by holiest High)
 I could not see, nor vnderstand,
 For vertue, any Trees come nigh.
 As these (worth praise) are profitable,
 They being of the worthiest kind:
 So in best fence, hath Speed bene able,
 To please (worth praise) the worthiest Minds.
 In short, to giue him then, his due,
 This Art his better neuer knew.

IO. SANDERSON.

THE PROEME. TO THE LEARNED AND LOVERS OF GREAT BRITAINES GLORY.

Having thus farre travelled in the protract, and description of this famous Empire of GREAT BRITAIN, I might here haue rested, and claimed the priuiledge that yeeres and imbecillitie haue brought me vnto: had not a further desire in others vrged it a matter incident, historically to lay downe the originals of those Nations and successions of those Monarchs, which either by birth or conquest haue aspired to the Imperiall Crowne.

And albeit I finde my selfe both tired in the former, and most vnfit to prosecute this latter, yet will I endeouour to giue herein my best assayes, though as my labours, so my wants also, thereby will be made more vulgar to the world.

For if those men were blame-worthy against whom Heraclite exclaimeth, who with long toile and great trouble finde a little pure substance in a great deale of base earth: how shall I then free me from the like imputation, that from so many mines of pure metals, haue gotten so little Oare, and the same neither well tried in my defectiue fornace, nor yet artificially cast off through the default of the mould, wanting both skil for to fashion, and measure to performe, the true proportions that in such a proiect is to be required; and how often these my defects haue dissuaded my proceedings, is best knowne to him that is the searcher of the heart.

But by what fate I am enforced still to goe forward, I know not, vnlesse it be the ardent affection and loue to my native Country; wherein I must confesse that Nature in those gifts hath bene both liberall, yea and prodigall, though Fortune as sparing & salt-handed against me, euer checking the Bit with the Reines of necessity, and curbing the meanes that should illustrate my labours: which moues me sometimes to thinke that if the great Philosopher Theophrastus, had cause on his deathbed to accuse Nature, for giuing man so long a lesson, and so short a life; then I against Fortune, may as iustly exclaime, that hath assigned me so great a labour and so little meanes. And therefore let it not seeme offensive that I draw my waters from the Cesterns of others, who am not able to fetch them at the spring-head my selfe: Neither that I strike vpon the same Anuile vnto their sound, though nothing so loud, nor with the like strength, wherein yet this fruit at least wil (I hope) redound of my en-

deuours that I shall incite the more learned: if not otherwise, yet in emulation of me, to free the face drawne by Apelles, from the censure of the fault or defect in the foot, and not onely to amend, but euen to new-mould the whole. Which thing though my dayes are neere spent; and with Barzillai I may say that musicke to me is now vnpleasing: yet doth my eare thirst after the set of that straine, as Socrates thoughts ranne euer on his Booke: who the night before he was to suffer death, was desirous to learne musicke, because he would die learning still something. Moses when he foresaw the destruction of his Common-wealth, which whilst it stood, was the glory of the earth, and a paterne to all kingdomes succeeding, left this for a Law among the rest, and euen to remaine for euer, that the fathers should teach their children, and should commit vnto writing those things which the Lord in their dayes had done, and enioyned the children, Likewise to enquire of the times that were past, euen from the first creation of man: For when as Empires and Kingdomes, Common weales and Cities, do end and perish, yet the Histories thereof do remaine and liue; And that made Cicero to say as he did, that Salamina should be utterly forgotten, before the things that were done in Salamina should perish: And therefore as among the wise answers of Thales, the Histories of Countreys are to be accounted for principals, either as Cicero calleth them the Mistres of life, and expositions of Times; so likewise let vs from the lyricall Poet Simonides learne this further, That he is perfectly happy which knowes his native country to be truly glorious. And as Cassidore calls him a worthy Citizen that seeketh the commodity of his country: So contrariwise he is by Bale esteemed but a fruitles clod of earth, that sucks the sappe of his soile onely to himselfe, whose memoriall shall perish as the dispersed smoake in the clouds, though for a time he mount aloft in his swelling pride. This naturall loue and true affection to our native Country, we may further learne from the ancient Patriarks and Fathers themselves, who besides a desire that they had to theirs, continually to liue therein during life, commanded their bodies to be buried therein after death: from whose Bowels they first had assumed their breathes, and in whose bosome they layd their bones, as in their last bed of rest. Yea, of the vnreasonable creatures, the Birds and Beasts, we may learne this loue, that alwayes are willing towards their home. And if it happen that Countreys grow vnkinde as Homers did, that in his old age and blind, suffred him to beg his bread; or that a Prophet in his owne country is not esteemed, as feremy felt it, and CHRIST IESVS taught, yet did the one for his peoples captiuitie, with his eyes a fountaine of teares, and the other for his countreys destruction lamented and wept, holding it vnlawfull to take the childrens bread, and to giue it vnto others.

That this our Country and subiect of History deserueth the loue of her inhabitants, is witnessed euen by foraine writers themselves, who haue termed it the Court of Queene Ceres, the Granary of the Westerne world, the fortunate Island, the Paradise of pleasure and Garden of God; whose Typographicall descriptions for the whole Iland, and Geographical surueyes for the seuerall parts, exceed any other kingdome vnder the cope of Heauen; that onely excepted which was conquered and diuided by Josuah. And for fruitfulness and temperature may be accounted another Canaan; watered with riuers that doe cleaue the earth, as the Prophet speaketh, and make the land as rich and beautiful, as was that of Egypt. Our Kings for valour and Sanctity, ranked with the worthiest in the world, and our Nations originals, conquests, and continuance, tried by the touch of the best humane testimonies, leaue as faire a Lustre vpon the same stone, as doeth any other, and with any nation may easily contend (saith Lanquet) both for antiquity, and continuall inhabitants from the first time that any of them can claime their originals.

And although our many Records are perished by the inuacons of strangers, through their couetous Conquest of so faire a Land; or in the ciuill dissensions of homebred aspirers that haue sought the possession of so rich a Crowne, yet Truth hath left vs no lesse beholding vnto her, then mightier Nations, and them that would be far more famous.

Neither

Neither is it to be wondred at, that the Records of GREAT BRITAINE are eaten vp with Times teeth, as Ouid speakes, when as in Times ruines lye buried their Registers, that haue bene kept with a stronger guard, as Titus Liuy in the entrance of his History affirmeth of the Romanes. As for those things (saith he) as are reported either before, or at the foundation of the City more beautified and set out with Poets fables, then grounded vpon pure and faithfull reports, I meane neither to auerre nor disproue. Of whole vncertainties, let vs a while heare the reporters themselves speake, before we proceed to the certaine successions of our British Monarchs: vntill which time the credit of our History may wel be laid to waigh with (if not downe peize) many others. Varro (that learned Romane writer, who liued an hundred yeeres before the birth of our Sauour Christ) calleth the first world to the Flood vncertaine; and thence to the first Olympias fabulous: Because in that time (saith he) there is nothing related (for the most part) but fables among the Greekes, Latines, and other learned Nations. And therefore Plutarch beginneth the lives of his worthy men, no higher then Thefens: because (saith he) what hath bene written before, was but of strange things, and sayings full of monstrous fables imagined and deuised by Poets, which are altogether vncertaine and most vntrue. And Diodorus Siculus (that liued in Augustus Caesars time, a great searcher after Antiquities, and for thirty yeeres continuance a traueiler into many Countreys, for information and further satisfaction) writing his History called Bibliotheca, conteyning forty Bookes, and yeeres of continuance one thousand, one hundred thirty and eight, of his first sixe himselfe giueth this censure in his Proeme. These Bookes (saith he) contayning the Acts of ancient men, before the destruction of Troy, with the ancient Histories aswell of Grecians as Barbarians, are called fabulous: Which moued Lucretius the Poet to demand this question.

Cur supra bellum Thebanum & funera Troia;
Non alias quondam cecidere Poetae?

Why haue not Poets in their workes of fained stories brought,
Things done before the Warres of Thebes, or Troys destruction wrought?

Yea and of Troys story it selfe, if we may beleeeue Thucydides (whom Bodine commendeth for an absolute Historian) though it be ancient (saith he) yet a great part thereof is fabulous. And Tully out of Plato complayneth of as much: For you Grecians (saith he) as children in learning, deliuer onely things vncertaine, and haue mingled fables with the Warres of Thebes, and of Troy, things (perhaps) which neuer were, but gathered out of the scattered Verses of Homer and others, not digested by Aristarchus, and are yet vncertaine and obscure. And that the Greekes indeed were but babes in Antiquity, Josephus in his Nations defence against Appion, sufficiently doth proue, where he affirmeth, That the inuention of their Letters was not so old as the siege of Troy, inso much that the Poesie of Homer (then the which there is none more ancient among them) was not committed to writing, but sung by roate. And the Latine tongue it selfe by M. Cato is said, not to haue bene in use foure hundred and fifty yeeres before the building of Rome. And Titus Liuy their famous Historian, freely confelleth, That the use of Letters and learning among the Romanes, was rare and hard to be found before the taking of Rome by the Gauls. Yea, and of the vncertainty of Romes foundation, how lauish so euer Historians haue written, not onely Fenestella hath continued whole Pages, but Plutarch likewise in the life of Romulus, hath many sayings, whereof this is one. The Historiographers (saith he) do not agree in their writings, by whom, nor for what cause the great name of Rome (the glory whereof is blowne abroad through the world) was first giuen vnto it; some affirming, that the Pelagians after they had runne over a great part of the world, lastly stayed themselves in that place where Rome was new built, and for their great strength in Armes, gaue name to that City Rome, which signifyeth power in the Greeke tongue. Other say, that certaine Troians after their siege, in certaine vessels sailed ued themselves by flight, and being put into the Thuscan Sea, anchored neere to the River Tyber: whose mines being extremely Sea-sicke, through the counsell of Roma's Lady, the wisest and worthiest among them, set fire on the whole Fleete; whereupon their husbands (though sore offended) were enforced to make use of their present necessity, and neere vnto Palantium planted this City, whose fame presently grew great, and in honour of Lady Roma named it Rome; and from hence they say the custome of kissing in salutations came, after the example of these mines, who to appease the husbands wraths with smiles and embracings kissed their mouths. Some will haue the name from Roma, the daughter of Italus and of Lucaria, or els of Telephus the sonne of Hercules, and of the wife of Aeneas. Others of Ascanius the sonne of Aeneas. Some againe from Romanus the sonne of Ulysses and of Cyrce, will haue it named Rome. Others from Romus the sonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither from Troy. There are that bring the name thereof from one Romus a tyrant of the Latines, who droue the Thuscans out of those parts. And they who thinke that Romulus (as that is most generall, and carieth the most likelihood to be Romes founder;) do not agree about his ancestours, as more at large in Plutarch appeareth. And therefore with Thucydides we may well say, It is a hard and difficult matter to keepe a meane in speaking of things, wherein scarcely can be had a certaine opinion of truth. And the rather, for that the writers themselves haue blamed each others of affectation & falsehood, as in Iosephus we may see; who affirmeth, That Hellanicus dissented from Acusilaus, Acusilaus with Diodorus correcting Herodotus; Ephorus accused Hellanicus of vntueths; so did Timæus reprove Ephorus of as much; Philistus and Callias dissented from Timæus in his History of Sicily, and Thucydides accounted a lyar by some. Caesar is taxed by Asinius Pollio (saith Suetonius) to be partiall in his Commentaries; And Tacitus by Tertullian is blamed for vntueths; Fabius Maximus is reprehended by Polybius for defectiue writing the Punicke warres; and himselfe againe with Silenus, Timæus, Antigonus, & Hierom, as much found fault with by Dionysius Halicarnassæus, for writing the Romane histories so vnperfectly. And a man may use the very same speech against Dionysius, saith Bodine. These things thus standing, let vs giue leaue to Antiquitie, who sometimes mingleth falsehoods with truth, to make the beginnings of Policies seeme more honourable: And whose power is farre scrued into the worlds conceit, that with Hierome we may say, Antiquity is allowed with such generall applause, that knowne vntuethes many times are pleasing vnto many. Yet with better regard to reuerend Antiquity, whom Jobs opposer wills vs inquire after, and to our owne relations in deliuering their censures, let this be considered; That more things are let slippe, then are comprehended in any mans writings, and yet more therein written, then any mans life (though it be long) will admit him to reade. Neither let vs be forestalled with any preiudicate opinions of the reporters; that in somethings may iustly be suspected, or in affection, which by nature we owe to our naturall Countrey; nor consent (as Luie speaketh) to stand to the ancientnesse of reports, when it seemeth to take away the certainty of truth. To keepe a meane betwixt both, my selfe with Bildad doe confesse, that I am but of yesterday, and know nothing, and therefore will relate the originall names and Nations of this famous fland, with the successions of her Monarches and Historicall actions, so farre only as is most approued by the best Writers, and will leaue other clouds of obscurity to be cleared by the labours of a more learned penne.

THE SITE AND CIRCVIT OF GREAT BRITAINES MONARCHIE.

CHAPTER I.

BESIDES those fruitfull Ilands that dispersedly are scattered about the Mayne, like to beautifull pearls that incomparably a Diademe, the Ile of GREAT BRITAIN doth raise it selfe first to our sight, as the Bodie of that most famous & mighty Empire, whereof many other Kingdomes and Countries are parcels and members. Being by the Almighty so set in the maine Ocean, as that there is thereby the High Admirall of the Seas, and in the terrestriall Globe so seated, as that she is worthily reputed both The Garden of Pleasure, and The Storehouse of Profit, opening her Haues euery way, fit to receiue all forraine trafficke, and to vtter her owne into all other parts: and therefore (as the Souveraigne Lady and Emperesse of the rest) deserues our description in the first place.

(2) This Iland is so spacious and ample, that Caesar
(the first Romane discoverer thereof) supposed that he had found out another World: for to his seeming it appeared, that the Ocean was rather contained within that Mayne, then that Mayne to be compassed with the Ocean about. And Iulius Solinus, for her circuit and largenesse, saith that it deserueth the name of Another World. But Aristides a Greeke Author speaks much more properly, who by way of excellencie termeth BRITAIN, The Great Iland: As likewise Tacitus, that vnderooke to describe BRITAIN by his owne knowledge, who saith, that of all Ilands knownen to the Romans it was the greatest: And so doth Dionysius in his description of the World.

(3) But as Strabo compares the then known World, to a Cloake, Rutilius Numatianus Italy, to an Oken leafe, and Dionysius Spaine, vnto an Oxe-hide: so the said Tacitus in the life of Agricola, from Luie his ancient, and Fabius Rusticus his moderne, doth liken the fashion thereof to a long Dish, or two-headed Axe:
whose forme notwithstanding may better be exposed to the eye, in the draught before scene, then can be explained in words to conceit, or vnto any other thing bee compared besides it selfe: especially seeing that so many good Writers haue had but very bad successe in their resemblances of Countries. And this of them is rather vnlike to either, it wee speake of the whole, which then was vnknown, as it seemeth by Tacitus. And the huge enorme tract of ground beyond Caledonia, which runneth vnto the furthestmost point, growing narrow and sharpe like a wedge, was first redoubled with the Romane fleet by Iulius Agricola, and BRITAIN discovered to bee an Iland, one hundred thirty and six yeeres after Iulius Caesar first entrance therein.

(4) Some haue beene induced by the narrow-nesse of the Sea, and likeness of the Soile, to thinke that BRITAIN was sometimes ioined to the continent of France: whereunto Seruius Honoratius sub-scribeth in his Commentarie vpon the first Eclog of Virgil, who there mentioneth

— Penitus toto diuisos orbe Britannos,
The Britaine people quite from all the world disioin'd.
As likewise by Claudian another ancient Poet it is stiled,

— nostro deducta Britannia mundo,
The Britaine Soile remoov'd from our worlds continent.

And Vinianus with them affirms, that in the beginning Britaine and Gaulia were both one Land. The like doth Virgil verifie of the Ile of Sicilie, which in times past hee reports to haue bene one with Italie.
Others hold, that all Ilands had their first separation from the Mayne by the rage of the general Deluge, and that the mountains thereby shewed their tops aboue the plaine grounds, and the plaines setting lower, became deepe vallies. When or howfoeuer, by Gods diuine ordinance and wilddome, wee see that these Ilands situated in the Seas, doe no lesse serue and adorn the Ocean it selfe, then the Lakes and Pooles of water doe the drie land, and all of them (as members of one masse) to minister sustentance for the life of all things liuing, and pleasures to the use and seruice of man.

(5) The Iland of BRITAIN, of all others the most famous (by Catullus reputed the furthest towards the West) is bounded on the South with Normandie and France, vpon the East with Germany and Denmarke, vpon the West with Ireland and the Atlan-ticke Ocean, and vpon the North with the vast Decca-lidon Seas. The length thereof, measured by the graduations to both extremes, that is, from the Lizard Point Southward in Cornwall, which lieth in the Lat-tude of 50. degrees and 6. minutes, to the Strathly head in Scotland (being the furthest point of this Iland towards the North) set in the degree 60. and 30. minutes containeth (according to the scale of the terrestrial globe) fix hundred twenty foure miles: not to trouble the Reader with other accounts, seeing the same fo exactly to agree with the spaces of the beacons. And the extent of the Land in the broadest part is from the Lands end in Cornwall in the West (situated in 14. degrees and 37. minutes of Longitude, according to Mercator his Atlas) vnto the Island Tenet in the East of Kent (lying in 22. degrees 30. minutes) and containeth miles 340. as they haue deliuered, that with curious search haue laid the dimension thereof.

(6) The site of this Island is set by the Mathematicians in the eighth Climate for Latitude, and the Longitude likewise placed betwixt the Parallels fourteenth and twenty six: a feat as well for Aireas Soile, both fruitful and milde; and for length of daies, pleasant and delightful: for in the height of Summer the day is laid to be eighteen equinoctiall houres long, whereof sixteen and a halfe are spent from Sunne to Sunne. Yea and Tacitus saith, that in the furthest North part of the Island the nights are so short, that betwixt the going out and coming in of the day the space is hardly perceived, and the Sunne seems neither to set nor arise: Because (saith he) the extreme and plaine parts of the earth proiect a low shadow, and raise not the darkness on high, so the night falleth vnder the skie and starre. Better might hee haue said, by reason of the inclination of his Circle to the Horizon descending not directly, but passing obliquely, razing as it were vnder their Horizon.

(7) The aire, saith Strabo and Tacitus, is rather inclinable to showers then to snow. And Cesar commendeth it to be more temperate, and the cold lesser, then that in France, as not subiect to either extremes, as the more Northerne and Southerne Countries are: to which temperature Cesconius Getulicus a very ancient Poet seemeth to haue respect, when of this Island thus he verifieth:

*Non illic Arias uerno ferit aëra cornu, Gnosia nec Geminis præcedunt cornua Tauri.
The horned Ram there butteth not the aire of tender Spring:
The Twins, nor Bull do to this soile vntimely seasons bring.*

(8) And although the Seas thereof are accounted and called by Nubienfis the Arabian, The darke and dangerous Seas, in regard of the mitty vapors that therfrom arise, yet in the winter season those clouds are dispersed into still showers of raine, that doe dissolve the rigour and great extremity of the cold: yea and those Seas themselves stirred and working to and fro with the windes, doe thereby wax warme (as Cicero saith) so that a man may easily perceive within that world of waters a certaine heat inclosed. And Miminius Felix proueth that GOD hath a speciall regard to the feuerall parts of the world, as well as to the whole, saith, that BRITAIN, though otherwhiles wanting the aspect of the Sunne, yet is it releeued with the warmth of her enuironing Seas; and as much refreshed, as we may well say, by those sweet and gentle windes that in the height of Summer are sent from those faires, and doe abate the rigor of the Sunnes great scorching heat; and yecletheth not only entercoure for traffique into all parts of the World, but plentifully aboundeth with all sorts of fish, to the great benefit of the Inhabitants; and bringeth forth Pearles, as Tacitus sheweth, which were usually cast out with the flood, and gathered at the ebbe. These Pearles, though not altogether so orient as they in India, by Amanius in his 23. booke and 12. chapter, are called Rich Gemmes. And Pliny in his ninth booke and thirty fifth chapter, vseth the like term: The desire whereof, (as Suetonius saith) drew Cæsars affection for the Conquest of BRITAIN.

(9) The soile (saith Tacitus) setting aside the Olive, the Vine, and such other plants as are onely proper to hotter Countries, taketh all kinde of Graine, and beareth it in abundance: it shooteth up quickly, and ripeneth slowly: the cause of both is the same, the over-much moisture of the soile, and the aire. And Cesar writeth, that for timber it was stored of all kindes, as in Gallia, the Beech and Firre tree onely excepted. For abundance of Graine, Britaine is said to bee The East of Queene Ceres, by Orpheus the old Poet; and the Granary and Storehouse for the Western World, as Charles the great teamed it: and by our owne Antecessors in the blacke Booke of the Eschequer it is called a Paradise of pleasure. From whence the Romanes were wont yearly to transport (with a fleet of eight hundred vessels bigger then Barges) great store of corne for the maintenance of their Armies. But vnto the particular relation of each seuerall blessing belonging to this most happy Land, we will not againe enter, seeing that in euery County wee haue sufficiently, and no more then truly, spoken thereof. Only, if you please, heare what hath bene said of this Land by the Romane Orators, and first in the Panegyricke to Constantius the Emperour.

(10) O happy BRITAIN, and more fortunate then all other Lands beside, which first didst see Constantine Emperour! For good cause hath nature endowed thee with all blessings both of aire and soile: wherein there is neither excessive cold of Winter, nor extreme heat of Summer: wherein there is so great abundance of graine, that it sufficeth both for bread and drinke. There the forests are free from savage beasts, and the ground void of noisome serpents: in whose stead an infinite multitude of tame cattle there are, with their vaders strutting full of milke, and laden with fleeces to the ground. And verily (that which for the use of our lines wee most esteeme) the daies are therein very long, and the nights neuer without some light, for that those vnto most plaine by the sea side cast, and raise no shadows on high; and the aspect both of skie and starres passeth beyond the bound of the night: yea the very Sunne it selfe, which vnto vs seemeth far to set, appeareth there only to passe by a little, and goe aside.

And in another, spoken to Constantius, the father of Constantine the Great, thus is said:

Though BRITAIN be but a single name, yet surely the States losses haue bene manifold, in forgoing a Land so plentifull in fruit and graine, so rich in pasture, so full of mines and veins of metall, so gainfull in tributes and reuenues, so accommodated with many hauens, and for circuit so large and spacious.

And a Poet of good antiquity, of natures motherly affection towards this our Island, hath thus written:

*Tu nimio nec stricta gelu, nec fydere feruens, Clementi celo temperique places.
Cum pareret Natura parens, variisque fauore Diuideret dotes omnibus vna locis.
Seposuit potiora tibi, matremque professa,
Insula sis felix, plenaque pacis, ait.
Quicquid amat luxur, quicquid desiderat usus,
Ecce proueniet, vel aliunde tibi.
Nor freezing cold, nor scorching hot thou art;
Thy aire a heavenly temper, sweetly breath'd:
So pleas'd Dame Nature when she first bequeath'd
To euery soile of her rich gifts a part;
Then Mother-like best choice for thee she sought:
Be thou (quoth she) the blessed Isle of peace.
What euer pleasure yeelds, or wealths increase,
From thee shall grow, or shall to thee be brought.*

(11) And that BRITAIN hath bene taken for those fortunate Islands whereof the Poets haue imagined a perpetual spring time, is certaine by Isidore Terzies a Greeke Author of good account. And in Robert of Auesburie we read, what time Pope Clement the sixth had elected Lewis of Spaine to be Prince of the Fortunate Islands, raising him powers both in Italie and France, the English Liger Embassadors, that lay then in Rome for King Edward the third, were so deeply set in the opinion, that this preparation was made against BRITAIN, that they wrote their suspitions conceited, and presently with-drew themselves into England, to certifie the King of these delignes. And it seemeth Pope Innocent the fourth was of the same mind, when (as Masih. Paris. writeth) hee said, Vere horum deliciarum est Anglia: vere puteus inexhaustus est: Et ubi multa abundant, de multis multa multa possunt extorqueri, &c. Certes the Kingdom of England is the very Paradise of pleasures, a Well which can neuer bee drawn drie: where many things doe abound, and whence many things may bee extorted, &c. With which his conceit he was afterward so farre transported with a longing desire, as hee made great meanes and earnest suit to the King of England (as the said Author writeth, ad ann. 1250.) that hee might come into England to see that Country which was euery where so much renowned. In a word, BRITAIN is so rich in commodities, so beautifull in situation, and so resplendent in all glory, that if the Omnipotent (as one hath said) had vouchsafed to fashion the world round like a ring, as hee did like a globe, it might haue bene most worthily the onely Gemme therein. Whole Vallies are like Eden: whole Hilles are as Lebanon: whole Springs are as Pisgab: whole Rivers are as Jordan: whole Walles is the Ocean: and whose defence is the Lord Iehouah.

(12) The body then of this Imperiall Monarchie sheweth not onely the greatnesse of it selfe in it selfe, but also extendeth her beautiful branches into many other Countries and Kingdomes farre iacent and remote. This greatnesse is made the more sensible, for that the Island in times past sustained at once no less then eleuen Kings in their royall estates, all of them wearing Crownes, and commanding great powers. Such was the Heptarchie of the Saxons (euene Kingdomes, seated on the South of Sauerius his Wall. Two Kingdomes thence had their sites in that Northerne part, and their feuerall Kings of Scots and Picts ruling on both sides the Clude, euen vnto the Deucalidian Seas. And two Kingdomes (if not more) diuided into North and South, and their Kings of the ancient Britaines ruling the West part of this Island beyond the Clawds Offa, or Offa his Ditch, commonly called Wales.

(13) The Islands likewise belonging to this Empire had Kings of their owne, as that of Man, the Orkades, and in Irland at one time five Kingdomes reigning together. France also is annexed, and so was Cyprus sometimes with some Prouinces of Syria, subdued by King Richard the first, surnamed Cœur-de-lion. And at this present in the new World of America a Colonie of BRITAIN is situated in that part now called VIRGINIA; whereby the borders of our Soueraignes command and most rightfull title may bee enlarged, & the Gospell of Iesus Christ further preached, which no doubt will in time be embraced, to the saluation of many, and great honour to the BRITAINES. And that the borders of this most roiall Tent haue bene wide spread in former times, White of Basingstoke is of opinion, who affirmeth that the limits of the British Empire in old time was from the Orkades vnto the Pyrenean Mountains. And that King Aethelstan after his conquest of those Northerne parts with that of Denmarke wrote to his title: which further is confirmed by the Charter of King Edgar for the foundation of the Cathedral Church at Worcester, wherein likewise he so styled himselfe. The enlargement whereof we pray to be accomplished, especially in those parts where God is not known, according to the saying of the Prophet, that the curtains of our habitations may bee further spread, with increase on the right hand and on the left: and that our feed may possesse those GENTILES, and dwell in their Cities: whereby the ninth Nation may bee conuerted vnto CHRIST, as eight others before this time by English-men haue bene.

THE NAMES THAT HAVE BEENE ATTRIBVTED VNTO THIS ISLAND OF GREAT BRITAIN.

CHAPTER II.

The first Inhabitants of this Island being merely barbarous, neuer troubled themselves to transmit their Originals to posteritie: neither if they would, could haue done, being without Letters, which onely doe preferre and transerre knowledge vnto others. And say they had letters, yet was it not lawfull for them to commit their affaires to writing, as Cesar doth testifie of the Druides, the only wise and learned men among them, that had the managing both of Iustice and religious Rites. And had they committed these things to writing, yet doubtlesse had they perished in the reuolutions of so many ages as are passed, and so many conuerfions or cuersions of the State. Gildas and Ninnius, the Brittaines first Historians, confesse plainly, that they had no vnderstanding of the ancient affaires of this Island, but from forraigne Writers; and neither that about two hundred and odd yeeres before the birth of our Saniour Christ. At

S touching the first Inhabitants and original Names of this Island, things so farre cast into the mistie darkness of obfcuritie and obliuion, that there is no hopeleft vs, so lately born, to discouer them; especially knowing that the first Inhabitants being merely which time Polybius a most graue Writer, and an attendant vnto Scipio, saith, that the Regions Northward from Narbona (as this is) were utterly unknown; and whatsoever was written or reported of them, was but a dreame. And therefore vntill such time as the Romane Writers reach forth their hands to direct vs, wee shall wander, as without a guide, and shall seeme to heape more rubbish vpon former ruines.

(2) Yet let this bee granted, that the Original names of Countries and Prouinces were first assumed from their possessors, whereof Isidore in the feuenth Chapter of his first Booke of Antiquities is a sufficient Witnesse, who in the disperfion of Noahs sonnes and his nephewes, nameth the Countries according to their families. So did the children of Dan name Laij after their father: Tair his Cities that he conquered in the Land of Gilead: and Iudea from Iudah whose King was of him. And that this also was the practise of the Gentiles, Perionius doth shew, who saith, that himselfe knew no Nation in the earth, which would not haue their names either from their Prince, Captain, or King: the example whereof hee inserteth, that Spaine was so named from Hispalus, Italy from Italus, and the like.

(3) And accordingly from Samoseth the sixth sonne of Tapheth (whom Moses calleth Mefech) the brother of Gomer, and of Iauan, whose seed is said in the tenth of Genesis to haue replenished the Isles of the Gentiles,

Came not Poleland from a Polonian word, which with them betokeneth a plaineland and was not Danmarch compounded of Dan and the Dutch word March, which signifieth a bound or limit? Neither have we cause to wonder at this Greek addition T A N I A, seeing that S. Hieronim in his questions vpon Genesis, proueth out of most ancient Authors, that the Greeks inhabited along the sea coasts and Isles of Europe thoroughout as far as to this our Island. Let vs read, faith he, Varroes bookes of Antiquities, and those of Silinius Capito, as also the Greeke writer Phlegon, with the rest of the great learned men, and we shall see, all the Islands well neere, and all the sea coasts of the whole world, to haue been taken up with Greek inhabitants, who, as I said before from the mountaine Amanus and Taurus euen to the British Ocean, possessed all the parts along the sea side. And verely, that the Greeks arriued in this our region, viewed and considered well the site and nature thereof, there will be no doubt nor question made: if we obserue what Athenasus hath written concerning Phileas Taurominis who was in Britaine in the yeere one hundred and sixty before Cæsar's coming: if we call to remembrance the Altar with an inscription vnto Vlysses in Greek letters, erected in Caledonia as Solinus faith, and lastly if we marke what Pytheas before the time of the Romans here, hath deliuered and written as touching the distance of Thule from Britaine. For who had euer discovered vnto the Greeks, Brittain, Thule, the Belgick countries, and their sea coasts especially, if the Greeke ships had not entered the British and German Ocean, yea and related the description thereof vnto their Geographers? Had Pytheas, thinke you, come to the knowledge of six daies sailing beyond Britaine, vnlesse some of the Greeks had shewed the same? Who euer told them of Scandia, Bergos and Nerigon, out of which men may faile into Thule? And these names seem to haue been better known vnto the most ancient Greeks, then either to Pliny or to any Roman. Whereupon Melanestheth, that Thule was much mentioned and renowned in Greek writers: Pliny likewise writeth thus; Brittain an Island famous in the monuments and records both of the Greeks and of vs. By this means therefore, so many Greeke words haue crept into the British, French, and withall into the Belgick or Low-Dutch language. And if Lazarus Baynius, and Budæus doe make their want and glory in this, that their French-men haue been of old quærens, that is, louers and studious of the Greeks, grounding their reason vpon few French words of that Idome, which receiue some marks and tokens of the Greeke tongue: if Hadrianus Iulinius ioyneth no lesse, because in the Belgick words there lie conuerty Greeke Etymologies: then may the Britains make their boast in whose language many words there be deriued from the Greeks. Thus saith M. Cambdens iudgement for Britannia. Which name we find first mentioned by Polybius the Greeke historiographer, who liued and traueled with Scipio thorow most parts of Europe, about 265. yeeres before the birth of Christ. And after him Athenasus a Greeke authour of good account, and before the yeere of grace 179. mentioneth the name of Britaine, and that vpon this occasion: King Hiero, faith he, framing a ship of such hugeness and burden, as was admirable to the world, was much troubled for a tree, whereof he might make the maine mast: which at last with much adoe was found in Britaine, by the direction of a Swineheard: and by Phileas Taurominis the Mechanick conueied into Sicilie, whereby that want was sufficiently supplied. To this let not the Criticks from Caesar say, that Britaine brought forth neither Beech nor Firre, as he in his first booke of commentaries affirmeth (if by fagus he meant the Beech) seeing that the same kind doth most plentifully grow in all parts of this Island, and the Firre-trees for masts in the North west of Scotland vpon the banks of the Lough argieck of such great height and thicknesse, that at the root they beare 28. handfulls about, and the bodies mounted to 90. foot of height they beare at that length 20. inches Diameter, as hath been measured by some in commission, & so certified to his Majesty: and at this present growing vpon the lands of the right worthy Knight Sir Alex-	ander Hayes his Majesties principal Secretary for Scotland. But among the Latine Writers Lucretius was the first that before Cæsar mentioneth Britaine in these verbes: Nam quid Britannum calum deferre putamus, Et quod in Aegypto est, quæ mundi claudicat Axis: We see the difference in the spheres where Britaines Summe doth goe. From Egypts Clime, wherein Charles waine is forced to draw so low. (8) Other names hath this Island beene termed by, and that either by way of note for her situation, as Insula Cæculi, the Land in the Sea, so written in the sonet or parodia made against Viridius Bassus, and by Claudian confirmed, whose fides (faith hee) the azure Sea doth wash. And in a very ancient manuscript it is found written, Insula florum, an Island of flowers, for the abundance of Graine therein growing: as also for her subiection to the Romanes, hath beene called by Agestippus, the Romane World, and by her owne Historian Gildas, Romania: for being first subdued by them, the very name of seruitude (faith hee) stucke fast to the soile. And Prosperus Aquitains in expresse words calleth it, the Romane Island, and so did the South-faiers when the statues of Tacitus and Florianus the Emperours were by lightning ouerthrowen, who prophesied, that an Emperour should arise out of their familie, that should send a Pro-consull to the Romane Island. Vpon the like cause of conquest and subiection we read in Amianus, that what time the Island had assaid a dangerous reuolt in the raigne of Valentinianus the Emperour, Theodosius as then Gouvernor of Britaine, reducing them vnder their wonted obedience, in honor of Valentinianus, caused the Island to be called VALENTINIA, which name notwithstanding died either with, or immediately after the death of the said Emperour. (9) But about the same time, when as by Gods decree the Romanes fullnesse was come to the wane, and the greatnesse of their glory did abate, by the downefall of that one Empire many Kingdomes beganne to arise, and to haue their Rulers, Lawes, and Limits of themselves. Among the rest, this Island Britaine thortle came to be diuided into three feuerall Kingdomes, and each of them to retain an absolute power in their owne dominions, and known by their feuerall and proper names. The first was Scotland from Scotia, and that from Scythia, as the best suppose, whose Southerne bounds was the famous Wall from Carlisle to Newcastle, and from thence the enorme tract of all that Northern promontorie was called Scotia, or Scotland. The second was Cambria, of vs called Wales, fitted in the West of this Island, inclosing those waste mountaines with a ditch drawn from Basingwarke in Flintshire in the North, to the mouth of Wyne nere Bristol in the South, so separated by great Offa the Mercian King. And the third was Angle-land, the East, the most fruitfull, and best of the Island, lying coasted with the French and German Seas, so named when the vnted Heptarchie of the Saxons was ruled by King Egbert, who by his edict dated at Winchester, Anno 819. commanded the same to be called Angle-land, according to the name of the place from whence his ancestors the Angle-Saxons came, which was out of the continent part of Denmarke, lying betwixt Iutland and Holsatia, where to this day the place retaineth the name Engloen. And therefore Calpurnie is to be rectified, that would haue the name from Quene Angela, and Goropius, of good Anglers; either from Pope Gregorie his attribute of Angell-like faces; or from others that would faile it from Angula the Giant-like brother to Darius; or force it from Angulus Orbis. (10) Neither indeede was it called England before the daies of Canutus the Dane; but with Angle-land, retained still the names both of Alhon and Britaine, as in a Saxon Charter made by King Edgar the tenth in succession from Egbert, and nolesse then one hundred forty and nine yeeres after this Edict is scene, where in the beginning he stileth himselfe thus: Ego Edgar totius Althonis Basileus, &c. And in the end of the same charter thus: Edgar Rex totius Britannia Domoc-	Lucretius. Britaine called Insula Cæculi. Britaine the Romane world. Prosperus Aquitains. A prophesie of the Romane fourth sayre concerning Britaine. This Island Britaine named the Roman Land. Amianus Marcell. lib. 38. cap. 7. This Island named Valentia. Many countries arise by the Romanes downefall. This Island Britaine diuided into three Kingdomes. The first, Scotland, whose partition fourthward is from Carlisle to Newcastle. The second, Cambria or Wales, whose partition is from Basingwarke to Wyne. The third, Angle-land coasted with the French and German Seas. This Island named Angle-land of place in Denmarke called Engloen. Gregorie 1. This Island not called England before the daies of Canutus the Dane. This Island vntill called both Angle-land, Althion, and Britaine, before Canutus daies.	mem cum sigillo S. Crucis confirmant. And yet vpon his Coines wrote himselfe Rex Anglis, wherby wee see the reliish of the former names not vterly extinct, though a new was imposed by the Saxons. (11) This last name this Island still retained, though two feuerall Conquests of two feuerall Nations were made of the same. Neither did William the Conquerour attempt to alter it, it founding belike lo Angel-like in his cares, accounting himselfe most happy to be King of so worthy a Kingdom: the glorie whereof is further enlarged by the ranking of Christian nations, assembled in their general Councils, wherein England is accounted the fifth, and hath place of precedence before kingdomes of larger territories. This name of England continued for the space of feuen hundred eighty and three yeeres, vnto the coming in of our Soueraigne Lord King I A M A S, in anno 1602. who by the hand of G O D hath vnited all these Diademes into one Imperial Crowne, and reduced the many Kingdomes in one Island, vnder the gouernment of one Monarch: and after the manifold conquests, interruptions, and diffensions, hath settled an eternal amitie; and extinguishing all differences of names, hath giuen the whole Island the ancient name of GREAT BRITAINS, by his Edict dated at Westminster, quarring the royal Armes of his feuerall Kingdomes in one royall Scutcheon, and for his most, as is most meet, BEATI PACIFICI.	Hath continued and kept the name England the space of feuen hundred eighty and three yeeres. Now reduced to the name of Great Britaine.

doth testify. And for Brennus their Grand-Captaine, our Historians report him to be a Britaine: as likewise Virgil (though in taunting wife) termeth that Grammarians the Britaine Thucydides, whom Quintilian as- firmes to be a Cimbrian.

(6) And if of the rest of Noahs nephews, seated in feuerall countries, the Nations proceeding from them, are known by their original names, as the Turkes of Togorma, whom the Temes to this day I term, the Jones from Iuan, the Medes from Madai, the Thracians from Tiras, and so of the rest, whose names as yet found not much vnlike to their first planters; why then shall not we thinke, that our Britains or Cumerians, are the very off-spring of Gomer, and of Gomer tooke their denomination, the name so neere accordeth? Such granted it is, that they planted themselves in the vtmost borders of Europe, as Idore hath said. For the Ark resting in Armenia, and the people thereof flowing like waters from the spring, replenish'd those parts first that lay next their site: as Asia the lesse, and Greece before Italy: Italy before Gauls, and Gauls before Britaine. And if we consider the occasions, that might be offered, either for disburdening the multitudes of people, for conquest, desire of nouelties, or smallness of distance, or commodities of the aire and soile, we may easily conceiue this Iland to haue been peopled from thence. For it standeth with sense that euery country receiued their first inhabitants from places neere bordering, rather then from them that lay more remote: for so was Cyprus peopled out of Asia, Sicilie and Candie out of Greece; Corfica and Sardinia out of Italy, Zeland out of Germany, Iland out of Norway, and so of the rest. Now that Britaine had her first inhabitants from Gauls, sufficiently is proued by the name, site, religion, manners, and languages, by all which the most ancient Gauls and Britains haue bene as it were linked together in some mutuall society; as is at large proued by our Arch-Antiquary in his famous worke, to which I refer the studious reader.

(7) And although the inner parts of the Iland were inhabited, as Cesar saith, of such whom they themselves out of their own records, report to haue bene borne in the Iland: yet the sea coasts were peopled by those, who vpon purpose to make war, had pass'd thither out of Belgia, and Gauls, who still caried the names of those cities and states, out of which they came: as the Belges, the Attrebatii, Parisi, and the like names of people both in Gauls, and in Britaine, that after the warres there remained. Which is the more confirmed in that both the Provinces were gouerned by one and the same Prince, as Cesar in his owne remembrance knew, and nameth one Diuitiacus to hold a good part of Gauls, and also of Britaine vnder his gouernment. Yea and Tacitus the most curious searcher into Britains affaires, in the life of Agricola thus deciphereth them. Now (saith hee) what manner of men the first inhabitants of Britannia were, forraigne brought in, or borne in the land, as among a barbarous people, it is not certainly known. Their complexions are different, and thence may some coniectures bee taken: for the red haire of the dwellers in Caledonia, and mighty limmes, import a German descent. The coloured countenances of the Silures, and haire most commonly curled, and site against Spain, seeme to induce, that the old Spaniards pass'd the sea, and possessed those places. The neere to France likewise resemble the French, either because they retainde of the race from which they descended, or that in Countries butting together, the same aspect of the heaues doth yeld the same complexions of bodies. But generally it is most likely, the French being neere, did people the Land. In their ceremonies and superstitious persuasions, there is to be seene an apparant conformitie. The Language differeth not much: like boldnesse to challenge and set into dangers: when dangers come, like feare in refusing: sauing that the Britains make shew of great courage, as being not mollified yet by long peace.

(8) Whereby we see, that these Cimbrians (of whom, as Aprian Alexandrinus saith, came the Celts, and of them the Gauls, as Plutarch in the life of Camillus affirmeth, with whom both Plato and Aristotle agree) were the ancient progenitors of these our Britains: and them, with the Gauls, to be both one and the same people, is allowed by Pliny, that placeth them both in the continent of France; for so Eustathius in his Commentarie vnderstandeth Dionysius Afar, that these Britains in Gauls gaue name to the Iland now called GREAT BRITAIN, as Pomponius Latus and Beda before him had done. These things considered, with the neere esse of their sites for ready entercourse, made both Cesar and Tacitus to conceiue as they did. Neither were these things following small motiues vnto them: for their religion was alike, saith Lucan and Tacitus: their boldnesse in warres, and manner of armes alike, saith Strabo, Tacitus, Dion, Pliny, Herodian, and Mela: Their building alike, saith Cesar and Strabo: their ornaments and manners alike, saith Pliny and Cesar: their wits alike, saith Strabo and Tacitus: their language alike, saith learned Bodine: and in all things the unconquered Britains to the ancient Gauls alike, saith Tacitus. And all these doe warrant vs (me thinkes) to come from the Cimbrians, whole sonnes, and our fathers, were the Celts and Gauls: the bands of whose amities were so linked together, that the Britains gaue aid, and assisted the Gauls against Cesar, which was no small cause of his quarrell against them.

(9) Not to deriue the truth of our historie from the fained inuentions of a forged Berosus, that bringeth Samothres to people this Iland, about one hundred fiftie two yeeres after the Flood, to giue lawes to the Land, and to leaue it to his posteritie, for three hundred thirty five yeeres continuance: although hee be countenanced by Amandus Zirixus in the annotations of White of Basingstoke: and magnified vnto vs by the names of Dis and Meshech the sixt sonne of Iapheth, from whom this Iland with a Sect of Philosophers tooke their names, saith Textor, Bale, Holinshed, and Caius: yet seeing this building hath no better a foundation but Berosus, and he not only iustly suspected, but long since fully conuicted for a counterfeiter, we leaue it, as better fitting the pens of vulgar Chroniclers, then the clif of iudicious Readers: whilest with Laertius we iudge rather, that those Sophes were termed Samothres, and they not from Samothra, as Villicus would haue vs beleuee.

(10) Neither foundeth the musike of Albions legion tunable in our eares, whom Berosus with full note, and Amnius alloweth to be the fourth sonne of Neptune, and him the same that Moses calleth Naphthali, the fourth sonne of Mizraim, the second sonne of Cham, the third sonne of Noah, (because his fictions should be countenanced with the first) who being put into this Iland by Neptune his father (accounted forsooth the god of the Seas) about the yeere after the flood three hundred thirty and five, ouercame the Samothreans, as easily he might, being a man of great strength in bodie, and largeness of limmes, that hee is accounted among the Giants of the earth. Him Hercules furnamed Lybicus in battle assailed for the death of Offris his father, and after forty four yeeres tyrannie (saith Bale) slew him with his brother Bergion in the continent of Gallia neere to the mouth of the riuer Rhodanus: whence Hercules trauelled into this Iland, as Giraldus (from Gildas the ancient Briton Poet) coniectureth, whose fift dialogue of Poetrie hee had seene; and therather beleueed, because Ptolemy calleth that head of Land in Cornwall, Promontorium Herculis, and left the possession of the Iland vnto them of Cham, contrarie to the meaning of the Scriptures, that made him a Captiue, but neuer a Conquerour ouer his brethern, whiles their first Policies were standing.

(11) The last, but much applauded opinion, for the possesing and peopling of this Iland, is that of Brute, generally held for the space of these last four hundred yeeres (some few mens exceptions refered) who with his dispersed Troians came into, and made conquest of this Iland the yeere of the worlds creation

2887. and after the uninerfall flood 1231. in the eighteenth yeere of Hebi his Priesthood in the land of Israel, and before the incarnation of Christ our Sauour one thousand fifty nine. This Brute is brought from the ancient Troians by descent, yea and from the persons of the heathen deified Gods: as that he was the sonne of Syluius, who was the sonne of Afcanius, the sonne of Aeneas, the sonne of Anchises by Venus the Goddesse, and daughter to Iupiter their greatest in account. And if Pliny and Varro hold it praiseworthy to challenge descents (though fallily) from famous personages, whereby, as they say, appeareth an inclination to vertue, and a valorous conceit to perswade vnto honor, as sprung from a race diuine and powerfull: then by all means let vs liue to him of Monmouth, who hath brought his Nation to ranke in degree with the rest of the Gentiles, which claime themselves to be the Generation of the Gods.

(12) But why do I attribute the worke to him, as the Author, fith he professeth himselfe to be but the translator of that history out of the British tongue, which Walter the Archdeacon of Oxford brought out of Normandie, and deliuered vnto him? For the further confirmation thereof, and more credit to his story, Henry of Huntington, who liued in the time of king Stephen, and wrote likewise the history of this land, bringeth the line of Brute from Aeneas the Troiane, and his arriuage and conquest to happen in the time of Hebi his Priesthood in the land of Israel, as Geoffrey ap Arthur hath also done: not taking (as some thinke) any thing thereof from him; but rather out of an ancient booke intituled De Origine Regum Britannorum, found by himselfe in the library of the Abbey of Bec, as he trauelled towards Rome: which history began at the arrivall of Brute, and ended with the acts of Cadwalader, as by a treatise of his owne inditing, bearing the same title, hath bene compared, and found in all things agreeing with our vulgar history, as industrious Lambert affirmeth himselfe to haue seen. And Ninius is said by the writer of the reformed history, to bring these Britains from the race of the Troians, four hundred yeeres before that Geoffrey wrote: yea and long before Ninius also, Taliesin a Briton Poet in an Ode called Hanes, of Taliesin his countrie of life, in these words, Mia deyllyn ywya at Weddilion Troia, that is, I came hither to the Remnants of Troy.

(13) That William of Malmesbury (who wrote in the daies of King Henry the first) was before him of Monmouth, is most certain, yet doth he make mention of Arthur a Prince (saith he) deserveth rather to be aduanced by the truth of records, then abused by false imputation of fables; being the only prop and upholder of his country. And Beda his ancient also, nameth Ambrosius Aurelianus to be King of the Britains, long before that Geoffrey was borne: So was Brennus mentioned by Lin.; Belinus, (if he be Belgus) by Iustine; Casibela by Cesar; Cunobelin by Suetonius; Arviragus by Marial; Lucius by Eusebius; Coel, Constantius, Carausius, and others by Eutropius, and Paulus Diaconus; and Helena by Nicephorus, Ambrose, and Socrates. These are the affirmatives that giue countenance to the Archdeacon of Monmouths translation, and credit to Brutes conquests and successours; yea and John Harding his Herauld, in his home-spun poetry, can easily emblaze his armes to be Gules, charged with two lions rampant endorsed Ore; and the same to be borne by the Kings of Troy. And his banner displayed at his entrance is said to be Vert a Diana of gold fitch, crowned, and enthroned, the same that Aeneas bare, when he entered the land of the Latines. But the censures of these relations I leaue to the best liking of iudicious Readers, only wishing them to be vnlike the inhabitants vnder the rocks of the Cataracts of Nilus, whereof Cicero and Amianus make mention, who were made deafe by the continuall noise of the fall of Nilus: left by the found and loud voices of these writers, the exceptions of others can not be heard, which from the fullness of their penes I will likewise declare, without offence, I hope, vnto any.

(14) First (with a reuerend reuerentiation had to the sacred histories) Varro the most learned Latine writer, diuiding times motions into three feuerall parts, that is, from the creation to the flood, which he termeth altogether vncertaine: from the flood to the first Olympiad (by Berosus computation set in the yeere of the world 3154. and thirty one of the raigne of Tos, king of Indah: seven hundred seventy and four yeeres before the birth of our Sauour) he calleth fabulous: and the last age from the first Olympiad to himselfe he nameth historical. Now the story of Brute beginning two hundred sixty yeeres before the first Olympiad, falleth in the time wherein nothing els is related, either of the Greeks or Latines, the only learned writers; but fables and tales, as both himselfe and others haue told vs, much more then, among the barbarous, vnlettered, and vniuersall nations, as all these parts of the world then were.

(15) Whereupon Gildas our ancientest home-borne writer, (cited and in whole sentences followed by venerable Beda, who termeth him the Britains historiographer) in this of Brute is silent, and in his lamentable passions neuer dreames of him, but as one ouerwhelmed with griefe bewaileth the wickednesse of the time wherein he liued, who was borne, as himselfe saith, in the forty fourth yeere after the Saxons first entrance, about the yeere of Christs incarnation 493. and died, as Bale cieth out of Polydore, the yeere of our redemption 580. Ninius also another ancient writer, who liued about eight hundred yeeres since, taking in hand the Chronicles of the Britains, complaineth that their great Masters and doctours could giue him no assistance, being ignorant of skill, and had left no memoriall of things passed, nor committed their acts vnto writing, whereby hee was enforced to gather what he had gotten from the annals and Chronicles of the holy fathers. Beda likewise, whose history ended in anno 733, beginneth no sooner then with Julius Caesar entrance; notwithstanding he had the assistance of the Abbat Albinus, who was brought vp vnder Theodoros Archbishop of Canterbury, and had begun the history of this land with most diligent search from the records of the kingdom of Kent, and the provinces adjoining; as also being further assisted by Daniel Bishop of the West-Saxons, who sent him all the records that were to be found of the same Bishoprick, South-Saxons, and the isle of Wight. The like helpe had he from Abbat Effius, for the country of East-Angles; from Cymbertus and the brethren of Lestinge for the province of Mercia, and East-Saxons. And from the brethren of Lindisfarne, for the country of Northumberland; besides his owne paines in collections, knowledge and experience: all which he did digest and historically compile, and before the publication thereof sent it to king Ceolulph at that time reigning in Northumberland, to be approved or corrected by his most learned skill: yet in none of these found he that history of Brute nor his successours, which as some would haue it, was then vnknown in the world.

(16) After him Elward, as William of Malmesbury calleth him, or rather (as he writeth himselfe) Patricius Consul fabius Quosfor Ethelwerdus, a diligent searcher of antiquities, a reuerend person, and of the blood roiall, wrote four books, briefly comprising the whole history of England, from the beginning of the world vnto the time of king Edgar wherein he liued; of Brute nor his Britains speaketh a word; but passeth with silence to the Romans and Saxons. What need I to cite Ingulphus, who died anno 1109. Florentius of Worcester, that flourished in the daies of King Henry the first, or William of Malmesbury, that wrote vnto the end of his raigne; all of them writers before Geoffrey of Monmouth, but none of them mentioning this story of Brute. This moued William of Newburgh, borne (as himselfe saith) in the beginning of King Stephens raige, & liuing at one and the same time with this Archdeacon of Monmouth, too too bitterly to inueigh against him and his history, euen to soone as the same came forth: as in the proeme of his booke is to be

be seen. And that the words are his and not our own, take them from him as they lie. In these our daies (saith he) there is a certain writer risen up, devising fictions and tales of the Brittaines out of the vaine humors of his owne braine, extolling them far above the valorous Macedonians, or worthy Romans; his name is Geoffrey, and may well assume the surname Arthur, whose tales he hath taken out of the old fables of the Brittaines, and by his owne invention augmented with many untruths, foiling them over with a new colour of the Latine tongue, and hath inuaded them into the body of an history. Adventuring further to divulge under the name of autentick prophecies, deceitfull coniectures and foredoomings of one Merlin (a Wizard), whereunto also he addeth a great deale of his owne. And againe: In his booke which he hath intituled the Brittaines History, how shamefully, and with a bold countenance he doth lie, there is no man that readeth therein can doubt, unless he hath no knowledge at all in ancient true histories; for having not learned the truth of things indeed, he admitteth without discretion and iudgement, the vanitie and untruths of fables. I forbear to speake (saith he) what great matters this fellow hath forged of the Brittaines acts before the Empire and coming in of Cæsar. Thus saith Parus.

But I know the answer to this so great an accusation: namely, that this William making suit vnto David ap Owen Gwyneth, Prince of North-wales, for the Bishopricke of Saint Asaphs, after the death of Geoffrey, and thereof failing, fully scandalized and impudently belied that most reuerend man. Which surely had been a great fault, and might of vs be beleueed, had not others of the same rank and time, verified afmuch.

(17) For Syluester Giraldus, commonly called Cambrensis, that flourished in the same time with the said author, made no doubt to terme it The fabulous story of Geoffrey. The like is verified by John Weathamstead Abbat of Saint Albanes, a most iudicious man that wrote in anno 1440. who in his Germanie giueth sentence of this history as followeth. The whole discourse of Brutus (saith he) is rather poeticall, then historicall, and for diuers reasons is built more vpon opinion then truth, first because there is no mention thereof made in the Romanes story, either of his killing his father, or of the said birth, or yet of banishing the sonne. Secondly, for that Akenius began no such sonne who had for his proper name Syluius by any approved Author: for according to them, he began only one sonne, and his name was Iulius, from whom the family of the Iulii took their beginning. And thirdly, Syluius Posthumus, whom perhaps Geoffrey meaneth; was the sonne of Aeneas by his wife Iunonia, and he begetting his sonne Aeneas in the thirty eighth year of his reigne ended his life by cause of naturall death. The kingdom therefore now called England, was not heretofore, as many will haue, named Britaine of Brutus the sonne of Syluius. Wherefore it is a vaine opinion and ridiculous to challenge noble blood, and yet to want a probable ground of the challenge: for it is manhood only, that enobleth a nation; and it is the mind also with perfect understanding, and nothing els, that gaineth gentility to a man. And therefore Seneca writeth in his Epistles to Plato, that there is no King but he came from vassals, and no vassall but he came from Kings. Wherefore to conclude, let this suffice (saith he) that the Brittaines from the beginning of their nobility haue been courageous and valiant in fight, that they haue subdued their enemies on every side, and that they utterly refuse the yoke of seruitude.

(18) Now that William of Newborough, had sufficient cause (say some) to exclaime against the fantasies of Merlin, and the fictions of Arthur, is made manifest in the sequel, not only by the decree of that obtruded Council of Trent, wherein was inhibited the publication of Merlines books; but also (in effect) by the statute enacted the fifth yeere of our last deceased Queene Elizabeth of blessed and immortal memorie, wherein is forbidden such fantastical preditions, vpon occasions of Armes, Fields, Beasts, Badges, Cognizances, or Signets, such as Merline stood most vpon; and likewise William of Malmsbury saith that Arthur being the only proppe that vpheld his country, de-serued rather to be aduanced by truth, then abused with fables wherewith that story is most plentifully stored. And also, that Weathamstead had reason to account Brutes acts and conquests to be rather poeticall then any waies warranted by the records of truth, appeareth by the silence of the Romane writers therein, who name neither Brute nor his father in the genealogie of the Latine Kings; and if any such were, (saith the contradictors) how could they be ignorant of the vintime death of their king, slaine by the hand of his naturall (though in this act vnaturall) sonne? or what should moue them, being so lauish in their own commendations, to be thus silent in their Brutes worthinesse, that with seuen thousand dispersed Troians warred so victoriously in Gallia, conquered a kingdom of Giants; subdued a most famous Iland, raigned gloriously, and left the same to his posterity; none of them, either in prose or poetry once handled, but left to deltiny to be preferred by a long ensuing meanes, or to perish in obliuion for euer? And surely this moued the whole Senate of great Clerks to giue sentence, that neuer any such Brute raigned in the world; such as were Boccace, Vines, Hadrian Iunius, Polydore, Buchanan, Vignier, Genebrard, Molinus, Bodine, and others.

(19) Yea, and there are some Criticks that faue would take aduantage from the defenders of Brutes history themselves, as from Sir John Prys, that produceth many vncertaine examples of the original of other nations; which granted, (say they) doth no waies confirme the truth or certainty of our owne; neither is it any honour to deriue these Brittaines from the summe of such conquered people as the Troians were. Humphrey Lhuyd likewise denying absolutely the deriuation of the Brittaines name from Brute, and bringing it from two compounded words, (as we haue said) doth thereby weaken the credit of his conquest of this Iland to their vnderstanding, as also the catalogue of his successors, which are said to raigne successiuelly for many hundred of yeeres after him. And another indolent Britissh writer, hauing the helpe of two most ancient Britissh copies, the collections of Caradock of Carnaruan, their owne Bardies euerly third-yeeres visitation, and twenty seuen authors of good account, (all of them cited in the preface of his Chronicle) besides his helps had in the offices of records for this realme; yet ascending no higher then to the person of Cadwalader, Prince of Wales, whose reign was in the yeere of Christs incarnation 682. and no lesse then one thousand seuen hundred twenty and sixe yeeres, after that Brute is said to come into this Iland, doth not warrant (say they) the story that is included betwixt, but rather euen the same is entangled with many doubtfull vncertainties, and so left disputable by the said compiler himselfe; as namely whether that this Cadwalader whom the Brittaines claime to be their king, be not the same Cheuwald whom the Saxons would haue theirs; both liuing at one time, both in acts alike, and names neere, both abandoning their kingdomes, both taking the habit of religion, both dying in Rome, both buried in one Church, nay, say they, in one Sepulchre. The like he bringeth of the Brittaines tuor, and the Saxons one, in the like coherences of names, acts, deuotions, and deaths: so that this history of Brute carieth not so smooth a current for passage as is wished, nor is that Gordons knot so easily vnloosed.

Againe, the Reformer of the Britissh history himselfe, although he hath written one whole chapter in defence of Geoffrey Monmouth, and frainteth to make his booke authentickall, complaining often and accusing learned and vnpartiall Cambden seuerall times, for blowing away sixty of the Britaine Kings with one blast: yet when he compareth the generations with the time, is forced thus to write: From Porrex to Mynogen are twenty one Kings in a lineall descent, and but yeers ninety two: now diuide 92. by 21. and you shall finde, that children beget children, and these (saith he) by George Owen Harry in his booke of pedegrees dedicated to his Maiesesty appeareth to be in a lineall descent, besides three or foure four collateral. And yet goeth further: I thought the Scripture (saith he) allege Iudah, Hezron, Salomon, and Ezekiah, to be but young when they began their Kingdomes, which (as Rabbi Isaac saith) might be at thirteene yeeres of age: And although Saint Augustine say, that the strength of youth may beget children young; and Hierome bringeth in instance of a boy that at ten yeeres of age begot a child: yet this doth not helpe to excuse the mistaking of yeeres for the Iohn Kings above mentioned.

Thus far John Lewis: and for the exceptions made against Brute: wherein I haue altogether vied the words of others, and will now (without offense, I hope) adde a supposall of mine owne, seeing I am fallen into the computation of times, which is the onely touch-stone to the truth of histories, especially such as are limited by the bounds of the sacred Scriptures, as this for Brutes entrance is. And that the same cannot bee so ancient (supposing it were neuer so certaine) as the vulgar opinion hitherto hath held, the circumstance of time, to my seeming, sufficiently doth proue.

(20) For Brutes conquest and entrance are brought by his Authour to fall in the eighteenth yeere of Heli his Priesthood in the Land of Israel, and so is fastned into a computation that cannot erre. Now the eighteenth yeere of Helies government, by the holy Scriptures most sure account, is set in the yeere of the worlds creation 2887. after the vnterfall flood 1231. and before the birth of our blessed Saviour 1059. yeeres. Brute then liuing in this forced time, was foure descents from the conquered Troians, (as he of Monmouth hath laid downe) which were Aeneas, Ascanius, Syluius, and himselfe: so that by these generations successiue in order, the very yeere almost of Troies destruction may certainly be pointed out and known: which in searching hath beene found so doubtful, that by some it hath beene thought to be a meere fable. Yet with more reuerence to antiquitie obserued, let vs cast and compare the continuance of these foure generations vnto Brutes Conquest, not thorning them with Baruch, to be but ten yeeres to an age; neither lengthning them with Iosephus, who accounteth one hundred and seuentie yeeres for a generation: but with more indifference let vs with Herodotus, who wrote neerer these times, allow thirty yeeres for a succession, as hee accounteth in his second booke. Now foure times thirty make one hundred and twenty, the number of yeeres that these foure Princes successiuelly did liue: by which computation likewise measured by Scripture, the ruination of Troy fell in the thirtieth eighth yeere of Gideons government in Israel, and was the yeere after the worlds creation 2768. But the authoritie of Clement Alexandrinus, alleged out of Menander, Pergamenus, and Letus, doth teach that time of Troies destruction, and placeth it fully two hundred and thirtie yeeres after, euen in the raigne of King Salomon: for in his first booke Stromat. 1 thus he writeth: Menelaus from the overthrow of Troy came into Phœnicia, at that time when Hiram King of Tyrus gaue his daughter in marriage vnto Salomon King of Israel. Where, by him welce, that Troies ruines and Salomons raigne fell both vpon one time. And so Brute hath lost of his antiquity, by this account, 230. yeeres; and entred not in Helies Priesthood, but rather in the vlturpation of Iudahs Kingdom by Athalia, and in the yeere of the world 3118.

(21) To whom let vs ioine Iosephus, an Authour of great credit, and without suspition in this case, who in his Nations defense against Apion, in both his bookes, confidently affirmeth himselfe able to proue by the Phœnician Records of warrantable credit, that the City Carthage was built by Dido, sister to Pigmalion, one hundred fiftie and five yeeres after the raigne of King Hiram, which was Salomons friend, and one hundred forty three yeeres and eight months after the building of his most beautifull Temple. Now wee know by Virgil, from whom all these glorious tales of Troy are told, that Carthage was in building by the same Dido at such time as Aeneas came from Troies ouerthrow, through the Seas of his manifold aduentures. If this testimo-

nie of Iosephus be true, then falls Troies destruction about the twentieth yeere of Iouis raigne ouer Iudah, which was the yeere of the worlds creation 3143. wherunto if we adde one hundred and twenty yeeres for the foure descents before specified, then will Brutes conquest of this Iland fall with the twelfth of Iothams raigne in the Kingdom of Iudah, which meets with the yeere of the worlds continuance 3263. And so hath he againe lost of his antiquity no lesse then 375. yeeres.

(22) And yet to make a deeper breach into Brutes storie, and to set the time, in a point so vncertaine, as from which neither circle nor line can be true drawn; Manethon the Historian Priest of Egypt, in his second booke cited by Iosephus, affirmeth that the Israelites departure from Egypt was almost a thousand yeeres before the warres of Troy. If this be so (as it seemeth Iosephus alloweth it so) and one hundred and twenty yeeres more added, for the foure descents above mentioned, the number will fall about the yeere of the worlds creation 3630. long after the death of Alexander the Great, and Greeke Monarch. By which account the great supposed antiquity of Brute, is now lessened by seuen hundred fiftie and two yeeres; and the time so fantelized betwixt his and *Cæsar*s entrance, that two hundred forty six yeeres only remaine: a time by much too short for seuentie two Princes, which successiuelly are said to raigne each after others, and from Brute to Cæsar recorded to haue swaied the regall Scepter of this Iland.

(23) But vnto these obiections I know the answer will be ready; namely, the diuersities of Scriptures account, being so fundrie and different, that the storie of Brute cannot thereby bee touched, but still standeth firme vpon it selfe. Indeed I must confesse, that from the first Creation, to the yeere of mans Redemption, the learned Hebrewes, Greekes, and Latines, differ much, and that not only each from others, but euen among themselves so farre, that there can be no indifferent reconciliation made, as by these seuerall computations may be seene, as followeth:

Hebrewes:	Baal Seder-Holem	3518.
	Talmudistes	3784.
	New Rabbins	3760.
	Rabbi Nahfson	3740.
	Rabbi Leni	3786.
Greekes:	Rabbi Moses Germidif	4058.
	Iosephus	4192.
	Metheodorus	5000.
	Eusebius	5190.
	Theophilus Antioch	5476.
Latines:	Saint Hierome	3941.
	Saint Augustine	3931.
	Isidore	5210.
	Orosius	5190.
	Alphonfus	5984.

And yet do these disagreements helpe little the Obiectors if this be considered, that the maine foundation of these diuersities consisteth chiefly in the first world before the Flood, wherein it is manifest, that the reputed Septuagint addeth to the Hebrew Originall five hundred eighty and six yeeres. And from the Flood to Abrahams birth, is accounted two hundred and five yeeres more then Moses hath. As likewise the like is done in the latter times: for from the Captiuitie of Babylon to the death of Christ, one hundred thirty and seuen yeeres are added, more then the Sunnes course hath measured: so that it seemeth the differences were not great for the times of Heli, Salomon, nor Iudahs Kings, in whose raignes Brute is brought to people and possesse this Iland. But leauing these diuersities, and to come to a certaine, let vs calculate the yeeres of the holy historie according as Functius, Beroaldus, and sundry other Theologicall Chronologers notlogers haue done; who from the Scriptures most fure account, fo tie the ftoies of times together, that like to a golden chaine, the links are faftned each to other, and the whole fo compleat, that a yeere is not mising from the fall of man, vnto the full time of his redemption.

(24) First then from the Creation to the Flood are reckoned yeeres 1656. gathered by a triple account, from the ages, begettings, and deaths of the fathers. The like is thence obserued for foure hundred twentie and feuen yeeres, that is, to the ficutie fifth of Abraham life, wherein God began to tie the times accounts in holier fummets: for Terah, the first recorded Idolater, was the last in honour that had the Sunnes course measured by mans life. And now the bounds of time tie the Promise to Abraham, to bee before the Law foure hundred and thirty yeeres, as the Apostle to the Galatians affirmeth. From the Law to the building of Salomons Temple, and that in the fourth yeere of his raigne, were yeeres foure hundred and eightie: and from that foundation, to his death, were thirtie six yeeres: for his whole raigne was fortie. From his death and Kingdomes diuifion, vnto the burning of that Temple, which was executed in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnezzar King of Babel, were yeeres three hundred and ninetie, as by the daies of Ezekiels siege and sleepe appeareth in the second and fifth verses of his fourth Chapter. From the burning of the Temple, to the end of Judah captivitie, were yeeres fiftie and one, for the whole time of Babels bondage contained feuentie yeeres, as Jeremy 25. 11. whereof nineteene were expired; and fifty one remaining vnto the first yeere of Cyrus their deliuerer, whom the Lord in that regard calleth his anointed 1. say. 45. 1. In the first yeere of whose Monarchie he published an Edict for the returne of the Iewes and new building of their Temple, as in the books of Chronicles and of Ezra is seene. And from this first yeere and proclamation of King Cyrus, vnto the last yeere and death of Christ our Saviour the great yeere of Iubilee, the acceptable time, wherein he trod the winepresse alone; to the finishing of the ceremonies, the taking away of sinne, the reconciling of iniquitie, the bringing in of everlasting righteousness, to the sealing vp of vision and propheticke, and to the appointing of the most holy; were yeeres foure hundred and ninety, as the Prophet Daniel from the Angel Gabriel receiued, and vnto vs hath deliuered Dan. 9. 24. all which added together make the number to be three thousand nine hundred and threescore yeeres. And by this said computation, I haue accounted Brites story, as all others wherein I shall bee occasioned to speake.

(25) Lastly, if from among these misty cloudes of ignorance no light can be gotten, and that we will needs haue our descents from the Troians; may we not then more truly deriue our blood from them through the Romanes, who for the space of foure hundred threescore and six yeeres were planted amongst vs? in which continuance it is most certaine, they tooke of our women to be their wiues, and gaue their women to be wiues vnto vs, seeing that some of their Emperors did the like themselves, and from whose blood, faith Beda, the Britaines Ambrosius lineally descended. And if beauty and parts be the instigators vnto loue, as in the first world wee see it was, no doubt then the features of the Britains were mouing Angels vnto the Romanes, whose faces euen in those times were accounted to be angelicall, and whole personages as yet, are respected as the best (if not better) then any other in the world. But that the Romanes themselves descended from the Troians, or Aeneas should be the roote of the Julian family, how fouler the fictions of Poets as a spring tide haue flowed from the fulnesse of their penne, yet Tacitus their best writer accounteth those things not far vnlike to old fables, wherein he iudgeth that Nero to win credit before the Consuls, and to get reputation in the glory of eloquence vnderooke the pleading of the Iliens cause, declaring the Romanes descent from Troy: and the Iulij from the loines of Aeneas, which notwithstanding he censurcth as a fable. And Iosephus in the dispersion of Noahs sonnes and families, affirmeth that Romus was the Originall of the old Romanes and he of Chus and Cham, if he meane as he speaketh. To conclude; (by what destiny I know not) nations desire their originals from the Troians; yet certaine it is, that no honor from them can be brought, whose city and fame stood but for fix descents, as vnder the raignes of Dardanus, Erichonius, Troos, Iliou, Laomedon, and Priamus, during which time they were thrice vanquished; twice by Hercules in the daies of Laomedon, and the third time raled by the rage of the Grecians in the raigne of King Priamus, and the Troians themselves made as it were the scum of a conquered people. And therefore as France hath cast off their Franco King Priamus his sonne, Scotland their Scotia King Pharaos daughter, Denmarke their Danus, Ireland their Hiberus, and other Countries their Demi-gods; so let BRITAINES likewise with them disclaime their BRUTE, that bringeth no honour to fo renowned a Nation, but rather cloudeth their glorie in the murders of his parents, and imbateth their descents, as sprung from Venus that lasciuious Adulteresse.

Britaines may more truly deriue their descent from Troy by the Romanes. Britaine tooke the wiues of the Romanes, and they of the Britaines. Beda hist. Anglie. lib. 1. cap. 16. Gen. 6. 1.

ueth a doubt. They died their bodies (faith he) with woad; but whether to make a gallant shew, or for what other cause else is vncertaine. And yet Herodian here in absolutely determineth, where hee faith, that the Brittaines knew no vse of garments at all, but about their waistes and neckes wore chaimes of iron; supposing them a goodly ornament, and a prooffe of their wealth: and their bare bodies they marked with sundry pictures representing all manner of liuing creatures, and therefore they would not be clad, for hiding the gay paintings of their bodies: To which painting Pliny also agreeth, and describeth that hearbe woad; to bee like to the Plantaine in Gallia, naming it Glastrum, with the iuice whereof (faith he) the women of Britaine, as well wiues as young women, anoint and die their bodies all ouer, resembling by that tincture the colour of the Ethiopians, in which manner they vie at solleenne feasts and sacrifices to goe all naked. And Dio Nicæus out of the epitome of Xiphilinus, faith, that the custome of that Nation was, to abide in tents all naked and vnshod. Notwithstanding, Cesar doth elsewhere report, that they clad themselves in leather, which perchance is meant of the cuillier sort of them, and in time of battle. Solinus likewise speaking of the Brittaines, faith, their Country is peopled partly with Barbarians, who by meanes of artificiall incisions of sundry formes, haue from their childhood diuers shapes of beards incorporate vpon them; and hauing their markes deeply imprinted within their bodies, looke how their growth for stature; so doe these pictured characters likewise increase. Neither do these sauage Nations repute any thing a greater testimonie of their patience, then by such durable skarres to caule their limmes drinke in much painting and colour. These skarres by Tertullian are termed Britannorum signata, The Brittaines markes. And vnto this skie-colour, or blewish dyings, it seemeth Marcial had relation in his praises of Lady Claudia:

Claudia ceruleis cum sit Rufina Britannis,
Edita cur Latie pectora plebis habet?
Sith Claudia comes of Aurdre Britaines race, Whence comes her minde fo deckt with Roman grace?
And of this vse of painting, as our great Antiquarie iudgeth, both the Brittaines had their primitive deriuation, and the Picts (a branch of British race) a long time after, for that their accustomed manner, were called Picti by the Romanes, that is, the painted people.

(3) The haire of their heads, faith Cesar, they let grow, and wore long, which naturally was curled, and of colour yellow, (as in the Panegyricke Oration ascribed to Maximianus, and spoken in praise of Maximianus, is to be seene) all other parts of their bodies being shauen, fauing only the head and vpper lippe. Yet their complexions were much different, as by Tacitus wee see, who auoucheth that some of those Ilanders were red of haire, as the Caledonians in the Northern Promontories; the haire of the Silures coloured and curled, like to the old Spaniards; and those nearest vnto Gallia resembled their complexions, though not altogether so yellow, faith Strabo. But their wit by Tacitus is preferred before them, and their statures more talk as Strabo affirmeth, whose lineaments shewed a good making of body, and measurable proportion in all parts answerable. Their women faire, and of exceeding good features, as is described by the Romane Writers. Such was Bonduca, faith Xiphilinus; Claudia and Helena, faith Martialis and Eutropius.

(4) That the strength of nature wrought long in the Brittaines, we read out of Plutarch, who reporteth that the people liued one hundred and twenty yeeres, for that, faith he, their cold and frozen Country kept in their naturall heat: whose conditions by Diodorus Siculus are commended to be plaine and vpright, farre from the wilnesse and craft of the Romanes. And by Strabo their dispositions are partly resembled to the Gauls, but yet somewhat more rude and plaine; and those most ciuill, who were the inhabitants of Kent, by reason of their oftner conuersing with other Nat-ons, as Cesar sheweth. But the farther from the continent, the more rude, and lesse acquainted with other kind of riches besides cattell, as Pomponius Mela affirmeth.

(5) Now touching their domestick matters. Their buildings were many, and like to them of the Gauls, faith Iulius Cesar; notwithstanding they giue the name of Ternes to certain comberse woods, which they haue fortified with rampires and ditches, whither they retreat, and resort to escape the inuasions of their enemies. Which stand them in good stead, faith Strabo: for when they haue by felling of trees, mounted, and fenced therewith a spacious round plot of ground; there they build for themselves houses and cottages, and for their cattell fet vp stalls and folds, but those for the present vie onely; and not for long continuance. Which as Diodorus Siculus faith were usually thacked with reeds; but the cities without walls, and the country without townes, as Dion describeth the Calidoniens and Maets.

(6) Their wines were ten or twelue a peece, as Cesar hath alledged, which they held common among brothers and parents, yet the issue reputed his, who first married the mother when she was a maide: and Dio indeed affirmeth no less, adding withall, that the children thus begotten, were fostered and brought vp in common among them. And Eusebius likewise testifieth, that many Brittaines together kept one wife in common to them all. This community in marriage moued Iulia the Emperesse of Senerus, to twite the wife of Argetaceus, that the fashion of the women of Britaine in accompanying with men, was very impudent; to whom the replied and said, we Britissh women do indeed herein differ from your Roman Ladies; for wee satisfie our appetite, by accompanying with the worthiest men, and that openly, but you with euery base fellow, in a corner.

(7) For their diet; it was a heinous matter with them to eat either Hen, Hare, or Goose, faith Cesar, which notwithstanding they bred for their pleasures; neither fed daintily at full and rich tables, as Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, but rather in necessity could liue vpon barkes and roots of trees, and with a kind of meat no bigger then a beane, after which for a good time they did neither hunger nor thirst, faith Dio Nicæus: who likewise testifieth that the Brittaines, did till no ground, neither eat fish, though their riuers thereof be plencouly stored, but liue vpon prey, venison, and fruits: to which also Cesar addeth milke, whereof (faith Strabo), they had not then skill to make cheefe. And according to Solinus, their vsual drinke was made of barley. But for tillage Pliny seemeth to contradict Dio, affirming that the Brittaines manured their grounds with Marle in stead of dung, which argueth no such simplicity in gardening, planting, and in other like points of husbandry as Strabo doth take them with. And this foresaid temperance of diet differeth much from that, which Saint Hierome chargeth their neighbors the Anthropophagi of Ireland, who vied to feed on the buttocks of boies, and womens paps, as their most dainty and delicate dish.

(8) For their religion, or rather diabolical superstition, was as the rest of the world, (some few excepted) when Satan had clouded the truth of Gods doctrine, by the foggy mists of confused darknesse. For Tacitus makes their superstitious, and ceremonies to be the same in conformity with the Gauls. And what that was, Dio Cassius in his Nero, and Solinus in his history, doe declare; who doe ascribe to them the most inhumane offering of mans flesh in their sacrifices. And besides their ancient Idols, such as Dis, Iupiter, Apollo, Diana, and the like, they worshipped Andates for their Goddesse of Victory, vnto all which they performed no small adornings and honors, imputing their prosperities vnto them: vnto whom also they erected temples with such magnificence as they then had; whose walles, as it seemeth, long after remained, whereon some of those prophane portraiture with deformed lineaments were seene by mournfull Ch-

The Druides determine almost all controuersies.

Excommunication of great force in the time of the ancient Britains.

Among the Druides one Primate and chiefe over the rest.

They assemble once a yeere at a place in France to treat controuersies.

Here appeareth that Academies were then amongst the Britains, and from their example deriued into other countries. They are exempted from war.

Their scholars will learne a great many verses by heart.

They vse the Greek letters in their skill should be too common.

Their Theologie is, that the foule dieth not, but des, carrying a sterne and grim countenance, after the wonted heathenlike manner: here we see (saith he) upon these desert walles, the ugly features of the Britains Idols, meere diabolical, and in number almost exceeding those of Egypt. So by Tacitus they are noted with the common custome of the Gentiles, which was that they fought for the direction of their Gods by the looking into the entralls of Beasts, yea and of men too; and that they honored the Altars of their Gods with the sacrifice and blood of such as they tooke captiue in wars. And Plinie writing of Magick, faith, that in his daies the art thereof in Britaine was highly honored, and all the people thereunto so much deuoted, yea and with all such complements of ceremonies in the same to be performed, that a man would thinke the Perfians had learned all their Magick skill from them. Priests and instructors had they, whereof the chiefe were called Druides, whose office was imploied about holy things, faith Cesar, for they had the managing of publicke and priuate sacrifices, and to interpret and discusse matters of religion. Vnto them doe resort great numbers of young men to learne at their hands, and they be had in great reuerence. For they determine almost all controuersies, and matters in variance, as well publicke as priuate. And if there happen any thing to be done amisse, if there be any further committed, if there rise any controuersie concerning inheritance or bounds of lands, they take the matter into their power, and award either recompence or penalties in the case. And if there be any, be he priuate person, or be it corporation, that will not stand to their iudgement, they interdict him, which punishment among them is held most grieuous. They that are so excommunicated are accounted in the number of the wicked and vngracious: all men shun them, all men eschue their company and communication, left by conuening with them, they should defile themselves and recieue harme. If they demand law, they may not haue it: neither may they enioy any place of honor. Ouer all these Druides there is one Primate, which hath chiefe authority ouer them. When he is dead if there be any of the rest that excellen in worthinesse, he succedeth: or if there be any equal, he is chosen by voices of the rest, and diuers times they strue for the souerainty by force of armes.

These men at a certaine season of the yeere, in the borders of the Carantes (whose country is counted the middle of all Gallia) do sit together in a place hallowed, whereunto resort from all sides all such as haue any controuersies: and looke what is decreed and iudged by them, that they stand vnto. This order of discipline is thought to haue had beginning in Britaine, and from thence to haue been brought into Gallia. And at this day, they that are desirous to attaine this skill more exactly, do commonly repaire thither to learne it. These Druides customably are exempted from the wars, neither do they pay taxes and tallages with other folke: for they are priuiledged as from the warres, so from all other burthens. Allured with so great rewards, many euen of their owne accord, do register themselves in that order, and diuers are sent thither by their parents and kinsfolke. Where they are reported to learne a great number of verses by heart. Whereof it cometh to passe, that diuers continue twenty yeeres in learning. Neither do they thinke it lawfull to put them in writing, whereas in all other things, for their accounts, as well publicke as priuate, they vse the Greek letters.

This order they seeme (in mine opinion) faith he, to haue taken for two considerations: partly because they will not haue their discipline published among the common people; and partly because they will not that they which shall learne, trusting too much to their bookes, should haue the lesse regard of remembrance: in that it hapneth well nere to most men, that vpon trust of the helpe of their bookes, they are lacker in learning things by heart, and lesse care to beare them in mind. This is one of the chiefe things that they labour most to beate into mens minds, that the Soules die not, but do after death passe from one to another: and hereby they thinke men should be most stirred vnto vertue, when the feare of death is nothing regarded. Also they dispurse many other things: as of the starres, and of their mouings: of the bignesse of the world, and the earth: of the nature of things: of the strength and power of the goddes immortal: and do therein instruct the youth. Vnto these Druides and their doctrine had Lucan the Poet relation in his first booke towards the end, where he writeth thus of them.

Faciès errore suo, quos ille timorum

In English thus.

You (Druides) free from wars, with barbarous devices

(9) These Druides being meere barbarous, as most of the Western parts of the world then were, liued priuately to themselves with scarce any commerce, or entercourse with any other nation: neither indeed were much known to forraigne people, for a long time. For the first notice of them extant, was by Polybius the Greek writer, that accompanied Scipio in his warres, about the yeere of the worlds creation 3720. and two hundred and nine, before the birth of our Saviour Christ. Which Author nameth their Iland to be plenteously stored with Tynne: but of other things therein is silent, saying that all those parts which lay betwixt Tanaus and Narbor bending Northward in his daies were vnknown and vnertaine, and therefore the reporters of them he held as dreamers. So doth Maister Camden another Polybius, & no way his inferior, account it a prodigall humor of credulity, to be perfwaded that Himilco, from the state of Carthage sent to discouer the coasts of Europe, in the said expedition entred this Iland: or that Hannibal should war in this Iland, because Polybius in the Ecliques of his tenth booke faith that he was inclosed within the streits of Britaine, which place is mistaken for the Strait in Italy: or that Alexander came from the East Indians, to Gades, and from thence into Britaine, though Cedrenus say so, seeing all other writers are against it; or that Vlysses, (ancient enough if he be that Elishah the sonne of Iuanan, the fourth sonne of Israhel) should visit Britaine in his trauels, whereof Broddus maketh doubt; though Solinus report that an Altar in Caledonia was erected, and Vlysses in Greeke letters thereon inscribed. Which might very well be: for who doubteth but that the Greekes, in their vaine deuotions, did both build and sacrifice vnto their Gods, which they made of their worst men? and fith Vlysses, (in regard of his farre sea-trauels) was had in speciall account among all navigators, why might not such monuments be reared, and his name inscribed, as farre as the Greeks trauelled, though his person neuer came there?

The first Romane coynes with

ent times, as that neither Thucydides nor Herodotus made mention of them: yea and with much adoe at last were heard of by the Greeks themselves: as Tophus affirmeth; And if the Gaules and Spaniards, (inhabitants in the continent) for many yeeres together were utterly vnknown to the worlds historiographers; shall we then thinke, that this remote Iland, and people then far from ciuility, were noted forth with marks of more certainty? surely to my seeming, nothing lesse: seeing that their next neighbours the Gaules knew not so much as what manner of men they were: none resorting thither, except some few merchants, and they no further, then vpon the sea coasts, neither able to describe the bignesse of the Iland, the puissance of the inhabitants, their order for war, the lawes that they vied, the customes of the people, nor their hauens for the receipt of ships; all which Cesar by diligent inquiry sought after, but could find no satisfaction till he had sent some purpously to search it out.

(10) Neither is this their want of knowledge to be wondered at, seeing the entercourse of their traffick was vpheld by so meane commodities: for Strabo faith, that their merchandizing chiefly consisted in lucry Boxes, Sheeres, Onches, Bits, and Bridles, Wreaths & Chains, with other conceits made of Amber and Glaffe; for which notwithstanding they were compelled to pay customes and imposts vnto Officiarij Augustus, as elsewhere shall be shewed.

(11) And as their commodities were very meane, so were their meanes either for exportation or importation very slender in those times; I meane their shipping. It is true, that some are of opinion, that Ships were first inuented in these our Seas: but that this should be true, I haue cause to doubt, that Art being long before inspired by God himselfe into the heart of Noah for making the Arke, and no doubt practised by that paterne of many others. But that the ancient Britaines had ships of reasonable vse, though of simple Art, Cesar testifieth, saying, that the keeles and ribs of their ships were of light wood, and covered ouer with leather: which kinde the now-Britaines call Corraghs: and with them (saith Polybius) they did saile betwixt Britannie and Ireland, (which sea for roughnesse and danger may be compared with any other whatsoeuer) though the bulke of their vessels were but of some flexible wood, covered with the hides of Buffles: and as long as they were sailing, so long did they obtaine from meat: whereby it seemeth they neuer failed any great Iourneys. And of this their shipping Plinie also speaketh, and Lucan singeth, thus:

*Primum cana salix, madefacta vimine paruum
Texitur in puppim, celsaq; induta iuuenco, Vexoris patiens tumidum super emicat annem:
Sic Venetus stagnante Pado, subiq; Britannus, Nauigat Oceano.*

At first, of hoary fallowes wreathed boughs, the ships
Small bulke is trimly twilt, and clad in bullocks hide:
Then, patient to be rud, or swelling waues he ships.
Thus on the spacious Pado the Venice Merchants glide,
And Britaine Pilots saile on surge of Ocean wide.

But after-times brought the Britaines to more exquisite skill in nauall affaires, in such as the royall Nauie of this Kingdome hath beene reputed (and so is at this day) not only the inuincible walles of our owne, but the incredible terror of all other Kingdoms, which haue or shall enuy our happie peace: and the adventures likewise of Merchants, and the skill of our Seamen, hath left no corner of the world vnsearcht.

(12) And their traffick amongst themselves was not of much worth, in that, as Cesar faith, the Coines which they had were either of brasse, or else iron rings fixed at a certaine weight, which they vsed for their monies. Of which kinde some haue auerred they haue scene found and lately taken vp in little cruises or pitchers of earth. But as times grew more ciuill, and trafficke more frequent, they shortly after stamped both silver and gold; and thereon the faces of their Kings, euen in the daies of Iulius Cesar, who was the first that had his owne stamp on the Romane Coynes. Many of these are amongst vs remaining, whereof I haue inserted some few, as in their due places shall follow, which I receiued from the liberal hand of that most learned Knight, and worthy floror of Antiquities Sir Robert Cotton of Cumington. These Coynes are commonly imbossed outward and shield-like, whereon the inscription, or face, is seen; and the reuerse hollow, and therein their deuiſe set: and by these formes are they known to be the Britains, no other nation stamping the like, except some few among the Greeks.

(13) We come lastly, to speake of the manner of their warfare, which Cesar thus describeth. First (saith he) they ride round about all parts of the battell, casting off their darts: and often times with the terrible noise of their horses, and the rattling of their chariot wheels, they amaze the enemy and breake their array. And when they haue wound themselves in among the troopes of horsemen, they leape forth of their waggons, and fight on foot. In the meane while the waggons withdraw themselves somewhat out of the battell, and set their waggons in such order, that if they be ouercharged by the enemy, they may haue speedy and easie recourse vnto them. By meanes whereof they are both as ready to remoue as the horsemen, and as stedfast to stand in the battell as the footmen, and supply both duties in one. And they are come to such perfectnesse by daily practice and exercise, that euen in reepe and falling places they will stop their horses running a full gallop, and guide and turne them in a short roome, & run vpon the vergies, and stand stedfastly vpon the beames, and quickly recover themselves back againe into the waggons.

These would often giue ground to egge their enemies from their maine battell, and then would leape out of their chariots and fight on foot. And they kept also such an order in fighting on horseback, that whether the enemies chafed, or were chafed, they were alwaies in danger. For they neuer fought in great companies together, but scatteringly a great way distant the one from the other, and had itals lying in diuers places one to supply another, hauing euer fresh and lusty men in the rooms of them that were weary. Of this their manner of fight in chariots, Strabo also declareth; and Diodorus Siculus faith that the Britaines liued after the manner of the first age of the world, vſing chariots in their fight, as the report goes of the ancient Greeks at the Troian warres. Pomponius Mela also describing these Britaines, affirmeth that their fight was not only with horsemen and footmen, but also with waggons and chariots, harnessed, and armed at the ends of the axle-trees with hookes and sithes, after the manner of the Gaules; but with appearance of greater courage, as Tacitus faith; as being not yet mollified by long peace. Their strength in field consisteth most of footmen, yet some countries there are (saith he) that war in waggons, the greatest persons guiding the same; and so much doth Iuuenal intimate, who in shew of prophetic but indeed in flattery of the Emperor Domitian, salutes him after this manner.

Or herce Aruſragus from Chariots beame to king.
Dio Nicaeus from Xiphilinus more particularly declarereth their strength; Their horses (saith he) are but little, yet therewithall swift of pace: their footmen also run very speedily, but in their standing are the strongest: their armor are shields, and short speares, in the nether end whereof is fastned a round bell of brasse like vnto a ball, which at the first onset of encounter they shake with great courage, supposing that such a rattling noise doth much amate the enemy. And Herodian faith that their shields were narrow and speares short, wearing swords hanging down their naked loines, hauing neither knowledge nor vse either of corslet or helmet.*

(14) Some haue thought that their women also were not exempted from the wars; but certaine it is that many of that sex were renowned for their valour amongst them. Which made Tacitus to say, it was vsuall

all for the Britains to fight under the conduct of women, (which the Romans found to their smart) nor to make any difference of sexes for government. A more noble pattern whereof, never had any age, then in our late glorious Virgin Queen, (the wonder of her sexe, and of all future ages,) who, as she was inferior to no Prince ever living, for her admirable government in upholding of her kingdoms peace, so was she a match (to say no more) to the proudest monarchs, in her managing of her wars; as (when occasion was offered) she was ready to make good, in her owne roiall person in the field. But besides the use of armes, the ancient British women had another imploiment in the field, which I will only set downe in Tacitus his words, speaking of Paulinus Suetonius his assailing of Anglesey: The British Army (saith he) stood on the shore, thicke of men and munition, and women running up and downe amongst them, like furies, carrying burning firebrands in rusfull attire, and with their haire hanging about their shoulders. The Druides meane while went with their hands lift up to heauen, pouring out prayers and imprecations. The strangeness of which sight so amazed the Roman soldiery, that they stood still like stocks, whiles the other wounded them at their pleasure; till Paulinus encouraged them, and they excited one another, not to be so danted by an army of women and wizards.

(15) In the relations of these things, let no man thinke, that the glory of these ancient and warlike nation of Britains, is any waies disparaged, or made inferior to them that would be more famous, whose beginning haue been as meane, and state as rude, if not more. For let vs consider the Romans so lauish in their owne worths and greatness; who notwithstanding, bring their name and original from Romulus, a bastard by birth, nourished by a beast, educated among a sort of rustick shepherds; and grown to the ripeness of his owne affections, he became ring-leader of a damned crew, that liued by robberies and without lawes: besides the shedding of his naturall brothers blood, as Titus Livie their owne historian witnesseth; and both himselfe and followers, had in such contempt and derision by their neighbour nations, that they both disdained and refused to giue them their daughters in marriage, left in time they also should become lawlesse, vntill that by subtilty and force, they had rauished their virgins, and thereby made them unworthy of other matches. Yet when their after fortunes and successe had mounted them vpon the wings of glory, and seated them on the necks of their subdued neighbors, their Casars would needs be more then mortall, and their pedigrees must lineally be brought from the Gods.

(14) And, to let passe many others, the like may be said of the beginners of the Scythian and Turkish Empires, two golden pillars raised vpon leaden bases, howeouer now, the power of their command, circles three parts of the earth. Nay what more is, that pretious, roiall, and Gods only people, from whom the eternall King of Kings descended, in their offerings made in time of their highest glory, were by the Lord thus commanded to acknowledge and say: *A Syrian was my father, who being ready to perish for hunger, went down into Egypt, and sojourned with a small company. THE GOVERNMENT OF GREAT BRITAIN.

CHAPTER V.

EE come, at length, to speake of the government and politicall estate of the Britains, which doubletse (the times then considered) was as honorable in their rulers, and as manageable in the subiects, as any other nations in these West parts of the world: their temperance, religion, learning, and noble resolution shewing no lesse. But in this point I must craue pardon of our British Heraults, and some learned Antiquaries, if I bring not a lineall succession from Brute, and a monarchicall government in those times of obscurity, through whose mists no Eagles eyes could pierce, before the daies of Geoffrey ap Arthur, as before was touched. And therefore following his counsell, who is best able in these things to giue direction; I will begin the succession of Great Britains Monarchs, at the entrance and person of Iulius Caesar; at which time, it seemeth, by him and other Latine writers (the best Recorders of kingdoms affaires,) this Island was gouerned rather after the manner of an Aristocratick, that is, by certame great Nobles and Potent men, then vnder the command of any One as an absolute Monarch: though herein is a difference, in that in the Aristocratick regiment, the rulers are all Peeres of one Common wealth; whereas here, as many Princes, so many severall Publike weales. For so Caesar himselfe found the state of Britaine to be diuided into Prouinces vnder the names of her inhabitants; and to be ruled by diuers Peeres or petty Kings.

(2) And such a Gouernor was Casibelan, ouer the Trinobantes: Cingetorix, Caruilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, all foure Rulers together in Kent: Comes supposed to be King of the Atrebatij, and to be the same Comius of Arras, whom Caesar imploied to taste and worke the Britains to his subiection. Caractacus the warlike King of the Silures, Galgacus the worthy King of the Caledonians; yea and women also, without exception of sex, held government among them, such as was faithlesse Cartimandua Queen of the Brigantes, and famous Boudicca Queene of the Iceniens. Whereby it seemeth that euery severall Prouince owed seruice and allégeance only to their owne Prince. And as their governments were confined vnto certaine bounds and limites, so were the Inhabitants diuided and distinguished by diuers Names: of whom because we shall haue occasion hereafter often to speak, it shall not therefore be amisse in this place once for all, tablewise to lay downe the same; whereby our narrations may passe vntroubled without more explanations, and the readers mind carried with lesse incombrances. Those ancient names of people, and places for abode, throughout the whole Island, from Ptolemie were as follow.

terer, not conqueror.

Caualacus.

(3) These States ambitiously banding each against others, to raise their owne Prince to a more foueraigne supremacy, and to enlarge their Provinces vpon the borders of the next, were euer ready, the least occasion ministred, faith Pomponius Mela, to enter quarrels, and feldome held amity, or were quiet. This was the cause, as Tacitus tells vs, which brought that pu-issant nation into bondage: and was the only helpe to the Romans victories: for feldome it chanced (faith he) that two or three states met in counsell, and concurred in opinion to repulse the common danger: so that whilst they resisted and fought one by one, all at length were subdued. But this was not at once performed by Iulius Cæsar the first Roman enterer, who (as he faith) rather shewed the place to posterities, then gave them the possession thereof, supposing it his glory sufficient, to haue done what he did. For vnto the daies of Domitian, they held play with the Romans, and that with such valour, that the subduing of some small part of this Iland was accounted by themselves to match the conquests of other mightier countries, and more notes of honour shewed in their publike triumphs for one Britaines misfortune, then vntually was solemnized for whole kingdomes subdued.

(4) That such people possessed, and that many Kings together reigned here in Britaine, Pomponius
Mela doth shew: Britaine (faith he) bringeth forth Nations, and Kings of nations, though they be all without civility and barbarous. And Cæsars intendments being known vnto them, it is said that many of their Cities sent him by their Embassadors profers of submission: whereby appeareth their diuersities of States, whereof only two held promise, and the rest failing was the occasion of his second expedition for Britaine. And Tacitus, speaking of the shipwrack suffered by the Romans in the raigne of Tiberius, faith, that many of their souldiers then distressed and torne, being cast vpon the coasts of Britaine, were by the people curiously released, and by their petty Kings sent backe vnto Germanicus their Generall into Germanie; which Princes or petty Kings, were drawn (as else where he faith) by emulation into many partialities and factions; which was indeed their owne destruction. And by Gildas these were termed cruell Tyrants, taking his authority out of Saint Hierome.

(5) Let thus farre suffice, in general, of these ancient Britains; whose particulars we will further prosecute in the places of their resistances, lest otherwise they should seeme to fight only against themselves.
And therefore so many of these Gouernors, as either yeelded their subiections to the Romans, or stood their opposits till their owne strengths were spent, I will briefly touch, vntill such time as the land was made a Province, by the valour and industry of Iulius Agricola the first Roman that found it an Iland, and left it more ciuill, and in subiection to the Roman Empire; and by the way I will insert some of such ancient Coynes, as among them were then vsed, expressing their names, and places of coy-nage.

He first British Coyne (as is supposed) both by the fashion thereof being shield-like, and Name thereupon inscribed REX COM: denoteth Comius, (if he be a Britaine) King of the Atrebatij in this Iland:
whom some iudge to haue fled thence vnto Cæsar, as a traytor to his Native country; and in Gallia vanquished those parts, that lay coasted against the Whight, wherein (by Ptolemy) the people called likewise the Atrebatij inhabited: ouer whom he receiued the go-uernment by the gift of Cæsar, and was by him im-ployed to worke the Britaines to his obedience. And that he was King of the Atrebatij in Britaine, may be strengthened by that which Cæsar in his second booke of Commentaries affirmeth, where, by his owne knowledge he faith, that one Dunlucius reigned ouer

a great part of Gallia, and some portion of Britaine also: and so likewise this Comius is reported to be of great respect among our Britaines, and able in that country to doe much. Neither is it altogether unlikely, seeing the Britaines distasted his loyalty to Cæsar, and his Ambassage for their subiection, with such dislikes, that they laid violent hands only vpon him, and cast him in prison; vsing no such rigor against the rest of their owne Ambassadors.
Notwithstanding when successe altered, they set him at liberty, and made him their means to pacifie Cæsar.

Other Coynes I haue inserted to such British princes as by their inscriptions are known to be theirs. And whereas some are not yet noted by that honor to the world; I haue vnto such added only blankes, if happily more be reueiled hereafter, and the bowels of the earth deliuer to others, her treasures hid, as formerly (and in these our searching daies) the hath already done.

(2) Casibelan

(2) Casibelan, as the most worthy among the Britains Kings, to withstand the common danger now ready to light vpon them all, by the inualions and wars of the Romans; was by a generall consent chosen their chieftaine, though in times past, he had molested his neighbouring provinces to the enlargement of his owne. Whose signiorities, as Cæsar faith, were seuered from the Cities towards the sea coast by the riuer Thames, about fourescore miles from the same.
He had obtained the gouernment of the Trinobantes, by the slaughter of Imanence, and the expulsion of Mandubrace his sonne, And, with great valour, held opposit to the Romans, vntill the reuolt of his chieft Citie, the Cenimagues, Segontians, Ancalits, Bubroces, Car-sians, and other states, which drew backe, and yeelded to the enemie; his confederates, the foure Kings of Kent, ouerthrowne, his owne towne won, and himselfe forced to yeeld vnto Cæsar, and the land to pay a tribute of 3000. pound yearly to Rome. A British Coyne of gold with the inscription CAS in scattered letters we haue inserted, as also another wheron is stamped the word VIR, supposed to be his, because it is thought to haue bin coined in ancient Verolam, the City of Cassibelan, and that in his daies, before the Romans won it.

(3) Cingetorix: whom Cæsar calleth Kings Caruill: that reigned in Kent, were in-Taximagull: stigated by Casibelan suddain-Segonax: ly to set vpon, and to assault the Roman forces, that lay incamped vpon the sea shore whilst he kept Cæsar occupied further in the mayne: which thing they attempted, but failed of their hoped expectation, their men being slaine, three of them chafed, and Cingetorix the chieft taken cap-tiue. This heauy newes and vnfortunate successe, caused Casibelan to sue vnto Cæsar, and by the means of Comius obtained his peace.

(4) Mandubrace a prince of the Trinobantes, but a traytor to his country; whose father Imanence being slaine by Casibelan, and his owne life likewise fought after, and in danger, fled vnto Cæsar into Gal-lia, and followed his fortunes in the wars; wherein, he was a great spur to Cæsars forwardnesse for Britaine, both to be reuenged vpon the murderer of his father, and to recouer the gouernment of the Trinobantes vsurped by Casibelan: preferring his owne ambitious desire, and the reuenge of one mans death, before the freedom of his native Country, or the deaths of many his countymen, that daily stopped the Romans passage with streames of their blood. He recouering his chieft Citie with the protection of the Romans, yeelded subiection, & forty hostages to Cæsar:

whose example drew others to sell their owne liberty, & to buy many miseries at too deere a rate, and with too late repentance, him doth Beda call Androgorius.

These people or states, seeing the proceedings and happy successe of Cæsar, after the example of the Trinobantes, whose chieft Citie had yeelded him obedience, and were thereby secured, and protected from the harmes of his souldiers, sent him likewise their submissions, and were accepted into subiection: so ready were they to saue their owne stakes, that they left the whole to the hazard of losse, which soone after followed as an overflowing flood, wherein was lastly drenched the whole I-lands liberty.

(6) Cunobeline

(6) Cunobeline (for so vpon his Coyne's his name is instamped) was the son of Theomantius and he the sonne of Lud (as say our Brittish historians, by whom his name is corruptly written Kymbeline) he liued at Rome, and in great fauour with Augustus Caesar the Emperour, by whom he was made Knight, and by his meanes the peace of Britaine was continued without the payment of their Tribute, as Fabian out of Guido de Columna hath gathered. In the fourteenth yeere of his raigne the Day-star of Iacob appeared, and the rod out of Ishai did flourish from the wombe of a Virgin, when the wonderfull Counsellor, the mighty God and Prince of Peace, the Emmanuel with vs was borne at Beth-lehem of his maiden-mother the blessed Virgin Mary, and was made man like vnto vs in all things, sinne only excepted. These were the times that great Kings and Prophets desired to see, but saw them not, when the Wolfe and the Lambe, the Leopard and the Kid, the Calfe and the Lyon fed together for war was not heard of then in the world, but rather their swords were made into mattocks, and their speeres turned into sitches, as the Prophets, Sibyls, and Poets from them haue affirmed. In Rome the temple of Ianus was shut, and in Britaine Cunobeline enioied peace with the rest of the world, and his fame made more famous by the many Coyne's instamped of him, and whose face thereon among all the Brittish Kings was first inscribed, as by these here inserted doth euidently appeare, one with two faces, like vnto Ianus, and foure more with his owne, besides three others wherein is read his name, one of them with a womans head, another with a horse, and the third with a wreath; all these (if not more) are knowne to be his, which sheweth his wealth, his fame, and his ciuill respect. The chiefeft Citie for his princely residence was Camalodunum, now Malden in Essex, wonne by Claudius from the sonnes of Cunobeline, as by the inscription of the Coyne next ensuing appeareth, and wherein many of the Brittish monies also received their impression. This City with the free towne Verulam afterwards felt the heavy hand of mercilesse Boudicca in her reuenge against the Romans, who laid the beauty and gorgeous buildings thereof so leuell with the earth that those walles and mounted turrets neuer since aspired to halfe their wonted heights.

(7) Adrianus the first sonne of Cunobeline, King of the Brittains, by Suetonius his report, vpon some offence was banished the Iland by his father, and with a small traine fled ouer the seas into Belgia; where Caius Caligula was in making his ridiculous expedition against the Ocean. And yeelding himselfe to his protection, added matter to his vaine glorious humors, as of a great victory and conquest; sending the newes thereof to Rome, with an especiall command that his letters should be deliuered in the Temple of Mars, and that in the assembly of a full Senate. It is iudged by learned Cambden that the Roman Coyne aboue prefixed, vpon whose reuerse is inscribed Metropolis Etimij Regis, to be meant of this Adrianus the sonne of Cunobeline, whose Citie Camalodunum, Claudius Caesar the Emperour afterwards wonne, and wherein a temple was built and consecrated vnto him, attended by the Priests Augustals: which heauily burdened the poore estates of the Brittains.

Sueton. in vita Caligulae, lib. 44.

(8) Catacratus another son of Cunobeline, immediately after the death of his father, found himselfe agreed at the Romans, for the retaining of certaine fugitiues the betraiers of their native country; whereof one Bericus was a chiefe, and a great firebrand of Claudius his attempts against the Brittains. This Catacratus maintained resistance against Aulus Plautius the Emperours Deputy, with such noble resolution and warlike encounters, that often he endangered both his person and army. But Fortune and victory attending the Romans, brought at length Catacratus their captiue into bands, with great slaughters of his Brittains, himselfe led shortly after in great triumph through Rome, in honor of Plautius his so fortunate successe. The miseries of others thus made the Romans to mount the chaire of their triumphs; and the chaines of their captiues, the records of their present aspired pride.

But the bordering Dobuni seeing his fall, made their owne standings furer by yeelding themselves subiects to Rome.

Dio calls him Catacratus.

(9) Togodumnus the third sonne of Cunobeline, and successor to Catacratus, prosecuted his countries quarrell with the like boldnesse and resolution as his brother before him had done: & was the only touchstone that gaue Vespasian his lustre, whose interpositions (as Tacitus saith) was the beginning of that greatness whereunto afterwards he aspired. And with such manhood followed the chase of the Romans, that in a bloody battell he ended his life, and brought Plautius their Lieutenant vnto a stand, where straitned in dangers both of place and people, he was forced to send to Claudius the Emperour; whose conceit was then grounded, that in Britaine was greatest glory to be gotten, and therefore came to his assistance in person himselfe, the first since Iulius Caesar that attempted their conquest. His recorded compositions made with Arminius, the marriage of his daughter and building of Gloucester, I leaue to be read out of Geffrey of Monmouth, and to be allowed at the choice of his hearer; only noting that the possession of so faire a land drew the affection and aged person of this Emperour to vndergoe so farre distant and dangerous a iournie, as this of Britaine lay from Rome.

Tacitus in vita Agricola.

(10) Cogidunus a Brittain borne, receiued in pure gift at the hands of the Romans, certain Cities, ouer which he peaceably raignd their King. For when they had conquered the neerest part of this Iland, and reduced it into the forme of a Prouince; according to their ancient policie, it was their custome, (saith Tacitus) to use Kings themselves for instruments of bondage, both in admittance of their authority, and in protecting them against their opposits. Other memoriall of him nonermaineth, but that he is reported to haue reffed euer most faithfull to the Romans, and was of them accordingly esteemed, albeit his owne people bare him no such good will, but rather accounted him and others his like, to be Romes only instruments, and Britaines vipers, that brought in strangers to eat out the home-bred inhabitants, and fettered the freedome of their land, with the heavy chaines of a forein subiection.

(11) Caractacus the most renowned prince of the Silures, in nine yeeres resistance waded through many adventures against the common enemy. For when as the Icenians, Cangi, and Brigantes began to faint and giue ouer, he only with the Ordovices held out with such feruice and fame, that thereby he grew both famous and fearefull to the Romans. But Destinies determining the downfall of Britain, the props that were set to stay it still vp, proued too slender and brake vnder the waight. For this bold Caractacus ouerthrown in battell, his wife, daughter, and brethren taken prisoners, and his forces defeated, committed himselfe to the protection of Cartimandua the Brigantes faithlesse Queene: who by her was deliuered to the Romans; and by P. Ostorius brought to Rome; where beholding the riches and glory of that City, he openly and boldly checked the avarice and ambitious humors of the Romans, who being owners of so great and glorious things, were (notwithstanding) couetous and greedy for the poore possessions of the Britains. And there being led in triumph, with admiration he was beheld of all the spectators, and for his vndanted spirit and magnanimous resolution released of bands, and taken into fauour by Claudius the Emperor. And the Lords of the Senate assembled together made glorious discourses touching Caractacus captiuitie, affirming it to be no lesse honorable then when P. Scipio shewed Syphax vnto the people, and L. Paulus, Perfex, or if any other had exhibited to the view of the people kings vanquished and ouercome. The British Coyne here aboue shewed, by the scattered letters therein inscribed, is by the iudicious obseruers of such ancient monies supposed to be his.

Tacit. Annal.
12. cap. 8.

(12) Venutius, a famous King of the Brigantes, and husband to Cartimandua, (a woman of an high and noble linage, but of a base and vnassisted lust:) finding his bed abused by Vellacatus his seruant and harness-bearer, raised his power against her, and her paramour. With him sided his Brigantes, and the neighbour countries adjoining, whose good will went generally with the lawfull husband, fearing the ambitious authority of a lustfull woman. With her went the Romans, at the command of Didius their Deputie: and these striking battell won the day: yet so, as the war continued to the Romans, the kingdome to Venutius, and the infamy with Cartimandua, both for betraying the pledge of her trust reposed by Caractacus in his distresse, and her truth to Venutius her noble Lord and husband: preferring the licentious pleasures of a vassall, before the bed of chaste marriage, or the nuptiall imbracements of a worthy King, and hath to ages following left her name noted with the scarres of infamy, that time nor continuance shall euer wear away. His ancient coyne is thought to be as thou seest here aboue described.

(13) Prasutagus, King and Queene of the Icenians, a people vnshaken by war, and themselves rich, (as Tacitus reporteth,) the only cause of their ruines, for which the Romans then warred; were brought to destruction vpon this insuing occasion. King Prasutagus dying, by will left Nero his heire (supposing by this means to leaue his state the safer,) together with the protection of his two daughters. These, contrary to trust, were abused and deflowered, the mother Boduo turned out of all, and against all manly ciuility, or womanly (much lesse, princely) respect, contumeliously and despitefully whipped. In the reuenge of which vnassufferable wrongs the so opposed and oppressed the Romans, that at one battell leuenty thousand (or as Dion Cassius saith 80000) of their slaughtered bodies the sacrificed to her dead husbands ghost; and hath left the fame of her proceedings registered, euen by her enemies themselves, to her immortal and neuer dying memory. The strong Cities, Camalodunum, and Verolanium, lanium, she sacked with the rage of mercilesse war; Petilius, Lieutenant of the ninth Legion, she discomfited, Catus the Procurator droue ouer the seas, Posthumus the Campe-master durst not resist her, and all indeed feared the valour of this heroick Lady: whose lawes were not martiall to saue vpon ranfome: whose reuenge was not pacified with yeeldings or submission, nor did she thinke there was blood enough in the Romans to imbrue the altars of her asisting gods, or to wash off the staine of their vnnoble and vnmanly iniuries. But when successe altered; after losse; and valorous resistance, she made an end of her life by poison, left liuing she should see either her owne miſeries in their triumphs, or leaue her remembrance in the records of their lauish and selfe-pleasing historians. Her Coyne of gold we haue here expressed, the forme shield-like, and vpon the embossment thus inscribed: B O D V O.

(14) Arviragus, the valiant British King, whom Humphrey Lluyd confidently affirmeth to be the same man that is called Meurigus, and is said to withstand Claudius in his enterprises for Britaine, vntill a composition of marriage was concluded betwixt the Emperors daughter and himselfe. Notwithstanding by Tuennat it is plaine, that this Arviragus was in his fame in the daies of Domitian, vnto whom the Poet, as a Prophet, would foredoome his happy successe in the dispossession of his gouernment ouer the Britaines, as in these his verses are scene:

*It bodes great honor to thy selfe, some King thou shalt depriue,
Or els Aruiragus from the rule of Britains waile shall driue.*
An ancient British Coyne of silver is here inserted, and a mans head thereon intamped, which is supposed to be his, the letters alluding to neere to his name.

(15) Galgacus, a worthy and most valiant prince of the Caledonians, for vertue, and birth, preferred before any other in the Northern parts of this Iland, and made their Generall against the inuasions of Iulius Agricola, was the last Britaine, that against the Romans stood out: accounting those only happy, which were free from the contagion of that Roman tyranny, and themselves the flower of all the British nobility, that yet had not subiected their necks to their yoke. The resistance which he made was great and warlike, but against the decree of God no man can stand; for the Romans, risen to their greatnesse, bare downe all that withstood them; and in a bloody battaile subdued him, and his forces, making all silent before them where they came, and leauing desolation in the places where they had been. Thus then was the whole Iland subiect to the Roman Emperors, about one hundred thirty and six yeeres after Casars first entrance, and the land that had been ruled by many petty kings, was brought now (as most parts of the world besides were) vnder the gouernment of one absolute Monarch. Griuous, no doubt, was the losse of their liberties, but a greater gain was gotten not many yeeres after; for from the rude and sauage manners of the barbarous, they were reclaimed, and became most ciuill. And he that had giuen their Iland to his Christ, prepared their hearts to receiue him their King; vnto whose subiection also they were motiues to the Romans themselves. Two ancient British Coynes stamped in silver we haue here set downe, attributing them both to this Galgacus of Caledonia. Notwithstanding in these (as in the rest) I must submit my selfe to the more experienced, and the censures of these ancient things to the learned and more iudicious.

(16) These then were the resistors of the Romans proceedings, that rather yeilded their breasts to the sword, then their necks to the yoke of a forein subiection, and made their assaulters more famous in their conquests, and themselves more renowned to following posterities: neither in these relations haue we followed the records of our owne, but the approved testimony of their best writers, who haue deliuered what we haue said, and no doubt felt the like repugnancy of many others, both in the South and North of this Iland, though their names died with their valiant resistance. And as these Britains held the Romans at euen hand the space of one hundred thirty and six yeeres, neither yet then were subdued without themselves, that euer sided with the enemy against themselves, and whose factions made way for the feet of their conquerors, as from Tacitus we haue declared: So their successors the Saxons found as warlike withstanders, till God for Britains finnes had cast downe their strength, whereof more shall follow (Christ asisting) in the due place of their stories, that from the raigne of Yortigerne the scourge of

of his country to Cadwallader the last prince of the Britains, spent their lives in the quarrell of liberty, and hath left their memorials famous for their countries defence.

(17) But the state of kingdoms (how largely so ever extended, or by what humane wisdom strengthened with defence) do find their periods not to exceed much the number of six hundred yeeres, as by common experience among most nations is seen. In these times therefore when the world was shaken with wars, first by the Romans that strove to mount the spires of their intended glory, and were by Gods decree appointed to overrun and afflict the earth, when Kings of people (I say) were enforced to lay the Crowns from their heads at their conquering feet; and free nations loaded with the yokes of their bondage: then was fulfilled the resolution of this question demanded, Alas who shall live when God doth this? And then among the rest, Britaine gave place to necessity with as manlike resistance as did states more stronger, or kingdoms confined with far more larger compass. And Cæsar himselfe bought his entrance with such losse to the Romans that no Emperor after afflicted the like, before aged Claudius, whose opinion was, that thence the remembrance of his succeeding glory should wholly arise.

But when the props of that Empire began for to faile, as nothing can bee firme in this still-wearing world, the Saxons, for their valour a second triumphant nation, began as it were where the Romans left: for besides the continuall possession of their owne country, as in that safe vnpartiall Tacitus doth tell vs; their legions were transported into all parts of the world, and without whom almost no victory was wonne: of whose power and prowess in the expeditions of warre both Dionysius, Arrianus and Seneca, doe speake. To these then likewise if the Britains gave place, their lots came forth with the like price of the rest, and in this Iland they bought their conquests as deere as they had done in any other part of the world. Neither was Britaine subdued by either of these nations, or their inuersion and exchange of policie altered, but with as vnwilling subiection and frames of blood as had been flusht out of the sides of their mightier nations, or by them had bin tamed to follow their triumphal chariots. And more honour attributed to passe these British seas, with more admiration only to see the Iland it selfe, then was vually conceiued of kingdoms more larger, or that lay iacent as farre from Rome. And the conquest of some small parts of Britaine in no small selfe-glory to be inscribed as trophies of their victories vpon their Coynes, and to giue surnames to the Emperors and their sonnes: as shall be shewed, when the age of this history shall be increased with the times of the Romans affaires in this Iland. Free from subiection before the attempts of Cæsar Julius Cæsar by the testimony of Diodorus Siculus, and neuer had yielded to any forrein power, as not prouoked by Diomedes or Heueneus, nor inforced by any to maintain their liberties by the fears of warre. But Cæsar in Gallia thirsting after nouelties, or his conceited humor to purchase renouue, made the sea seeme safe from dangers in passage, and himselfe resolute to venture his person amongst those bold and barbarous Britains: wherein he left no means vnassayed for their conquest and subiection, nor his successors omitted any prouident care to retaine and keepe the land in their possessions, which whilst it stood a province in their obedience was held and accounted the fairest plume in their triumphant Diadem, and the losse thereof (if no more but only in name) as was publickly affirmed, would proue a great detriment to the Empire. This made the Romans to desire it as they did, who besides the great glory they conceiued in the conquest, made it the granary for the western garisons, besides the delicate prouisions for their Emperors owne tables.

And the German Saxons strained in their owne countries through increase of their people, or haply to supply their owne wants, infested with piracies these West parts of the world, and among all others set the sic of their affections vpon this most beautifull Iland, and neuer left their attempts vnassaulted till they set the glorious diadem thereof vpon their owne heads. Changing the name Britannia into Anglia, a terme most fit to expresse that subiect, and pleasing in found as Angelicall like, neither haue themselves proued vnworthy of so rich a possession, that in wars haue maintained, and by voyages made known her fame as far as the sunne hath his beames, or the endlesse Ocean her ebbs and tides. But of these things wee shall haue occasion hereafter.

And now adresse our selues to describe our ancient Britaines, and to shew their true pictures as they are reported. At first rude and vnciuill (I taske them no further then all others then were in the world, some few excepted that were only taught by God) and with the first were reclaimed to a more ciuill respect, both in their apparell and apprehension of literature, whose pictures in the Chapter succeeding we will demonstrate as they are described by Cæsar, Pliny, Dio, Herodian and others; at first altogether naked, cut, and painted as thou seest, afterwards partly clad in imitation of others which frequented their country either for traffick or conquest; in both which manner take them as they are reported to bee by these authours, and impute no liberty in the draught to the workmans best liking, nor thy selfe any whit disparaged to be brought from such parents, which here are set as the pillars spoken of by Iosephus, that after the flood did preferre the inuented science of the celestiall bodies, left time or elements should consume that knowledge or deuoure those rules before demonstrated: So the true portraiture of our ancient progenitors may by these be preferred from the ruins of time & made our motives to be thankful vnto him that hath brought vs forth in these most ciuill times, and not only clad vs with the garments of humanity, but by his spirit hath guided vs vnto a celestiall knowledge.

CHAPTER VII.

He understanding and apprehensions of men clouded in ignorance, are by a Great Philosopher compared to the eyesight of such men, as stand and behold things afarre-off; because both of these, though they apprehend some generall shapes and notices, yet can they not discern of the true proportions and proprieties of their Objects. The like happeneth in the search and suruey, as of all other Nations, so of our owne, of our first beginnings, our antique Customes, behaviours, habits: the true Circumstances whereof are the more difficult to find, in that those things are not onely remote many degrees beyond the kenning of our Eye, (yea so manie Ages from the times wherein we liue,) but are also shadowed and enwrapped in manifold vncertainties and contrarieties, wherewith euen those Writers haue perplexed our way, who vnderooke to be both our Guides and our Lights. Notwithstanding, our purpose being to propose vnto the eye of our now glorious and gorgeous Britaines, some generall draughts of our poore and rude Progenitors, (that as King Agatholes in his chiefe feasts vied onely earthen dishes to put himselfe in minde that his Father was but a Potter, so wee may remember that true British Nobilitie is more in Vertue then in Ancestors,) let vs first see what the principall notes and markes are whereby the perions of those first Britaines were made so remarkable among all other Nations.

(2) These Notes were chiefly three; first, their going naked; secondly, their staining and colouring of their whole Bodies; thirdly, their cutting, pincking and pouncing of their flesh, with garnishments (for so they thought them) of lundry shapes and fashions, as the two first ensuing Icones or Portraitsures doe represent. Touching all which, the reports of Authors are very discrepant: and therefore, sith light is gotten out by collation of flintes, we will essay, whether out of those Writers contradictions (brought to the stroke, and confronted together) we may strike some glimmering light to direct vs how to paint them forth, who so delighted in painting themselves.

(3) First touching their going naked, the authority of Cæsar must ouerway (as being auncientest) the too-generall reports of such others, as seeme to relate that the Britaines generally vied no Couerture, as neglectiue either of weathers iniurie, or of ciuill modesty; for he saith, interiores pleriq; pellibus suis vestiti: the In-land men for the most part were clad with skinned. And yet these Ilanders were the rudest of all the rest, the Kentish and Sea-borders being full of humanity and little differing from the French ciuillite.

So that when Herodian saith, Vestis vsum non cognoscunt, nec induuntur quidem, They neither know the vse of Garments: nor put any on: either he speaks on heardsay, or his large report must bee restrained to some certaine Perions, Times, and Places. And for certaine Persons and Times indeed Pliny somewhat limits it, saying, that their married women, both elder and younger, (coniuuges, matronæ) in certaine festiuals vsed to goe stark naked: so doth Dio also for certaine Places: in their Tents (saith he) they liued naked and vnshod, where he seemeth to allow them some couerture abroad. The like may be supposed in time of Winter or War, where Herodian himselfe saith onely, pleriq; corporis nudi, A great part of their body was bare.

(4) It may seeme hereby, that those Originals of Particular Nations were not much vnlike that first beginning of the vniuersall profectionation of Mankind, when our first Parents innocencie walked in naked simplicitie: the foundations of all things being, as farthest from our sight, so more simple and farre from those artificiall fraudes, which some call Wit and cunning. And though an ancient Father be mistaken, in concealing that by the foure letters of the name of Adam, were signified the foure quarters of the World, (that being an Hebreue name of three letters, and not a Greeke of foure) yet all those Quarters of the World participate somewhat of Adams dispositions; and as all Naturall things retourne by course to that whereof first they were framed, so if Lawes, discipline, and Customes, did not restrain men, they would in time, of themselves reuolue to that first neglectiue condition, and carelesnes of those outward respects whence men are now named Ciuill.

(5) But in our Britaines, three reasons there seeme of this their going vnclad. First, their hardnes, which was partly naturall, and partly acquired by practise of their bodies to durance: of whom Dio records that all of them had an excellent habit in tolerating hunger, cold, and labours, inasmuch as they could endure to abide many daies together in the water up to the chinne without any food at all; that they would lie in the woods on roots and barks of trees; though one kind of food he there mentioneth vnknewne in our times, whereof vsing to make as much as a beane onely, they were not subiect either to hunger or thirst. No maruaile, if those, who would endure this, could endure the want of garments: especially in a soile whereof wee find this Euloge. Tu minimum nec stricta gelu, &c.

Not freezing cold, nor scorching hot thou art; Twixt both thou hold'st the meane and pleasing part.

The like patience we find euen now not onely in the wilder Irish and Virginians, but in rogues and Wanderers of our owne Country, who often pittieless of them-themselves voluntarily deprive their Bodies of this Protection against the Aires offence, to procure pittie of others. And what speake we of these? seeing euen children for Custome, and Women for pride, will suffer their Breasts, and most tender parts of their Body, to be exposed not only to offence of weather, but of modesty also; yea generally, the hands, and faces, being of most subtilst fence, yet by custome are enabled now to endure that, which by the like custome the olde Brittaines endured in their whole Bodies; whereby Plutarch thinks they usually lined so long euen to the age of sixefcore, the externe cold keeping in and augmenting their internall heate.

(6) As abilitie to endure colde, so ignorance (in many) of means to prevent it, may seeme another occasion of these Brittaines nakednes. The Romans (it seemes) in their old Conquists times, and after, had not the skill nor vse of Hats, Breeces, &c. That Britaine abounded with wool and other materials for cloathing, is past all doubt, for which cause, by one Panegyricke, it is named Kiche in Pasturage, which by another is thus explicated, that therein was an infinite multitude of tame cattell both with *V*adders full of milke, and laden with Fleeces to the ground. So then Wool was not wanting, but Will, or Skill, the latter in most likelihood: for, as Strabo saith, that though those Strutting Vadders yielded great store of milke, yet some of them had not skill to make cheefe, and hauing to rich grounds, yet had not the art of tillage, so their sheepe might haue such heavy fleeces, yet some of their Owners no cunning to keepe themselves warme therewith. Some of them, I say; for otherwise, as Pliny, touching Tillage, giues light to Strabo, witnessing, that others of them were so good Husbands as to manure their grounds with Manure, as likewise doth Dioscorides, saying they had skill to make drinke of Barley: so probable is it, that those other who were by Cæsar and Tacitus said to be so like the French in conditions, had also some part of their Art in fitting the Burthen of their Sheepes backs to couer their owne.

(7) The last reason of such their going naked sometimes, was out of an opinion that no cloathing so adorned them, as their painting and damasking of their Bodies, for which cause (saith Herodian) they would not couer themselves, lest then their gay painting should not be seene: but Pomponius Mela makes doubt, whether their thus painting themselves were for ornament or for some other use, which doubt Cæsar seems to resolve, as if the men did it; because it made them looke more terrible in warre.

(8) And thus we are now orderly fallen on the second of those three notes appropriated by Authors to our Brittaines, which is their painting and staining of their Bodies, which appears by Cæsar to haue beene more vniuersally vsed, then going naked, for all the Brittaines (saith he) die their bodies with staining. As Authours differ in the reason of this their painting, (as we shewed) so in the name, perchance also in the substance of that wherewith they stained themselves, and somewhat also in the colour it selfe. The substance Cæsar calles luteum, which yet in vulgar acceptation is thought to be some yellow substance, as Pliny calls luteum out, the yolke of the Egge; Pliny himselfe saith the Frenchmen call it gladium, describing it to be an herbe like Plantayne, which Orisbasius (as learned Cambden sheweth) doth terme Vitrum, in which sense Mela is vnderstood, to say, that they were stained Vitro (and not Vitro) it being generally taken to be Wood, from those ancient times hitherto vsed for the best taine. But for the colour which is made, Cæsar and the rest agree it was Caruleus, blewish or azure, which colour the Cambro-Brittaines doe yet call glace, whence our glasse for windowes (called also vitrum) seemeth by reason of the colour, to haue taken name. Only Pliny leaueth some scruple in saying, that the naked painted women imitated the Æthiopian colour; which must be vnderstood either comparatively, in respect of People white and vn timer, or because blew a farre of hath the appearance of blacke.

this painting, hath beene already shewed out of Isthere, who writes, that they had that name from a word of their owne language, wherein Breeth significeth as much as painted or stained; but whether those other Inhabitants of the more Northerne parts of this Island, called also Picti or painted, had their name vpon the same ground, & whether they were some branch of the British stocke, or of some transmarine Colonie, it is a question not yet decided. Pomponius Latius, and some other, deriue them from Germany, some from the Pictones in France; but Bede, from Soythia, whence saith hee, they are reported to haue come into Ireland in a few long bottomes, and finding no feating there to haue entered into Britaine. Though Bede his authoritie be venerable, yet the learned find reasons to induce them rather to beleuee, that they were the remaines of those ancient Brittaines which either inhabited the North-part of this Island, before the Romanes entrance, or which (vpon their Conquest) fled thither to avoid the Romanish yoke, where the difficulties of the aire & soile protected them from the Romanes ambition and inuasion. Whereto Tacitus well accordeth, saying, that Agricola droue the Romanes Enemies (he means the more vntaichable Brittaines) into those parts, as it were into another Island. And it is thought incredible, that those Enemies of the Romanes, who sent forth against Agricola an Army of thirty thousand strong, and who so vexed Severus, that in one Expedition hee lost twenty thousand of his Romanes, & their Aiders were so vterly extinct, as that none of them remained; but that rather they wonderfully multiplied, being those who afterward much perplexed and ouerran the Roman Province, and to whom (not vnlike) some other, such as Bede mentioneth, did afterward ioine themselves.

(10) If we would adde reasons vnto Authorities, to proue that these Picti were no other then that multiplied offspring of those Brittaines, we could produce their Language, their manners, their kind of Government (all bearing British Resemblance) to con-firme the same. But what neede? since the selfe-manner of painting is an vndoubted marke in the Children representing of what Parents they were borne. That they were painted, Claudian shewes, calling them, The Picti, so truly named, which Isthere well expounds, The Pictish Nation had their name from their Bodie, depainted with the iuice of an herbe growing amongst them. When therefore the Romanes excluded them from their other Provinciall Brittaines, this name (Picti) for distinctions sake was in vse amongst them; before which times, yea and long after, they were knowne to Writers by no other name then Brittaines, and the Romaine Emperor, Commodus, Severus, Balianus, Geta, vpon the Conquests of them, intituled themselves Britannici, British (not Pictish) Conquerors. But after the Romaine tongue had preuailed with the Romaine sword, the Brittaines themselves vsed to name any thing painted by the name of Picti, as may bee gathered out of Vegetius, who saith, that the Brittaines called certaine Shallops, Picti, because their sailes, tackles, and searimers apparell, were coloured blew, the very colour, wherewith their British Picti (as some where they are truly called) vsed to taine themselves. When afterward the Irish Scots had confederated themselves with these against the Romanes, they all beganne by degrees to be more ciuillized: the more Southerly of them being by Ninian the Brittain Conuerter vnto Christ, about the yeere of Grace 430. those other more Northward, by Columbanus Anno 565. by which time, it is likely, that Ciuillitie increasing, their painting and other like ruder Customes were well nigh forgotten, both amongst them, and also amongst those other Brittaines vnder the Romanes Government. In which regard we haue besides those prefixed names, and Patterns of their first and most sauaged times, here added also their Habits, when they beganne to put on, with conditions, a little better cloathing also.

(11) Neither may we thinke that formerly they refused such Apparell, onely to shew this staining and colouring

colouring of their Bodies: for besides it, some other beallishments they had, which they esteemed much more gracefull, then either their painting was, or any Cloathes could be. Which of the Britaines, Solinus thus deliuereth: The Country is in part (note that he makes it not general) inhabited by People barbarous, who by artificial formes of incision haue from their Childhood sinivry shapes of Beasts depouiraied in their bodies, and as their limmes increase in growth, so doth the picture worke together therewith, neither doth these wild People boast of any greater kind of patience, then in bearing long-lasting scarres, where the paine had deeply suncke into their sliced flesh. The very paralell whereof is also by Solone set downe touching our Picts whose bodies sliced and pinked be an artificiall punishment, and suck in the iuice of the slaying herb, carrying the scarres on their pictured limmes, as badges of their Noblenes, thus endamasked. Neither only the shapes of Beasts, but of all other things, were so printed in their flesh; which Herodian takes to be the prime reason, why they edified to goe naked, least they should hide these their pleasing garnishments. Where also by the way may be obserued, since Solinus saith that the barbarous onely vied so to doe, and Herodian, that those who did so, vied therefore to goe naked; that therefore not the Britaines in general, but the most barbarous of them vied to goe naked. And very answerable to Solinus (who elegantly calleth such their figuring of themselves, in scriptis visceribus, a writing on their Bodies), is that of Claudian, Perlegit exanimis Picti moriente figurat, On dying Picts he reads the breathles shapes, as if the beasts loe liuely portraited on them, seemed to lie dead together with the murdered bodies of the Picts.

The vie of their different picturing.

Thir married women.

Their Virgins.

The Men.

The later British women.

(12) By these varieties of picturing, (if some haue not misinformed vs out of their alleaged ancient Authors,) those people do distinguish themselves, that the married women were knowne by hauing pictured on their shoulders, clothes, and knees, the heads of some fierce beasts, as Lions, Gryphens, &c. On their belly, the Sunne spreading his beames: on their Pappes, Moones and Starres &c. On their armes, thighs, and legges, some other fancies of their owne Choice. But for their Virgins, their whole Body was garnished ouer with the shapes of all the fairest kinds of flowers & herbes; which (to speake indifferently) could not but yeeld, though a strange, yet no vnpleasing aspect. Whereas the Men were (as Cæsar speakes) very horrible to be looked on, hauing all their breast & bodie disfigured with vgly Beasts, Serpents, rauenous Birdes, scales and finnes of fishes &c. In which relation yet, this scruple will not easily be removed (if it bee true, that from their childhood their prints encreased with their bodies) how those, who being Virgins had no prints but of herbes and flowers, becoming Wines were so easily transformed either into Beasts or heauenly Creatures.

(13) The later Women, (as you see by the later portraiture,) became farre more modest, that is indeed more womanly; hauing learned that then they openly shew most beauty, when openly they shew not their beautie; much lesse should they expose to the view, that which nature most endeouored to hide, as knowing it least worth the viewing: yea

* Some obserue that women being drowned, naturally swimme with their face and foreparts downward, whereas Mendoe contrary, as if the impression of modesty were not to leaue a Woman euen after death. Agrippa who mentioneth it, reporteth also of some Matrones, so too-modest, that they chose rather to die, then to expose some hidden diseases to their Chirurgians view: A point vnfortunately inserted into his witty booke, in praise of women, which he dedicated to Margaret wife to Maximilian (afterward Emperour): Ince, of womanly bashfulness choosing rather to die, then to haue her thigh cured, which was broken with a fall from a horse. The picture of this British woman here last deportraitied, is framed to that description of the most valient British Lady, Boudicea, of whose braue attempts on the Romans you shall read more hereafter in the 7. Chapter of the Sixt Booke.

(14) Of which Sex, though naturally the weaker, yet in most Writers their remembrances of some, whole Actions both politicke and Warlike haue beene no way inferior to the worthiest Men; as our owne Age hath giuen testimony to the World in another Great Lady of British race, (the offspring of the valiant and louely Meredicke of Wales,) the glorie of whose Raigne and Regall vertues shall bee as lasting as the World. Whole iust, wise, and resolute kind of Governement hath iustified that Custome of our old Britains and Picts, of the former of which Tacitus reports, as Beda doth of the later, that they made no difference of Sexe for the Soueraigne Command, yea and used to warre under the conduct of women. In which respect though their Ordinary sort of women were not imployed in martiall seruices, otherwise then before we shewed in the fourth Chapter, yet because some of the choicest of them haue been so imployed, we haue so deciphered them in their Martiall habit.

(15) For their other habiliments of warre, and the manner thereof, we haue described it in the same 4. Chapter; their figure being (as Diadorus saith) after the fashion of the Heroes in the first age of the World, who fought in Chariots; yet on foote also they were most strong (saith Dio) and also most swift; which makes me maruaile why Strabo should say, they were pedibus male sustulsi, not strongly underprepped: Who also adds that they were (as himselfe obserued at Rome) much taller then the Gaulles, but yet of no very elegant shape and timber: Vising as (Cæsar saith) to wear their haire very long and curling, otherwise shauen all their bodie ouer, except onely the upper lippe. Their weapons (saith Herodian) were narrow shields, and short speares, at the end whereof (saith Dio) was a little bell like a ball, which they shooke at their first encounter in Warre for terror of the Enemy. Swords also had they, but short, hanging at their naked sides; but helmet and cosler they vied none, as esteeming them burdens rather then helps in warre. But about their necks they wore a round circle of Iron (as an ornament no lesse esteemed then gold with other Nations) as also about their waste, whereat they hung their skaines: being doubtlesse, a most warlike Nation, (as their posterity haue euer since proued,) and most desirous to spill blood, wherein yet their Offspring by diuine blessing are now most different from their Antecessors.

THE SVCCCESSION OF THE MONARCHS OF GREAT BRITAIN IN THE TIME OF THE ROMANS, WITH AN HISTORICALL RELATION OF THE LIVES, ACTS, AND GOVERNMENTS OF THEIR EMPEROVS AND LIEUTENANTS:

So farre as toucheth the affaires of this Iland, and so long as it stood a Prouince to that Empire.

Cæsar ten yeeres in Gallia.

Cæsar the first Roman that assailed the Germans.

The next Nation that to the Britains obtained possession, and souerainty of this Iland, were the Romans, and of them Caius Iulius Cæsar the first, what time their State had vndergone all kinds of governments, and now alpired almost to their highest pitch of glory. This Cæsar bearing the office of Questorship in Spain, and naturally disposed for great affaires, was thereto the more incited at the sight of Alexanders portraiture, standing in the temple of Hercules at Gades, where beholding it with great admiration fell into a sudden dislike of himselfe, and (as Alexander in seeing Achilles tombe) with an ambitious, yet honorable emulation, sighed and said: Hast thou at my yeeres achieved the conquest of the whole world, my selfe hitherto hauing done no memorable act? Euer after which he disdaind that his petty charge, and made suite to the Senate to be dismissed, holding that the cloude which ouershadowed his following and (loone after) flowing fortunes. And forthwith returning to Rome obserued euery occasion that might make him gratious in the peoples eyes, hauing the advantage of the time which then was swaied with most dislikes: and entering into many factions, yea and some of them not without suspicion of conspiracy, did notwithstanding so manage his proceedings, that their constructions were euer made honorable, and himselfe the man by all assents that did support the glory of their State; vnto whom offices of high dignities were assigned, which daily increased his credit and power. And in the time of his Consulship, tooke vpon him the government of Gallia, where he remained ten yeeres together, and forbore no occasion for warre, were it neuer so vniuert or dangerous: Inomuch that framing a Bridge of wood ouer the broad and swift riuer Rhene, he entred the country of the Suenians, being the first Roman that assailed the Germans: And thence with victory returning, found his charge the Gauls in quiet: both which fortunes were as spurres to his alpiring minde, and set his thoughts to worke vpon other attempts.

(2) For now intending a voiage into Britaine, he prepared thitherward, as well to enlarge the extent of his ambition and glory, as to satisfy himselfe with the sight and feate of the Iland, as for a further knowledge of those people the inhabitants, after whom he had most diligently inquired, yet by no relation could find content. But his pretence was reuenge against the Britains, for that thence (as himselfe speaketh) the Gauls had receiued most of their supplies against him in all his warres, or as some haue written, for the desire of Pearles that therein plentifully grew, whose beauty and weight he had oft obserued.

But because the summer was almost spent, and that the voiage seemed dangerous through want of knowledge, either for place of entrance, or safety in harbour (for our learned countiman Roger Bacon was doubtlesse in an error, who thinketh that Cæsar set vpon perspective glasses on the coast of France, and thence saw all the ports and creeks in England) he thought good to send one Caius Volusenus a military Tribune in a galley before him, giuing sufficient instructions for so great an enterprise in hand, himselfe drawing towards those parts of Gallia, that lay neereest coasted vnto Britaine, thence expecting his successe.

(3) These things were not so secretly done but that the Britains receiued notice thereof, and therupon some of their priuate States sent Ambassadors with proffers of submission vnder the assurances of their hostages. Which Cæsar accepted and sent back again with liberrall promises, ioining in commiffion with them Comius a king of the Atrebatij (for so he is filled vpon his Coyne) a man well reputed, and respected among the Britains, that he might perswade the rest of the States to embrace Cæsars amitie. In effecting of which businesse, some five daies being spent, Volusenus returned, hauing waded vpon the coasts of Britaine so far, as with safety he might, which was no further then to view it with the eie, his foot not daring to tread the floore replenished with those barbarous people, as it pleased the Romans to terme the Britains: His discouerie and relation gaue small en-

(4) But now composing his affairs in Gallia, and having ready an hundred ships (wanting but two) besides many Gallies also for transporting his army, he looked from the shore, having a good wind, about the third watch of the night, taking order for his horsemen to imbarke with all speed and follow after him; himselfe early in the morning attained the fight of Britaine, whose cliffs he found covered with armed men, and place for entrance so naturally beset and strengthened with steep hills and rocks, that hee there cast anchor, and called to counsell the Legats and Tribunes, declaring unto them the danger of the haven that gave such advantage to their enemy, whose darts from the higher ground might much impech their arriuage, and therefore determined their landing elsewhere.

(5) Their Counsell was no sooner dismissed, but Cæsar both tide and wind fitting him, not foreflowing the occasion, gave signe of remouue, and some eight miles distant came to * a plaine and open shore, and made preparation to land his men. Thither also the Britaines had remouued part of their forces, and so valiantly withstood the enemies, that Cæsar himselfe, though wholly addicted to honor himselfe and his Romans, yet confessed that his army was fore over-laid and terrified with that encounter: and had they not been assisted from the Gallies with an vnusuall kind of Engines, which did beat back the Britaines (vnexpert of that strange manner of assault) from the shore, the Romans had not set foot on British soile, neither durst they then adventure it, vntill the standard-bearer for the tenth legion desperately leapt fourth of the ship with his Eagle, calling on the danted souldiers and asking whether they would dastardly forsake their ensigne and betray it through cowardize to the enemy: which opprobry prouoked them to follow his example, and so they got the shore after an encounter fierce and terrible on both parts, as Cæsar acknowledgeth. But the first of all (euen before the Standard-bearer) who put courage into the Romans and taught them how to deale, was (as testifieth Eutropius) one Scæna a Britaine (who formerly had fled to Cæsar) and guiding foure other souldiers in a boat to a rock nere the shore, where the tide leaving them, his fellows flunke backe in the boat, but hee most boldly defended himselfe from the rocks against the Britains, like a Beare at a stake among a multitude of mastiues, till hauing all his armour broken in peeces and himselfe all wounded with darts, he swamme to the fleet, and begging pardon for his foole-head forwardnesse, Cæsar both forgave him, and rewarded his valour with the honour of a Centurion: and hee did Cæsar afterwards noble seruice at Dyrachium in the ciuill warres. Cæsar confessing, that hee alone saved the fortification against Pompey, at which time his target was shewed to Cæsar, hauing 230. holes pierced in it by the enemy, wherof Iosephus Iscanus that ancient Poet of Excester writeth thus:

Hinc & Scæna satis pars non obscura tumultus
Ciuis, Magnum solus qui mole soluta Obfedit, meliora, stetit pro Cæsare murus.

The Britaine Scæna in ciuill warres well knowne, Besidged the Great, and rampiers overthrowen,
Was Cæsars wall more strong then wall of stone.

The first attempt assaid, that is warranted by any true Record for the conquest of this Iland: which happened in the yeere of the worlds creation 3873. and before the birth of our Sauour Christ, 54.

(6) This enterprise for landing thus achieved, Cæsar charged so fiercely vpon the enemy, that hee put them to flight; but wanting his horsemen to follow the chase, (which as yet were not arrived) he proceeded no further, but encamped his host vpon a great plaine, not farre from the Sea, and not without likelihood thought to be Barham Downe: for so neere lay it vpon the shore, that thence he beheld the dis-perfection and losse of his 18. ships (comming vnder saile with his horsemen to his assistance) through the violence of a storme, and rage of Sea.

(7) In the meane time the Britaines, that after flight had againe recovered head, and in their assemblies aduisedly considered their imminent dangers, concluded their submission for the safest remedie, and to that end sent their second Embassadors vnto Cæsar, with whom Comius before remembered was imploied, whom they had retained in strait prison for Cæsars cause, but now made him a meane to worke their peace; which was granted after some soft and gentle reprooves, with hostages received for performance of Covenants, and resort of their Nobles to Cæsars campe, to yeeld themselves and Cities to his will.

(8) These Britaines, although rude in regard of the Romans, and vnmatchable to them in educated ciuilitie, yet were so skillfull in the affairs of warre, and so ready to discern the least advantage, that they easily perceived the weaknesse of Cæsars power, both in want of horsemen to equal their wagons, wherein chiefly stood the strength and order of their fight, as also of ships for seruice and safety, as occasions should be offered: whereby their mindes touching their promised submission began to wauer, and the matter with better aduice to be pleaded in their assemblies; for that not only these foresaid ships for Cæsars supply were dispersed and hindred, but euen his owne fleet, which lay then in harbour by the rage of winde and sea, (being then spring tide, and the moone in the full) was not only filled with waves, but also their rickings, sailes, and anchoris spoiled or lost, the violent storme so dashing the bulkes one against another, that their bruised bottomes were thereby made vnfit for burden.

(9) This losse was so great, that it is accounted the first of the three aduerser fortunes which euer happened to Cæsar in all his proceedings: and it was so well obserued by the Britaines, that immediately they intended a reuolt, and in Counsell vrged this, as the materiall point that breathed hope and life to their former liberties, condemning themselves as impious if they should refuse to ioine consent with the hea-uens, whose elements had thus farre fought for their freedom and full deliuerance, assuring themselves (if on this advantage they might cut off these new guests) that neuer any afterward would adventure to enter Britannia in hostile manner.

And thereupon they began both to slacke the performance of Covenants, and daily to withdraw themselves from Cæsars Campe, which gaue him iust occasion to suspect wherat they aimed. And to prevent their proceedings hee wisely wrought: for first repairing his Naue with the huls, timber, and tackling of the most bruised ships, with the losse of twelve ships only, the rest were made able to brooke the sea. And providing against the aduantage of the enemy, he sent fourth the seventh Legion for forrage to supplie any occasion.

(10) This Legion taking the coast cleere, and little surmising so sudden a reuolt, fell to the sickle and sibe like haruest labourers, and laid their weapons apart, mistrusting no Enemy. Now the Britaines as forward to put in practise what they had determined, closely had laid themselves in ambush, for thither they knew the enemy would come, a peece of corpe there standing, whereas in all other parts haruest was past: and so hauing these workmen in their danger, suddenly fell vpon them, slaying some, and forcing the rest out of their array, who not knowing the order of their fight, cast themselves in a ring (the best defensiu forme of embattelling) and stood on their guard as they might: but had they not happily beene rescued, Cæsar had lost one whole Legion at that time.

(11) For though this skirmish thus in acting was altogether vnknowne and vnexpected to the rest of the Romans, yet by the rising of the dust, appearing to the Cohorts that warded before their Campe, the fame was mistrusted, which caused Cæsar in all haste to make thitherward with part of his host.

(12) The Britaines thus prevented, seeing more supply to maintain the battle, stood still, without further stroke: and the Romans as much amazed at this sudden attempt, and order of their fight, made a stand, not venturing any further. Which order in fight so often mentioned, and so much admired, in Cæsars words we will declare, the rather because some haue thence collected, that the Britaines were the offspring of the Troians, who with other Eastern Nations only used this kinde of fight in Chariots.

(13) They used (saith he) to ride in wagons against the approach of the enemy, and to circulate them about with a whirling compasse, and rattling noise, each wates casting their darts as they did drue, and euer as they saw advantage would winde themselves in amongst the horse and foot, to breake the array; which done, they would forsake their wagons, and on foot most dangerously assaile the enemy. In the meane while the Wagons would withdraw themselves somewhat out of the battle, and place their wagons in such order, that if their masters were over-charged, they might haue speedy access, and opportunity of retreat, by which means they were euer as quick to mooue as were horsemen, and as stedfast to stand the battle as were the foot, whereby they did supply the duties of both at once, and by daily exercise grew so expert in managing their horses, that running they forcibly downe a steepe hill, they would stop, and turne them in the mid-way: and they would run along the beame, and stand firme vpon the yoke; whence with like facility they would againe returne into their Chariots.

This order Cæsar so well obserued, as that notwithstanding his desire of reuenge, yet wanting his horsemen (as he pretended) wherein consisted the chiefest resistance, hee durst attempt no further on them, but was content to keepe the field without profer of battle.

(14) The Britaines likewise hopelesse of further success at that present, departed without any impeachment, intending to prosecute their cause with a greater and more generall supplie: and thereupon sent messengers to their severall States, with notice of their hopes against so small a power; whose Campe by them if any way might bee vanquished, the purchase of spoile, besides their freed liberties, would requite the paines.

(15) These States, though maintaining ciuill factions amongst themselves, yet seeing the intended danger of this generall enemy, presently assembled a great power, purposing yet once againe to trie the hazard and fortune of warre. Cæsar, whose vigilancy did euer equal his valour, prepared his armie, wherein now only 30. horsemen were present, and those brought to him by Comius the King. The battle ioining continued not long, but that the Britaines gaue backe and fled, whom the Romans pursued as farre as strength indured, and returned with the slaughter of many, burning the Country where they came.

(16) Thus the Britaines once againe vanquished, forthwith sent their third Embassage vnto Cæsar, desiring peace, with promise of quiet subiection; whom he with hard termes now reprooued, and imposed a double number of hostages to be brought him into Gallia, whither he made all possible preparation, for that the Aequinoctium drew neere, doubting his crazed ships would hardly brooke the winter stormes, that usually rage vpon these Seas. And hauing gotten a faire wind, imbarked all his forces about midnight, and so brought most of his fleet safe to the continent. This enterprise so fortunately accomplished, Cæsar by his letters made knowne to the Senate, who decreed and proclaimed to his honour a generall supplication or thanksgiving to their Gods, for the space of twentie daies together, wherein all the Romans, clothed in white garments, and crowned with garlands, went to all the Temples of their Gods, and offered sacrifices for so glorious a victorie.

CESARS SECOND EXPEDITION INTO BRITAIN.

CHAPTER II.

Most of the Britains brake covenants with Cæsar.

CÆsar expecting the performance of Covenants agreed vpon in the treaty of peace with the Britaines, received hostages from two of their Cities onely, and no more: the rest drawing backe, refused his subiection: whereupon intending not to lose so rich a prey, nor to suffer that Sunne to bee eclipsed, whose glory thus farre in his Horizon had ascended, hee appeared some troubles in Gallia, and in the winter season began his preparation to that enterprise. And hauing had experience of his former wants, he furnished himselfe accordingly, and the next spring following drew his forces towards Calis, the shortest cut into Britaine. There committing the charge of Gallia to T. Labienus his Lieutenant, himselfe with five Legions of souldiers, 2000. horsemen, and 800. ships, about going downe of the Sunne looked from the shore, and with a soft Southerne gale were carried into into the streame. But about midnight the winde failing, and their failes becalmed, the tide diuerted their course: so that in the dawning he well perceived his intended place for landing to be paffed.

Scipio Primus some thinke to be Calis, some S. Omers.

Cæsar arriveth

(2) Therefore falling againe with the change of tide, and indeouours of their Oares, about noone the same day hee recovered the shoare, euen in the same place (and that without any fiew of resistance) where he had found best landing the Summer before. There in convenient manner he encamped his host, and by certaine Fugitives got notice of the power and place of the enemy.

Cæsar refitted at the river Stower.

(3) And lest delay should afford them aduantage, he committed the gouernment of his ships at anchor to Qu. Atrius, and his campe on land to the guard of ten Cohorts, besides the strength of three hundred horlemen; and himselfe with the rest about the third watch of the night tooke their march towards the enemy, proceeding with such celeritie, that by the day dawning they were entred twelue miles higher into the Continent: where seeking to paffe a riuer, which is supposed to be the water Stower, the Britaines with their darts and chariots began in most terrible manner to assault the Romans. But being at length by them repulsed, tooke into a wood strongly fortified both by nature and mans industrie. For in the time of their owne disentions they had formerly made this place one of their strongest fortresses, and had cut down many trees, which ouerthwart the waies of entrance they had befloved.

fortresse.

(4) In this they secretly kept, and where they saw aduantage, would by companies fallie out vpon the enemy to their no little annoiance. Whereupon Cæsar commanded the seventh Legion to raise a banke, and to build a Tessudo of boards, couered with raw hides, by which meane the place without much adoe was won, and the Britaines forced to forsake the woods. Whose chafe Cæsar forbade both in regard the day was nere spent, as also that the countrey was altogether vnknown to the Romans. But the next day the pursuit being begun, sudden newes was brought from Qu. Atrius, that most of his ships the night before by a violent tempest were cast on Land, their bulks shaken, their cables broken, and anchors lost. Cæsars experience in like mishaps the Summer before, made him so much more ready to prevent the worst. And therefore recalling his forces, in all haste returned to his Campe, finding the relation too true in their wracke, wherein forty of his ships were quite lost. Wherefore he wrote to Labiens his Lieutenant in Gallia for supply of ships, thence to bee sent in all haste. Then gathering his shipwrights out of the legions, with the ruines of the bruised bulks, he repaired the whole, and now hauing twice felt the dangers of these seas, caused his whole fleet (a strange attempt) to be drawn on land, euen into the midst of the fortifications of his campe, so to secure them from the like mishap, and that one strength might defend both.

Cæsar. Cons. lib. 5.

(5) In which admirable toile ten daies and nights were altogether spent, before hee could returne to the place from whence he came, where now the Britaines through great confluence of people had increased their power, and entred againe their fortresse and wood. The chiefe command of these affaires was committed to Calsibelan, whose coine wee haue here likewise set, a Prince of good repute for feats in warre, whose Seignory was secured from the Cities towards the Sea, by the great and famous riuer Tamisis, and extended into the land full fourescore miles.

This Calsibelan present Gouernour of the Trinobants, had attained to the possession of their chiefe Citie by the slaughter of Immanes their former Ruler (a man well respected, and much lamented after death) whose sonne Mandubrace, a gentleman of great hope, fearing the like danger, by the new established authority of Calsibelan, had made ouer into Gallia, crauing Cæsars assistance to set him in his right.

(6) Calsibelan (if among these authentick Authors the British Writers may be heard) was the brother of King Lud, and in the nonage of his nephewes governed the Trinobants, whose bounds hee fought to enlarge vpon the bordering Countreys of his neighbours, and in his fortunes had so borne himselfe, that he was much maligned, and more feared. But now all their dangers yoked alike in a common perill, they laid aside priuate grudges, and held him the only man to support the strength of their troubled and declining citie, and by a common consent made him General of their warres. The expectation of whose proceedings he long delayed not, but with a fierce and hot encounter did assaile the Romans, and so manfully discharged the parts of his place, that in the sight of the whole Campe Quintus Laberius a militarie Tribune was slain, (in memorie whereof the place as yet, though somewhat corruptly, is called Tul-laber) and Cæsar himselfe professeth he learned many points of martiall policie by their braue and running kinde of encountering.

(7) But his next daies seruice proued not so fortunate; for the Romans hauing learned their owne defects by the former daies experience, laid aside their weightie armour, that with the more facilitie they might both assaile the enemies, and with like nimbleness auoid their furie, they hauing now bestowed their powers disperdely, and scattered their troups into companies, whereby the Romans were still matched with fresh supplies. A policie no doubt of no small consequence, had not destiny determined the fatal subiection of the Britaines, and Fortune now raised the Romans almost to the height of their Monarchie.

(8) For this failing, the Britaines neuer after shewed themselves with any vnited resistance, but hauing lost the day departed, thinking it better to secure euerie priuate by his owne meane, then by a general power to hazard all, as hopelesly any more to vphold that which the heauens (they saw) would haue down. And Calsibelan himselfe despairing of happy successe, drew into his owne territories, keeping with him not about 4. thousand wagons. And fearing the Romans further approach, fortified the riuer Tamisis (then passable onely in one place) with sharpened stakes bound about with lead, and driuen so deepe into the bottom, that Beda and Aster report them so to remaine in their times. All which notwithstanding, the Romans passed with the repulse of their enemies, and Cæsar, who grew now to the height of his honour, marched further into the Continent, and coming forward, was met by Ambassadors from the chiefe Citie of the Trinobants, which first of all the States profered submission, and promised subiection, with this intreatie also, that Mandubrace (who being Cæsars follower, and doubtlesse the contriuer of this submission) might be Gouernour of their Citie.

(9) Cæsar ready to worke vpon such aduantage, seized them at forty hostages, with sufficiency of graine for his whole armie, which with all expedition those Suppliants performed, preferring the satisfaction of their owne discontentments before the common cause of their Native Countrey, thus laid open, and betrayed into the enemies hands; from whose example many other States without stroke yielded to Cæsars command: yea further treacherously shewing vnto him both the power and place of Calsibelans abode, who had now retired himselfe into his owne Citie called Verolam, well fortified both with woods and marsh grounds.

Thither Cæsar came, and with little losse or labour won the place, and many of the miserable Britaines both taken and slain. Calsibelan now despairing of his owne power, farre vnable to match, and much lesse to ouermatch his Enemies, insigated the Gouernours of Kent, being foure in number, Cingetorix, Carulius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, (whom Cæsar termed meth Kings) to raise all their strengths, and suddenly to set vpon the Romans Campe that guarded their ships; which enterprise was accordingly attempted, but with such successe, that the Britaines were on each side slaine, and Cingetorix taken prisoner, the rest sating themselves by flight.

(10) Calsibelan beholding these vnfortunate proceedings, feared the end of vnhappy successe, for hee saw his Countrey wasted, his owne designs defeated, and himselfe forsaken by the traitorous reuolt of many Cities and States on euery side. Therefore as bootlesse to bandy against fortune, he sought to hold his owne with others, and sent Comius King of the Atrebatij to be his meane to Cæsar for peace, which was the willinglier heard and granted, for that he determined to winter in Gallia, his affaires so requiring it.

(11) The conditions were hard, but necessitie must be obeyed: for Cæsar imposed a grievous Tribute to be taxed of the Britaines, of no lesse then three thousand pounds yearly to be paid, and moreover included the safety of Mandubrace, with his Trinobants taken into friendship, and protection of the Romans; & lastly, that these Couenants should be faithfully observed, he commanded hostages for assurance forthwith to be deliuered. These things thus compounded, he tooke the Seas, about the second watch of the night, which then began to equalize the day in length, and safely arrived in the Continent of Gallia; Hauing rather shewed the place to posterities, then deliuered to the Romans the possession thereof, as Tacitus faith, supposing it his glory sufficient to vndergoe a matter so rare and difficult, and at his coming to Rome, to haue presented his British Captiues, whose strangeness of attire and behauiour filled the peoples eyes both with wonder and delight. He offered also in the Temple of Venus genitrix, a Surcoat made all of British pearles, as a Trophy and Spoile of the Ocean. And now his fortunes coming to the highest, the title of perpetuall Dictator (then which the State of Rome could afford nothing greater) sufficed him not, but a King hee will be, and sole gouernour ouer all, though contrarie to the Law and liking of the Romans; whereof in short time grew such heare-burning and hatred, that seventy principal men conspired his death, and after his many dangers of enemies in battles abroad, was in the Senate-house amongst his supposed friends, and in peace (if treachery may be called peace) cruelly murdered, receiving in his body three and twenty wounds, whereof he died, after he had late Emperor only five moneths.

(12) I am not ignorant that the British Writers doe varie from Cæsar in relating these his proceedings, and speake more honourably of their owne resistance then himselfe hath set downe, namely, that by the valour of Calsibelan their King, in his first attempts hee was twice driuen backe without his purpose, and forced to take the Seas, to the great hazard of his ships and men, yea and with the losse of his owne sword, which with great prouesse was wonne from him in a single encounter by Nonion Calsibelans brother. And surely howsoeuer Polydore accounteth their Story new, and Cæsar carrieth himselfe gloriouly in his owne affaires; yet by sundry other renowned writers it seemeth, that the current of his Conquest went nothing so smooth and vntroubled, or with so little losse of the Romans, nor the Britaines liberties forgone by so easie resistance: which may be collected euen out of some covert passages of Cæsars own words, where it appeareth, that hee durst not at sundry times giue the Britaines battle, though they were only harcelled in leather, and his Souldiers were all old Legionaries of long seruice, called for their huge armour, Milites gravis armaturæ, as hauing a helmet, corselet and boots, all of massy brasse or iron, with a large target, a strong two-edged sword, and a great staffe or clubbe headed with an iron pike, which odde notwithstanding had not Calsibelan been vndermined by Mandubrace, and traiterously forsaken (which Cæsar himselfe confesseth) by the Princes which promised him assistance, but euer maligned him, and had now a faire time of reuenge, perhaps Cæsar might haue missed this parcell of his glory. Yet for all these helpees, Lucan faith exprelly of him,

Eutropius faith, He was wearied out and quelled both with the fierce battles of the enemy, and crosses of tempests. Tacitus faith, Hee found out Britannie for the Romans, but could not winne it for them: which was the very cause why (as Dio witnesseth) for twenty yeeres after Cæsars entrance, Britannie kept their owne Kings and their owne lawes, and had no forraigne Prefects to command them. And Beda sheweth, that Cæsar in this Land was both receiued with sharpe and fore fight, and weakened by the losse of his ships, and with the most part of his men at armes. Tacitus also, vying the speech of Caraciliacus to his Souldiers, hath these words: He called (faith he) vpon the names of his Ancestors, which chased Cæsar the Dictator out of the Ile, by whom and by whose valour they were deliuered from Harlots and Tributes, and enioied freely their wives and childrens bodies vndisfild. Againe, in the consultations of the Britaines intending a reuolt, hee allegeth their arguments, whereof one was the sudden departure of Cæsar out of this Island, little better then a flight. With whom Dion Calsius also agreeth, affirming that Cæsar got nothing in Britaine besides the honour and renouew of that voiage, and fight of that Countrey, untilt then vnknown to the Romans. And againe (faith hee) Cæsar departed thence hauing done no memorable act, which caused the Britaines to be secure and careless to provide themselves against his second arriuage. Whereby is apparant (euen by Romane Writers) both the bold resistance that the Britaines made, and the deare subiection that the Romans bought. But in matters so faire past, it is hard for mee to aouuch any thing resolutely, vnlesse I could meet with that aged Britaine whom M. Aper conferred with heere in Britanny (as Quintilian writeth) who aouwed that hee was in the British Campe when they did beat Cæsar from the shoare.

(13) Neither will I urge that for truth, which Authors haue left vs in their reports, concerning the many prodigies before going, and forewarning his death: things rather to be accounted the superfluities of their owne pens, and vaine imagines, euer working vpon accidental euent, and ascribing issued successe to a supernaturall cause. Such conceit had Cæsar of himselfe, that for his fortunes hee would bee stiled amongst the Gods: and his desire to that credulous generation was further strengthened by the appearance of a blazing starre, which moued (no doubt) an ouerlarge opinion of his humane power, and caused his glorie much to surmount it selfe. And therefore left ignorance should any way blemish his immortalicitie, they haue fained the manner of his dying best pleasing to himselfe, and many ominous signes to fore-shew the fame: all which he either lightly desired, or carelesly neglected, as they would haue their Readers beleue.

(14) Such was that of Spurina his diuiner, that forewarned him of great danger, which should not passe the Ides of March. And Suetonius out of Cornelius Balbus reporteth, that in the ancient Monuments of Capua, discovered but few moneths before, was found a Table of brasse, wherein was written the manner of his murder, and the reuenge that should follow: his owne dreames the night before, wherein hee seemed to flie in the clouds, and to shake hands with Iupiter: as also his woe, that thought him stabbed in her armes, and to lie all bloody in her bosome. Besides many other obseruances both of beards and birds, and that in such plentie, that it yielded sufficient matter for Onid the Poet to furnish and fill vpon the latter part of his last booke of Metamorphosis. His feature, qualities and fortunes, are by them thus described: Of personage to be tall, strong, and well limmed, faire, and full faced, with blacke

cies, and bald headed, to cower which he vñually wore the Triumphant Lawrell Garland. He was well learned, and therewithall very eloquent : yet would he be easily reconciled to his enemies, yea and often times seeke the meanes first himselfe. And hee held it no lesse valour to subdue his vntrb, then his enemie ; as likewise in his disfisters hee was of great temper and moderation, insomuch that Seneca writeth of him, that whiles hee was in Britaine, hearing newes of his daughters death (which was lamented as a great losse to the whole State) hee conquered that sorrow as easily and as quickly as hee subdued all them euer he came. And of his other moderatenesse, Cotus (who then held the second place of honour and command in the Armie) writeth, that though Cæsar was then fo great and glorious a Commander, yet hee was fo farre from outward pompe, as that when he came into Britannie hee had only three servants to attend him.

(15) In his enterprises hee was both valiant and fortunate, and is therefore singled out for an Idea or Pateme of an absolute Generall, especially for four military properties very resplendent in him : first, laboriousnesse in his affairs : secondly, courage in his dangers : thirdly, industrious contriving of what he undertooke : fourthly, quicke dispatch in accomplishing what hee had once begun : In all which he proceeded with such successe, that in fiftie severall battles by him fought, hee alwaies prevailed, one only excepted, as both Pliny, Solinus, and others haue recorded. Four times hee was created Consul, and five times entered Rome in triumph, bearing still the stile of Perpetuall Dictator. And therefore with lesse dishonour did nations subiect themselves vnto him ; and this of Britaine with them, whole lot being cast among the hazards of the world, was drawn with an equal chance, as the rest, and yielded their freedoms with as hard conditions, as did Countries of more extent, and Kingdomes of greater account. But most especially the decree of God could not be gaine-stood, who had foretold by his Prophets the rising of these Chittims, and them a meanes to make the metalline image dust.

CHAPTER III.

* From Macedonia, say some.

Cæsar against Antony, Sexton, in uita Augusti.

Cicero against Antonius.

After the death of Cæsar, thus slaine in the Senate, Octavian (the grand-child of Julia Cæsar's sister) whom hee had adopted, and declared his heire, returned vnto Rome from * *Apollo*nia, where hee studied Philosophie, intending to prosecute the reuenge of Cæsar's death ; where falling at oddes with Marcus Antonius a man of great spirit and power, and setting himselfe against Brutus and Cassius, with their Complices, for the murder of his vncl, secretly wrought the friendship of the Citizens, before whose cies also Cæsar's wounds seemed yet to bleed.

(2) These factions thus begun, grew to such height, that in the Senate-house their causes were pleaded, and by the instigation and eloquence of Marcus Tullius Cicero, Antonius was proclaimed enemy to the State : against whom Octavian was sent, with Ensignes of Consul, and title Proprator, being yet not twentie yeeres of age; which duty and office hee so well discharged in the parts of a valiant Capitaine, that Antony was forced out of the field, albeit in this battle the one Consul was slaine, and the other deadly wounded. For which service fo effected, hee entered Rome in triumph, though the glory thereof was much blemished, being obtained but in an intestine and ciuill warre. Marcus Antonius, to recouer himselfe, and make good his cause, ioined friendship with Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, Capitaine of the horse, who together interpolated themselves against Octavian's proceedings ; but by mediation of friends all three were reconciled, and ioiñtly erected that forme of government which thence was named the Triumvirat : for the establishment whereof they had severall iurisdiccions assigned them : to Lepidus, Africa, whereof he was present Governour : to Antony, the Countries as well of Greece as Asia, that lay betwixt the Ionian Sea, entering at the gulfes of Venice, vnto the river Euphrates : and vnto Octavian all these West parts of Europe, amongst which this our Britaine was one.

(3) In these ciuill broiles, and bandings of great men (as Tacitus termeth it) the State of Britaine lay long forgotten, and stood in peaceable termes, Augustus thinking it wisdom (saith he) to reſtraine the infinite desire of enlarging the Romane Empire, whose extent tent was grown to that vast greatnesse, as it seemed euen burdesome vnto it selfe, whereby this remote Island lay overshadowed from their light : whereunto may be added that the presence of Kymbeline the British King (as their historie recordeth) in great fauour with Octavian, was a great furtherance to the peace, euen without payment of the formerly imposed tribute. But yet the truth is (as Dion Cassius hath it) that Octavian desirous in all things to be like vnto Cæsar, seeing their tribute neglected, had intended a voyage towards Britaine ; but hauing left forwards into Gallia, hee had there tidings of the sudden reuolt of the Pannonians, against whom hee diuerted his prepared power, and left his first designement for that time. Notwithstanding, hee still retained the desire of their subiection, and four yeeres after made a second very great preparation thitherward, proceeding with his power againe into Gallia.

(4) The Britains that had felt the force of the Romans, and in regard of their own distractions at home were hopelesse of strength to withstand them, fought the fauor of Augustus by their submission, and to that end sent ouer their Ambassadors, who presenting themselves before him in Gallia Cælica, appealed his wrath, with promise of obedience and full satisfaction for their tributes detained : whereby Cæsar was againe staied, and the Britains taken into fauour and protection. Notwithstanding, the mindes of their Magistrates were so vnconstant, or else the money so hardly drawn from the people, who naturally hated all such obliged seruitudes, hauing euer liued a free Nation (as Aegippus speaketh of them) that they againe failed their payments ; whereat Augustus was sore offended, and the third time prepared his voyage that way, which yet a while was hindered by the reuolt of the Biscayans, and some other Prouinces.

(5) The Britains seeing themselves thus still sought after, sent vnto Cæsar their excuses, with presents to be offered in the Capitoll to the Romane Gods, hauing now learned with the rest of the world to appeale Princes by gifts and rewards, yeelding part of the Island, and swearing him fealtie in the Temple of Mars, and so were registred subiects to the Romane Empire. At which time also they agreed to pay tolles and customes for all wares which they transported into other parts, their merchandize chiefly consisting of woorie boxes, Iron Chaines, and other small trifles of Amber and Glasfe. All which agreements and compositions were afterward so loyally obserued, and the Land fo composed to quietnesse, that one band of soldiers, with a small troope of horse (as Strabo saith) or foure Legions (as Iosephus writeth) were sufficient to containe so great a multitude in a settled forme of obedience.

(6) Ouer the Trinobantes, the greatest and most potent State of the Britains, then reigned the happie Prince Cæsbeline (for so in his Coines yet remaining we finde it) corruptly written Kimbeline, the sonne of Theomantius nephew to Cæsbelan before spoken of, whose abode and principall seat was Camalodunum, as by the reuerse of the said Coines may appeare. This Prince to make his estate more respectable, caused his owne Image to be stamped thereon, after the manner of the Romans, (who now had newlie taken vp that fashion) his payments before consisting for the most part in rings of iron, and plates of brasse, seized at a certaine weight, which vñually passed for currant amongst the Britains, as Cæsar reporteth, and as those rings are yet witnesses, whereof we haue scene some.

This man trained his people to a more ciuill life then formerly had beene accustomed, and enioied peace with the rest of the world, which then stood vñuersally in quiet, as waiting the coming of that Prince of peace, whose going forth had beene from euerlasting, and of whose kingdome there shall be no end : euen Christ the appointed Emmanuel and sonne of the liuing God : so long before expected, and now in the fulnesse of time manifested : at whose birth warre went downe, as Virgil speaketh, or rather to vie the words of the Prophet, when swords were made into mattocks, and speares broke into sithes : And as in the building of Salomons Temple neither noise of axe, nor the sound of hammer was heard : so his bodie being the true Temple, hee came and was incarnate at such time, when the sound of warre did not awake the world, but a calme and quiet peace compassed it, as by the Angels was proclaimed amongst the Tewes, and now was more publickly made known amongst the Gentiles by the shutting of Ianus Temple in Rome. This vñuersall peace was so famous and so admirable, that it found matter for the finest wits amongst the Heathens to enlarge themselves : whereupon Virgil framing the perfections of Iupiter to his daughter, foreteweth the happy successe of her seed, and in what tranquillity they should sit ; when the hands of Mars were thus restrained from fight, as hee thus expresseth :

*Apera tum postis miscet scula bellis :
Cana fides, & Vesta, Remo cum fratre Quirinus
Iura dabunt : diræ ferro, & compagibus arces
Claudentur belli portæ : furor impius intus
Sena sedens super arma, & centum vinctus ahenis
Post tergum nodis, fremet horridus ore cruento.*

Then men shall milder proue : cease shall force warres :
Faith, Gods, and Princes all shall iustly giue :
Warres gaffly gates with bolts and iron barres
Fast shut shall stand : and Mars cashiered shall hide Amongst heapes of rusty armour, where his hands
Bound fast shall be with hundred brasse bands.

And yet further in his Eclog (from the Sibyls, who in all likelihood had it from the diuine Oracles) hee vñeth the very words of the Prophets in speaking of a Maid, and a Child of a new progenie borne and sent downe from heauen, by whom the brassy and iron-like world should cease, and a pure golden age succeed. Thus hee sweetly singeth :

*Vltima Cumæ venit iam carminis ætas :
Magnus ab integro seclorum nascitur ordo :
Iam redit & Virgo : redeunt Saturnia regna :
Iam noua progenies cælo demittitur alto.
Tu modo nascens puer, quo ferrea primum
Definet, ac toto surget gens aurea mundo, &c.*

Now is the time of which Sibylla said,
The old world doth his prime againe renew :
Now hath the world a pure vnspotted Maid :
Now reignes the * God of Gods, whose off-bring new Descends from heauen. Blest be the babe whose raies Hath turn'd our iron age to golden daies.

In which Eclog are sweetly couched many other most diuine allusions to our Sauours * Deity, birth and humanity, poverty, graces, crosses, kingdome, and redemption of the world from sinne, death, and hell.

So likewise Marcus Tullius Cicero saw in his dreame (as himselfe reporteth) a child of an ingenuous and beautifull countenance, let downe from heauen by a golden chaine. And Suetonius in the life of Augustus from Julius Marathus hath obserued, that certaine predictions in Rome happening, were so respected and generally expounded, that Nature was about to bring forth a King that should raigene ouer the whole world. And albeit these and other Heathen Writers ascribe these things either to Augustus himselfe, or to some of his favorites, yet wee see them accomplished in none other but Iesus Christ the Messiah our blessed Sauiour, in whom only the Kingdome of God began, with the vñter subseruion of all their heathenish Oracles, which at his birth, or at furthest at his death, ceased all, and gaue place to HIS eternitie. Which time of his birth by the Scriptures most certaine account, was from the worlds creation, 3927. and is set by the Britains in the fourteenth of their Cæsbelines raigene, and by other authenticke Writers in the two and fortieth of Augustus Cæsar, euen in the top of that Empires greatness, ness, when Rome was with an vniuersall subiection acknowledged the absolute Lady of the known earth. For so in S. Luke wee read, that this Augustus then first taxed the world. A text most strong for the full dissolution of the foure foregone kingdomes represented in Daniels Image, by the fall of this stone Christ, the rocke and stay of our eternall happinesse.

(7) This Emperour raigned in great honour the space of fifty fix yeeres, and was obeyed both by the Easterne Indians, and the Northerne Scythians, with the subiection of the Parthians, a fierce and vntamed people, and generally with the loue of all. Hee was a Prince indued with great wisdom, magnanimitie, and Iustice; yet faulty in this, that he tooke from Tiberius Nero his wife Livia, both great with child, and hauing also formerly borne him a sonne. Deuout hee was in the worship of the Romane Gods; amongst whom in the Capitoll he built an Altar vnto the Hebrew child, with this inscription: The Altar of the first begotten Sonne of God: being thereunto moued by the Oracle of Apollo that had answered his owne destruction by the birth of this child. Of stature he was but low, and of a good complexion; gray-eyed, his haire somewhat yellow, and his body freckled with spots, which as his flatterers would haue the world beleue, were in forme like starres. Preditions foretelling his government and death are alleged, the which I willingly ouerpasse, holding mozt of them rather fantasies then truth. At his death hee demanded of the standers by, whether he had well acted the enterlude of his life vpon the stage of this world: and died foureteene yeeres after Christ his incarnation; leaving after him so honourable an estimation of his glory, that as the succeeding Emperours in remembrance of Iulius Cæsar gloried to be called Cæsars, so they euer held the name of Augustus to be sacred, and only befitting persons destinated to imperiall Maiestie. And both their names were infered into the number of the moneths, that the honour of them both might neuer perish while Times eternitie should endure.

continually insigations that matter was procured: though Suetonius thinketh, it was by Augustus his owne ambitious conceit, to make himselfe the sooner missed, and the more lamented, in leauing his sonne so vnlike him to succeed, whose conditions as they stood vpon their owne basis, hee knew to bee both reprocheable, and also contemptible.

(2) But before the death of Cæsar could be diuulged, to write his imperiall stile as it were in blood, he began with the murder of young Agrippa the sonne of Iulia, daughter to Octavian, and once his owne wife, and continued his raigues with such tyrannie, that many he slaughtred, without respect of person or cause; and in his loosest lasciuiousnesse, thought of nothing but how to subuert the Nobilitie; for rare it was in his daies that any such died a natural death: and maintaining a race of men (Promoters, as Tacitus tearmes them, found out for a common ouerthrow and destruction of others) allured them by rewards to accuse the rich, though guiltlesse; only this fauour granted to the condemned, that if they flew themselves before the day of execution, their bodies should haue buriall, their goods not confiscate, and their testament stand good in law.

(3) A great dissembler he was, seeming euer to hate those vices which in truth he loued, and to love those vertues which he did most deadly hate: and for life and libidinous filthinesse so extreme, that a Christianians pen may not expresse, when the Heathen themselves doe blush to name such things as hee shamed not openly to commit: his publike drunkennesse, and continuall banquettings, whereat hee spent whole daies and nights together without intermission, caused exchange of names from Tiberius Nero to Tiberius Nero.

Mero. Dissolute and careless he was in government, though some haue accounted him a wife and politicke Prince: for the Provinces he left to defend themselves, and yet daily charged them with larger Tributes, to their great impouerishment, and almost vtter ruine.

(4) In this state, amongst others neglected, Britaine stood, wherein Tiberius neither maintained garrison, nor attempted alteration, and whereby (as it may be thought) their owne Lawes and Princes bare sway among themselves, howsoeuer the cause for Tribute was ballized betwixt them. And most certaine it is, the Britaines, if not in subiection, yet were well affected to the Romanes, as appeareth by Tacitus in the kinde entertainments, and in releuering their shipwacked souldiers, that in crossing the Seas were by tempest driuen vpon their Coasts, and courteously sent thence by their petty Kings vnto Germanicus their Generall. Notwithstanding, Jeffrey Monmouth seemeth to affirme the contrary, that bringeth the reign of one Guiderius, and the valour of Arminagus, the sonnes of Cunobeline (of whom more hereafter) to withstand the Romish Command, and vtterly to refuse the payment of Tribute, banding both against Tiberius, as also against Caligula and Claudius the Emperours succeeding.

(5) Other remembrances of these times concerning vs finde we none, besides that which is common to all, namely the death of our Saviour Christ, which vnder this Tyrant, and in his eighteenth yeere was accomplished by the proceeding of his (as wicked) Deputy Pontius Pilate, who both aduoged him to die, and to bee guiltlesse of deserving death: whereby was wrought the myserie of our Redemption, with such signes and euidences of our Deitie, that the wicked Iudge himselfe wrote thereof to Tiberius, and hee to the Senate, to haue him consecrated among the Roman Gods. Which they refused to doe, that the wisdom and diuine power of God in the doctrine of Salvation should not need the allowance and commendation of men, as Eusebius hath well obserued.

(6) Finally, when hee had raigned hated of all men the space of three and twenty yeeres, with no better liking then is read of Ioram King of Iudah, that liued without being desired, hee was smothered to death (as is thought) by Caligula, the fiftenth of the Kalends of April, the yeere from Christs Natinitie thirty nine, and the seuentie and eighth of his owne age. He was of personage tall, and of body strong, broad chested, and vied both his hands alike, faire of complexion, but great and goggle-eyed, whereby hee saw so cleerely as is incredible to report.

CAIUS CALIGVLA.

CHAPTER V.

Caius Caligula
his parents.
Tacit. Annal.
lib. 3. cap. 9.

His prodigallitie.

Ext vnto Tiberius succeeded his nephew Caius Caligula, the sonne of Germanicus, (whose face is expressed aboue) the sonne of Drusus. His mother was Agrippina, the daughter of Iulia, Cæsars wife; liked rather for his fathers vertues, (who was for learning, vertue, valour, and courtesie, the most admired man of that age) then for any parts of his owne answerable to so high a place, as being neither naturally framed for good preface in Throne, nor qualified in minde for an Imperiall Command. Euer in condition opposite to all, and (which is more) most times to himselfe. One while lasciuiously prodigall, in excessive banquetts, admirable Sea-workes, with needlesse leuelling of mountaines, and filling vp their vallies: Another while extremely couetous, imposing taxes vpon the Provinces, and exacting gaines out of the base earnings of pollutions: Alwaies cruell and libidinous. His owne mother he defamed to bee incestuously begotten; his grand-mother he poisoned; his brother Tiberius he murdered; with his three naturall sisters hee liued incestuously, and vpon Drusilla the second (who was contented to be deflowred by him when they were both but children) hee so incredibly doted, that hee vied to sweare by her sacred name, and desired her for a Goddesse by the name of Panthea, commanding diuine honours to bee done vnto her. The like deitie conceited he of himselfe, causing his Statue to be worshipped, and placed in his vniuersall roobes amongst the Romane Gods, and would haue let it in Ierusalem Temple (as Iosephus recordeth) had not that great God cut him off by death. His Imperiall government was without either enlargement of circuit, or enforcing by armes a dutifull subiection, rather seeking to make himselfe himselfe feared by Tyrannie at home, then any waies famous by Acts abroad.

(2) How the other Provinces stood affected, I leaue to themselves; but by Tacitus it should seeme the Britaines and Germans were not his best subjects: for these are his words, that Caius had a meaning to invade Britaine, it is certainly known: but his rash running head, and hasty repentance in his attempts against Germany, turned all to nothing. And Suetonius ascribes the foolish erection of that admirable bridge ouer a creeke of the Sea in Campania (whereof Dion writeth at large) to his vaine-glorious conceit, that by a brute blazed abroad of so huge and monstrous a worke, he might terrifie Germanie and Britaine, vpon which Countries he meant to make warre. The issue whereof was as fruitlesse as his great cost was ridiculous. For hauing set forward for the conquest of Britaine with no small preparation, he proceeded no further then to those parts of Holland that confront against Northfolke, where he suddenly pitched his tents, and staid.

(3) At which time, Adminius the sonne of Cunobelin King of Britaine being banished by his father, fled ouer Sea with a small power, and submitted himselfe vnto Cæsars protection: wherupon Caligula wrote vaunting letters to the Senate, as if the whole Iland had beene yielded into his hands: commanding the messenger that his letters should be carried in a Chariot into the Curia, and not deliuered but in the Temple of Mars, and that in a frequent and full assembly of the Senate. And hauing no further matter to worke vpon, hee caused certaine Germane prisoners secretly to be conueied into a wood, and word to bee brought him in great feare and amazement of the sudden approach of the enemy; against whom with shew of great manhood and noble resolution in all haste and warlike manner he marched, and in chaine openly shewed them as his captiues taken in warre, forbidding the Senators the wonted celebration of their Festis, or to enter their Theaters to take solace, seeing their Cæsar exposed himselfe to so many perils, and fought to great battles with hazard of his life. Last of all, as if he had meant to make a small dispatch for euer of the warre, hee drew his forces downe to the Sea-coast of Belgia, and embattailed his army vpon the Ocean shore; planting his ballists and other Engines of artillerie in their seuerall places, no man witting what hee meant: which done, himselfe in a Galley launched into the Sea, and immediately returning, caused the Trumpets to sound the battle, and commanded his Souldiers forthwith to fall a gathering of cockles and muscles into their helmets, terming them the Spoiles of the conquered Ocean: Against which hee also built a Tower, as a Trophy of his victorie, the ruines whereof as yet remaine in Holland to this day, and is called The Britons house, in memorie of that fantastick seruice: vpon which exploit he made a glorious Oration to his souldiers, commending and requiring their valours with rewards, and auowing their shell-spoiles worthy offerings to be presented in the Capitoll, writing letters to Rome of this his great Conquest, and demanding Triumph, and diuine honours to be assigned him: which when the Senators made some question of, hee threatened them with death. But this Sea-seruice (as it seemeth) so ranne euer after in his minde, that one night hee dreamt that the Sea in dreadfull shape came and expostulated with him, which cast him into an incredible horroir and affright.

(4) In his last yeere of life and raigne, Pontius Pilate, vnder whom Christ Iesus suffered, was apprehended and accused at Rome, deposed and banished to the Towne of Lions in France, where, in despair he slew himselfe in the yeere from Christ his incarnation, forty one, and from his death, the seuenth, as Eusebius hath noted.

(5) And now both the Ambition and crueltie of Caius was growen so intolerably sauage, as that he often lamented that some rare and vnusall disaster (as either some horrible slaughter of huge Armies, or some vniuersall plague, or famine, or fire, or opening of the earth, or ouer-flowing of the Sea) happened not in his time, whereby his raigne might be killed by him at one stroke. But this his will was preuented by a blow on himselfe, his death and downefall being complotted and executed by certain Tribunes, whereof Cherea was chiefe; who following him from the Theater with resolution for the fact, tooke the time when Caligula turning suddenly aside into a narrow Cloister to see certaine boies sent him out of Asia, lost the defense of his fore-warders, and the straitnesse of the place permitted not his guard to follow, on which aduantage Cherea demanded his watch-word, which he (according to his vsual manner) gaue in great disdain and scorn, whereunto Cherea replied, and with his sword wounded him in the necke, and iaw; and then the rest of the Conspirators comming in, with thirty wounds made an end of his life, after hee had most impiously raigned three yeeres and tenne moneths.

(6) He was of stature tall, of complexion pale and wan, of body somewhat grosse and vn-fashionable, his necke and legges exceedingly slender, his eyes sunke into the hollow temples of his forehead, and that also frowning and full of wrinkles: his haire was thin and shaggy, but bald on the crowne, though otherwise so haire of bodie, that all the time of his raigne if a man did but name a Goat, it was held a touch and offense of Laesæ Maiestatis against his imperiall person. His Countenance naturally sterne and grimme, which by composing and gesture he purposely made more vgly and terrible. His apparell alwaies costly, but not alwaies Court-like, neither ciuill: his beard hee wore of gold like Iupiter or Æsculapius. In his hand for a Scepter, a Mace three-tined, as Neptune or God of the Sea, and vpon his body the Curace of Alexander the Great, taken from his Sepulchre and Monument. Hee died aged twenty nine yeeres, whose memory was so hateful vnto all, that all the Copper Coins or Modals stamped with his picture were melted downe by decree of the Senate, whereby (if it were possible) his name and feature might be forgotten vnto future ages.

As the Senate had decreed and determined to reduce the Citie into her ancient libertie, without admission of any Cæsar, or subiection to such absolute and sole authoritie; notwithstanding, the power of this Army, and the vote of the Citie so prevailed, that the election was confirmed, and the Imperiall dignity by him assumed, as the next, and onely man to whom it must of right belong: whose father Drusus was the sonne of Livia, wife to Octavian, to whom the Emperours succeeding held it a glorie to be any waies allied.

(2) In his first proceedings with the Provinces affaires, hee determined warre against the Britaines, whose Tribute had beene a long time neglected, and whose subiection was now to be feared: all of them being raised in a tumultuous vprore. The cause pretended was certaine fugitiues, (the traitors of their State, and liberties) lately departed, and by the Romans receiued with protection of the Emperour: a matter that moued them to great discontents, and serued as a shew for their iust reuolt.

(3) Claudius, as ready to preuent the worst, being thereto further incited by Seneca one of those British fugitiues as Dion reporteth, in the second yeere of his Empire, and from Christ his Natinitie forty five, sent Aulus Plautius a Romane Senator, well experienced in the affaires of warre, to take charge of the Army remaining in Gallia, and with those old trained Souldiers to make ouer into Britaine to retaine their obedience. Which seruice vpon them thus imposed, was generally disliked, as apparently was shewed by their unwillingnesse thitherward, muttering and complaining, that they must now be enforced to make warre out of the world, and protracting time, could hardly bee drawne forward, though the Emperour sent his second command.

(4) But being at last embarked and crossing the Seas, their shippes were beaten with contrary winds, which still added discouragements vnto their proceedings, and had not an accident the same time happened, the edge of their courage had beene more abated: for euen in this distraction suddenly a fiery leame shot it selfe from East to West, the same way that their shippes made faile: which presently gaue hopes to their despairing hearts, being heathenishly interpreted for a signe of good lucke, and so sent from their Gods, whereupon without any resistance, they came to shoare and tooke land.

(5) The Britaines that mistrusted no such sudden inuasion, and now thus surprised vnawares, disperdely secured themselves in woodes and marishes, thereby to detract time, and the more to wearie the Enemy by delays: which thing Plautius well perceiued, and with much labour, and hazard followed so extremely, that many he slew, and tooke prisoner Catagratius their Captaine, the son of Cunobeline but lately deceased, which brought such terror amongst the Britains, that thereupon the BODVNI, the inhabitants of Oxford and Gloucestershires, yielded themselves to Plautius devotion: for which seruice thus effected, the Senate decreed his Triumphs; and it is probable that this defeat of the Britaine forces, and surpris of their King, fell out in the sixth yeere of this Emperours raigne, by the reuerse of his money then minted with

(6) But he following still the Enemy, being seconded by Flavius Vespasian (afterward Emperor) the leader of the second legion (the foundation of whose succeeding fortunes was first laid here in Britaine) gave them againe another overthrow. The chieft menes whereof was a politic they had gotten to gall the Chariot horses, whereby their riders were maimed, and their whole powers disordered: many Britaines in this battaile were slain, and more in danger, had not the night ended the skirmish.

C. Sidius Geta his valour.

(7) The next day the battaile was againe begun and maintained on both parts with equal advantage, till C. Sidius Geta enforced the Britaines to retire, whereby the victory rested in the Romans: for which exploit Triumphall honours were assigned him, although he had not yet attained to the Confular degree. In this Conflict, Vespasian hardly escaped, being fore oppressed by the Enemy, and in such sort, that had not Titus (his renowned sonne) come to rescue, he had beene slain, whose valour afterwards was tried in one and thirtie battailes, and in the Conquest of the Ile of Wight.

The Britains returned to places of advantage.

(8) After this conflict, the Britaines withdrew themselves into places of more advantage, and in the mouth of Thamis neere her fall into the Sea, passed the shallowes and firme grounds in safety, whereas the Romans ignorant of both, brought many into danger, and in their distressed passage, were sharply assailed by the Enemy, in which tumult, a bloody battaile was begunne, wherein Togodunnus a British Prince, brother to Catacratus, and sonne to Cunobeline, was slain: Notwithstanding, the courage of the Britains was not abated, but rather exasperated to a further revenge: for effecting whereof, new forces were gathered, and confluence of people assembled from each part of the Ile, Plautius the Lieutenant seeing daily the increase of their power, Vespasian imploied in other parts, and himselfe streined in a place of danger, proceeded no further, but sent word to the Emperor of the doubtfull estate of their affaires.

Claudius the Emperor commeth into Britain with a great Army.

(9) At that time (saith Suetonius) the Senate had by decree allowed Claudius his Triumphall ornaments. But he supposing that such a bare title of honour was inferior to the Maiesty of an Emperor, and willing of himselfe also to enterprize some exploit whereby hee might winne the glory of a compleat Triumph, made choice before all other Prouinces, of Britaine, attempted by none since Iulius Caesar of famous Memory. And with great strength entered into the journey, having with him a mightie Armie both of horse and foote, as also Elephants, a beast of great bignesse and burthen, whose strangeness then amazed the Britaines, and whose Carcases falling in this Land, their late found bones (no doubt) have bred our error, being supposed to be of men, and not of beasts.

Dion Cassius, lib. 60. Elephants first brought into Britaine.

(10) With very great danger he passed the Seas, and joining strength with his Lieutenant and Vespasian, they all together crossed the River Thamis, where presently they were encountered by the Britaines, who a while maintained the battaile very desperately, but in the end gave place and fled, whom the Romans pursued even to their strong Camulodunn, then the seat of Adunius, Cunobeline sonne, as may aptly be conjectured by the Medall of Britannicus the Emperors darling, figured in the front of this Chapter; which Citie they surprisid and fortified with their owne Garrisons, which the Emperor in the cleuenth of his raigne, as appeareth by the other coine, turned to a Colony of Romane Citizens. Claudius now disarming the Britaines, remitted further punishment either upon their bodies or confiscation of their goods: The which his favourable clemencie moved those distressed Britaines to such liking and love, that they erected a Temple and Altar in his name, and gave him diuine honour, as a God: The rest as vnable to resist, proffered their submissions, and promised a peaceable subjection vnder the Romane gouernement.

His clemencie maketh him to be honoured for a God.

(11) These things thus achieved, at the end of six months Claudius in his ninth year returned and entered Rome in triumph with more then usual manner, stamping againe upon his monies his Arch of victory, as appeareth in the face of this Chapter, a perpetuall trophie of his victories and memory of our seruitude. After whose Triumphall Chariot rode Mesfalina his wife, the Monster of her sexe for impudencie and lasciuious life: and vpon the topp of his Palace he placed a Nauall Coronet in memoriall of the Ocean by him failed ouer, and subdued: withall affirming to himselfe, and sonne, the Surname Britannicus: And honoured Plautius with his presence in his Triumphs for Britaine, giuing him the right hand, ascending the Capitoll, and besides graced diuers Capitaines that serued vnder him in that warre with Triumphall Ornaments. So great an esteeme was held of the Conquest of so small a part of this land.

(12) The British Historians relate these things farre otherwise, reporting that their King Aurragus, the youngest sonne of Kymbeline, withstood Claudius in his enterprise, with whom (say they) he came to composition by giuing him his daughter Genissa in marriage, in memorie whereof, he built the Citie Gloucester, according to his name, which now is called Gloucester: But Suetonius writing the life of Claudius, his wives and children, nameth his daughters onely to be Claudia, Antonia, and Octauia, without mention of Genissa at all, and therefore not likely to haue any such: And Dion Cassius reporteth that Claudius himselfe staied not aboute sixteen daies in Britaine, a time too short for the sending to Rome, and thence for the returne with his daughter, or for the building of so great a Citie as Gloucester is. Neither indeede was Aurragus knowne in the daies of Claudius: But rather liued in the time of Dominian the sixteenth in succession after him, as plainly appeareth by Iuuenal the Poet, in those his verses spoken to Dominian, which elsiwhere we cited. Whereby appeareth that the sturres of this King could not accord with Claudius raigne, and that the truth of this report is much weakened from more sufficient authorities. But to proceede, Aulus Plautius (the first Lieutenant authorized ouer the Britaines, vpon some occasion was thence reuoked, the warres not quieted, and with a small Triumph (as Tacitus saith) entered Rome. Vnto him succeeded P. Ostorius Scapula, for reputation in martiall affaires nothing his inferior, who at his first landing found all in an vprore: Of whose proceedings let vs heare Tacitus speake: The Britaines (saith he) that were yet unconquered, ranged the Countreies of the confederates, presuming both vpon the approach of the winter, and the Proprietors unacquaintance with his Army: But he knowing that the first successe breedeth either feare, or confidence, gathered the Cohorts, and made towards the Enemy, slaying all that made head against him, and disarming those whom hee most suspected. And to retaine Cogidunus the King in stricter assurance and fidelity to the Emperor, granted diuers Citie and States to him by way of Donation.

The first that beganne to stirre, were the Icenians, the Inhabitants of Norfolke, Suffolke, Cambridge, and Huntington-shires, a strong people vnshaken with warres: And with them (at their instigation) their neighbours adioining. These together chose a fit place for fight, compassed in with a rude, but defensible trench, which had only one narrow entrance whereby the Horsemen must be much impeached. This Rampire notwithstanding the Romane Capitaine, with the onely aide of the Allies brake downe, and disordered the Enemy euen in this their owne fortresse, who seeing all passages for escape to be stopped vp, Ostorius hauing hemmed them in with Garrisons betweene the Rivers Antonia and Sabrina (threwed great valour in their selues, and and by their deaths gave place to the Romans. This overthrow and slaughter of the Icen wrought a more staied resolution in those that before were wauering betweene warre and peace. And the Army led against the Cangi, with waile and spoile consumed the Countrey, the inhabitants not daring to bee seene in field. A small resistance was made by the Brigantes, but without much trouble some quieted by the execution of some few, and pardoning of the rest.

(13) But the Silures (that is, those of South-wales) could not be brought to beare the Romish yoke of subiection, who besides their owne courage relied much vpon the strength and valour of their Prince Caratacus (whose Coine we haue heere expressed) a man which had waded thorow many dangers, and in many adventures both prosperous and luckie had gotten such reputation, that hee was preferred before all the British Capitaines. This Generall knowing his owne strength vnable to match the enemy, by policie thought to supplie that want, and hauing advantage of the Countrey, remooued the warre vnto the Ordouices, which is now North-wales, where all joined to him that either feared or disdained to hold peace with the Romans. Heere he chose a place to encampe his host, euen on the top of a hill naturally defended from access: and where any doubt was, there he stopped vp all passage with heapes of stones in manner of a Rampire; neere the foot whereof ran a River with a foord somewhat dangerous, and not easily found, where a troope of his best souldiers were let in order to receiue the Enemy.

The more to animate their mindes, the Leaders went about exhorting and encouraging the Souldiers, taking all occasions of feare from them, and putting them in hope, with all inducements of resolution: especially Caratacus, who courting hither and thither, protested that day and that battle should bee the beginning either of a recovered libertie, or else a perpetuall seruitude and bondage: and euer hee called vpon the names of his valiant Ancestors, who formerly had chafed Caesar the Dictator out of the Ile, by whose valour they were deliuered from Hatchets and Tributes, and enioied freely their wives and childrens bodies vndefiled. The Souldiers also themselves shewed as great forwardnesse, and as Echoes redoubled his words, vowing according to the Religion of their Countrey, neuer to yield for wounds or life, which they all were ready to sacrifice in the cause of their liberties.

This their apparant resolution much appalled the Romans cheerefulness, and most of all the Capitaines and Leaders, who before their faces saw the River, on both sides of them had the hanging hills, and the Fort commodious for the enemy, but deadly vnto them: all which notwithstanding the common Souldiers despised, and demanded the battle. Ostorius, whose studie was chiefly to performe the parts of a Generall, studied the River with some little difficultie, and leading his Armie vp to the Rampire, was met with such a shoure of darts, that many therewith were wounded and slain. Yet at length breaking downe those rude compacted stones, joined battle with the enemy, and afront came close to handy strokes; wherein the Britaines hauing better courage then armour (for they had neither headpiece nor coat of defense) were fore galled with their lauellings and two-handed swords, and so disordered, that they betooke themselves to flight.

quettours after his nine yeeres most generous resistance. Whereupon his fame being carried ouer the Ilands, and spread abroad thorow the Prouinces, was also renowned in Italie, and they desired to see him that so many yeeres had contemned their forces. Neither was his name meanly esteemed of at Rome; for whilest Caesars worth and power was there commended, a more glorious conceit was held of the conquered Caratacus: and against his comming to the Citie the people from all parts were assembled, as to behold some notable and most rare spectacle. The Emperours Guard in armes and good order were placed in the field before the Campe, thorow whom the Capitaines and Trophies were carried, and presented after this manner: first the vassals of Caratacus going foremost bowed their bodies to the people as they passed, and seemed by their ruefull countenances to discover the sense of their calamitie. The captiuities, his chaines, and other spoiles gotten in the warres, were carried after them. Then Caratacus his brethren, wife, and daughter followed, and last of all himselfe, whose attire and stout behaviour filled the peoples eyes with wonder and delight. His bodie, for the most part, was naked, and painted with figures of diuers beasts. Hee ware a chaine of iron about his necke, and another about his middle: the haire of his head hanging downe in curled lockes, couered his backe and shoulders, and the haire of his upper lip parted on both sides, lay vpon his breast. Neither was his behaviour lesse noted then the frangeness of his habit: for he neither hung downe his head, as daunted with base feare; nor craved mercie, as the rest; but with a confident spirit, and bold countenance, held on till he came before the Imperiall Seat, where making his stand, and a while beholding Caesars Maiesty, at last with great courage spake to this purpose.

(15) If my moderation in prosperitie had beene as answerable to the greatness of my birth and estate, or the successe of my late attempts to the resolution of my minde, I might haue come to this Citie rather as a friend to be entertained, then as a Captiue to be gazed vpon; neither wouldst thou disdain to haue receiued me on crimes of amitie and peace, being a man of roiall descent, and a Commander of many warlike Nations. But what cloud fouer hath darkened my present lot, yet haue the Heauens and Nature giuen mee that in birth and minde, which none can vanquish, or deprive mee of. I well see, that you make other mens miseries the subiect and matter of your triumphs; and in this my calamitie, as in a mirror, you now contemplate your owne glory. Yet know that I am, and was a Prince furnished with strength of men and abilliments of warre; and what maruell is it if all bee lost, seeing experience teacheth that the events of warre are variable, and the successe of policies guided by vncertaine fates? As it is with me, who thought that the deepe waters, like a wall inclosing our Land, and it so situated by heavenly prouidence, as in another world, might haue beene a sufficient priuilege and defense for vs against foraine inuasions: but I now perceiue that the desire of souerainty admits no limitation; and if you Romans must command all, then all must obey. For mine owne part, while I was able I made resistance, and vnwilling I was to submit my necke to a seruile yoke, so farre the law of Nature alloweth every man, that he may defend himselfe being assailed, and to withstand force, by force. Had I at first yielded, thy glory and my ruine had not beene so renowned. Fortune hath now done her worst: wee haue nothing left vs but our liues, which if thou take from vs, our miseries end; and if thou spare vs, wee are but the obiects of thy clemencie.

(16) Caesar wondring to see such resolutions and so free a minde in a Captiue estate, pardoned Caratacus, his wife and brethren, who being vnbound, did their reuerence to Agrippina the Emperesse, that sat aloft on a Throne Roiall. This Conquest and Triumph over Caractacus, ministred matter of discourse and admiration thorough out all Rome, and the Lords of the Senate held it no lesse honourable, then that of P. Scipio, who triumphed over Syphax the Numidian King, or that of Perfes, whom Paulus Aemilius vanquished, or then any other King that had beene taken in warre, or exhibited to the view of the people. Then were also publicke Triumphall honours decreed for Ostorius, whose fortunes vntill then had beene very prosperous, but now began to be doubtfull, or rather to decline, either because Caractacus (the foile of his glory) was removed, and thereupon (as though all had beene subdued) a more carelesse seruice entertained, or else the courage of the Britains was more inflamed to reuenge through the feruent compassion of the fall offe mightie a King.

(17) For immediately they enuironed the Camp-master, and the Legionary Cohorts, which were left to build fortresses in the Country of the Silures, whom with eight Centurions, and the forwardest Souldiers, they slew, and had put all the rest to the sword, if rescue had not speedily come from the villages and forts adjoining. The Foragers also and troope of horse that were sent to aid them they put to flight. These affronts touched Ostorius to the quick, and left their aids should grow to a greater head, he sent forth certaine light-harnessed companies, which with the Legionary Souldiers vndertooke the battle, and with small odds was it continued till the night came, and parted them: diuers other Skirmishes afterwards were made, though for the most part in woods and marshes, whence taking their advantage in falling forth, they many times preuailed, sometimes by strength, sometimes by mere courage, and sometimes by chance; neither were they alwaies commanded by their Captaines, but many times fought voluntary and without warrant.

(18) The principal motiue that induced the rest to take Armes, was the example of the Silure, who were most resolutely bent, as being exasperated by certaine speeches that the Romane Emperour himselfe had vsed, which was, that as the name of the Sugambri was destroyed, and the people transported into Gallia, so the memorie of Silures should vterly bee extinguished: And in this heate as men desperat (whose definitions were read and lots cast already) they intercepted the scattered troopes of the Romans, taking of them many prisoners, and recouering rich booties, which they sent and distributed amongst their neighbours; whereby many other were drawne to reuolt: These proceedings fate so neere Ostorius his heart, who with long cares and trauels had wearied his spirits, spent the strength of his bodie, and thereunto had now added the discontentment of his minde, that in these vexations hee gaue vp the Ghost, the Silures reioicing that so worthy and victorious a Captaine was fallen in their warres.

(19) But Claudius Cæsar, left the Prouince should make head, presently sent Aulus Didius for his Lieutenant into Britaine; where, notwithstanding all his haste, he found all out of frame. For Marinus V. alens with his Legion had encountered the Britains with ill successe, yet not so bad as the Ilanders gaue forth, thinking thereby to terrifie their new-established Gouernour: which report himselfe also in policie was contented to augment, thereby to purchase more praise in appeasing so dangerous stirres; or if hee could not, to retaine his own credit without his valours impeachment. These resisters had made many inroads into the subdued Countries, against whom vpon his first arrival, Didius entred the field, and for a while kept them in awe.

(20) But Venutius a very expert man in Militarie affaires (trusty to the Romans, and defended by their power so long as the marriage betwixt him and Cartimandua continued) began a new rebellion: for Cartimandua (in speciall fauour with the Romans for the deliuey of Caractacus) abounding in wealth, peace, & pleasures (which commonly are the Nurles of licentious liuing) fell in loue (as before was touched) with Vellocatus her husbands seruant, and harnesse-bearer, & forgetting her owne honour, preferred him before Venutius, and laboured to make him King. The good-will of the Country notwithstanding went generally vpon the lawful husband: who being deeply touched with this open iniurie, raised a power against her and her Paramour. At the first this quarrell was onely betwixt them, vntill that Cartimandua by policie had taken her husbands brother, and some of his neereft kindred, prisoners. Whereupon the next Inhabitants fearing her purposes, and diddaining to be brought vnder the yoke of a woman so defamed, declared themselves for Venutius, & with a choice band of youthfull Soldiers invaded her Territories: whereof Didius hauing intelligence, sent certain Cohorts to second her, and encounter them. In which conflict, the Romans for Cartimandua did preuaile; yet the kingdome remained to Venutius, and the warres still vnto them.

(21) For the Silures were not altogether quieted, & a Legion commanded by Cæsius Nasica, fought luckily against the Britains. In all which stirres Didius in person was absent, as being stricken in yeares, and hauing receiued many honours, held it sufficient to execute his charge by the assistance of others. The State of Britaine thus standing, let vs so leaue it, during this Emperours raigne, which now began to draw towards his last period, by the working of Agrippina his wife, and by her vpon this occasion.

(22) It chanced, Claudius in his wine, to cast forth a word of great suspicion, in saying: That it was fittall vnto him first to beare the leaudnes of his wives, & then to punish them. She knowing her selfe guiltie in disinheriting of Britannicus, who was Claudius his owne sonne, for the adoption of Nero who was hers, besides other insolencies, wherewith the might be taxed, sought therefore to clear her owne way by taking him out of the way: and with Locustia a woman skilfull in poisoning, and Zenophon a Physician, as large of conscience, conferred for the manner of his death: who in fine, concluded that poison was the surest and the least in suspect, or at leastwise the most difficult to be proved against her.

(23) This then resolved, they temper poison in a Mushrom, whereof he greedily did eate, and shortly after ended his life the thirteenth day of October, when hee had reigned thirteene yeares, eight moneths, and twentie daies, the yeare of Christ his incarnation fiftie fixe, and of his owne age sixtie foure. He was of stature tall, and of a pleasing Countenance, full of Maieitie and comely gray haire, his Head continually shaking, somewhat stammering in his speech, very learned, but therewithall very forgetfull, and altogether ruled by his wives, and domestical seruants, the two ordinary banes of most men who are aduanced to any eminent place of gouernement & command.

(24) This Emperour (saith Seneca) might make his boast that he was the first conquerour of the Britains, for Iulius Cæsar did but shew their land vnto the Romans, whereas Claudius made their necks yeeld to the chains of their captiuities. And Agrippinus saith thus of Claudius, It is wondrous if Britain, which liued without the world, but now by him reduced vnder the Romans Empire, and those whom the former ages knew not, neither themselves any seruitude, are now by him both made knowne, and seruants to the Romans. And againe: As great a matter it was to passe those Seas, as to haue triumphed over those Britains, wherein (saith he) euen the elements haue done homage vnto Claudius. In ioy whereof, and reuerence to the Gods, in his triumph he mounted the staires of the Capitol vpon his aged knees, being supported and lifted vp by his sons in Law on either side, the glory of this Ilands conquest had so possessed this old Emperours mind.

Tacit. Annal. 15. cap. 10.

His violent and vnexpected death of Claudius, gaue breath and life vnto Nero, whose further hopes: for whilest the Consuls were assembled to make supplications for their Prince, (not knowing him already dead) Nero suddenly set open the Palace gates, and accompanied with shouts and acclamations, entred the Cohorts that kept the watch, where of them and the rest of the souldiers he was saluted Emperour, the Senate as men affrighted with amazement, not once contradicting the same.

(2) He was the sonne of Domitius Nero, and of Julia Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus brother to Claudius the precedent Emperour, vicious by nature, as sprung of those parents from whom (as his owne father Domitius said) no goodnesse could proceede: and the same vile disposition was perfected and augmented by his owne affected study and pursuit of all possible leaudnesse, as one who could well fit his wanton and lasciuious humours to the vnripenesse of his yeeres, being not passing seuentene when he assumed the Empire. All religion he had in contempt, and all lawes violated, letting loose the reins to all vnnatural lusts, and licentiousnesse of life.

(3) For blood and libidinousnesse hee was held a most insatiate furie, and amongst men a very monster of nature. His father he poisoned: vpon his mother he committed both incest and murder: vpon males, pollutions against nature: deflowred the Vestals (a matter sacrilegious & impious) slew his brother Germanicus, and his sister Antonia, his wives, Poppæa and Octavia, his aunt Domitia, his sonne in law Rufinus, and his renouued Tutor Seneca; Vnto such savage slaughter of the Romane Nobilitie, that Tacitus (their best Remembrancer) was wearied to record their names, whilest with a seruile patience (as he termeth it) they died honourably.

gelists agreeeth) was put to death vnder Pontius Pilate Procurator of Iudea, where that religion first began, yet by him it is confessed, that these men were innocent of the fact, and their doctrine to burst forth further into many other parts, inasmuch that Rome it selfe did affect the same. Yea and in Neroes Court also some embraced that faith, as by the words of the Apostle is manifest, who from the Saints in Cæsars house sent salutations to the Brethren. Phil. 4. 22.

(5) And lastly, to fill vp the measure of his bloudie cruelty, he crucified Peter vpon the Crosse, and beheaded Paul with the sword, two principal Apostles of Iesus Christ, and worthy instruments of the worlds saluation; and forgetting the Maieitie of his estate, fell into the sinke of contempt and all sinnes, giuing his minde leaue to digest all vncleannesse, and his bodie ouer to worke any base exercises, attending nothing besides his Harpes and Harlots, whereby a carelesse (but yet a cruel) gouernment was intertained, and the Senate fashioning themselves to feed his loose humours, strove each to outstrip other in their base flatteries.

(6) In this state the Prouinces subiections began to stand doubtfull, and the greatnesse of the Empire to ouercharge the foundation; for the Parthians vnder Vologeses gaue P. Artabazus the Romane a great overthrow, and that in such wise, that those which escaped were tearmed the unfortunate Armie. And in Britaine their affaires proceeded with no good successe; for aged Didius could doe no more then keep that which he had already gotten: and Verannius his successor, only with small inroades assailing the Silures, was in his first yeere cut off by death, inasmuch that Nero hauing neither will, motion, nor hope to propagate and enlarge the Empire, minded once to haue withdrawn the forces out of Britaine, had it not bene for very shame.

(7) But Paulinus Suetonius attaining the gouernment of that Prouince, in skill for seruice, and opinion of people comparable to any, sought to match his conuerent Corbulo, who with daily victories prospered in Armenia, himselfe wanting neither courage nor discretion to attchieue the like, only matter and occasion the Iland afforded none. Therefore determining an expedition into further parts, he made preparation to inuade the Ile of Mona, separated from the Continent by the Riuer Menai, and fronted vpon the midst of Ireland, both strong with inhabitants, and a receptacle of Fugitives.

(8) Against his approach the Ilanders had gathered their powers, which stood thicke vpon the shore ready

With the strangenesse of which sight, the Romans stood amazed, not offering one stroke; seeming rather to present themselves for a pray vpon their enemies weapons, then for the conquest of their land or liues: which sudden and vnexpected discouragement, their Captaine loone redressed, by putting them in remembrance of their wonted valours, which now was farre ouermatchable vnto a fearefull flocke of weak women, or a company of rude and franticke men: whereupon their Engines were displayed, and the Enemy presently disperfed and flaine, themselves becoming masters both of the field, and whole Ile: which no sooner was thus obtained, but suddenewes came to recall their powers, the Provinces being raised to a present revolt.

ted, and Armenia held play with Corbulo, as famous as Paulinus: Their cause was as iust, their land as well defended; their ancestors as valiant in resisting the first Ring-leader Caesar; and themselves better experienced of their adversaries powers, and their owne abilities. So now hauing attained the hardest point, which was their assembled Consultations (a matter of as great danger to be taken with, as in acting their intentions) in fine this was resolved, that libertie was to be preferred, though bought with their liues; and bondage to bee avoided, if not otherwise then by their deaths.

(12) These their often and noted assemblies brought suspicions of some designements, and the prodigies daily happening as they were motives of encouragements vnto the Britaines: So were they ominous signes to the Romans, of either part framed in their owne imaginations, and construed according to their hoped or feared events.

(13) The Confederates in this businesse were not to seeke their Leader: their Queenes dishonours so apparently knowne, (and for matter of government they made no difference of Sexe) her birth extracted from their Royal blood, her hearts affection approved to her Countrey, her indignities received of the proud oppressors, and her haughtie spirit threatening vengeance, assured them of her vermost endeavours: which accordingly she effected to her dying day, and to her neuer dying fame.

(14) The Romans likewise provided themselves, and in the absence of Suetonius, craved aide of Catus Didianus the Procurator; who sent them not about two hundred men, and those but badly armed. These ioining with the rest made no great power, al though relying more to the franchise of the place, then securing themselves with Trench or Bulwarks: And giuen ouer to pleasure, and play, as in the time of a publicke peace. Which advantages by the Enemy were wisely espied, and by Boduo comming on as nobly pursued, when with sword and fire he wasted all in her way, the Temple onely excepted, whereinto part of the Souldiers were fled, but after two daies siege it was battered and taken.

(15) In this heate of furie, the Britaines proceeded, and meeting Petilius Cerealis Lieutenant of the ninth Legion, on a halty March to rescue that which was already lost, they encounter his forces, and slew all his footmen, himselfe with his troope of Horse hardly escaping to his Campe, where in great feare he entrenched, not daring to attempt any further matter. At notice of these mishaps, Catus like a tall man, tooke to his heeles, and failed into Gallia: by whose crueltie and couetousnes the Britaines were thus enraged to take Armes and revolt, and their entrance thus fortunately proceeding, gaue heart and hope to further successe.

(16) For in this heat of blood and furie they set vpon, and sacked the free-towne Verolanium, both strong for garriſon, and rich in Inhabitants: which Citie (as also Camulodunum) had felt the rage of their mercilesse hands, from whence great booties were carried, and no lesse then seuente thousand Citizens and Confederates flaine. This commotion in Britaine by Suetonius Tranquillus is accounted one of the most infortunate losses to the Empire happening vnder Nero, and the more inominious to the Romans (as Dion obserueth) in that it was performed vnder the command of a woman, neither experienced in the feates of warre, nor vsing the victory according to the Law of Armes: for not any prisoner taken in regard of ranſome was saved, nor intercoure of exchange admitted, but kill, hang, burne, and crucifie, as though the measure of their reuenge could neuer be sufficiently heaped, or the wrath of their Gods satisfied with the blood of their Enemies.

(17) By this time Suetonius the Lieutenant was returned, and taking muster of his forces in London (a Citie euen then famous for concourse of Merchants, and of great renowne for prouision of all things necessary)

London long since renowned.

(sary) stood yet doubtfull whether hee should chuse that place for the seat of warre, or no. But better aduising, dislodged his Host, and with the fourteenth Legion, the Standard-bearers of the twelfth, and other aids from places adjoining, incamped vpon a plaine, enclosed with woods, hauing a narrow entrance, and free from Ambush or enemy at his backe.

(18) The Britaines likewise, inferior neither in number nor courage, triumphed abroad by such troupes and multitudes, as the like had not bene scene, yea and so fierce of courage, and with such assurance of hope, that they brought their wines to the place to be witnesses of their valours. Boduo in her Chariot doing the parts of a most noble General, drove from troope to troope to see and commend their forwardnes, and dismounting attended with her two daughters, and two hundred and thirty thousand resolute Britaines, gathered to a feat made of marish turfes, after the manner of the Romans, apparelled in a loose gowne of changeable colours, wearing a kirtle thereunder very thicke pleated, the tresses of her yellow haire hanging downe to the skirts. About her necke shee had a chaine of gold, and in her hand held a light speare, being of personage tall, and of a comely, cheerefull, and modest countenance, and so a while shee stood pawling, in viewing her Army, and being regarded with a reuerend silence, at length to this effect she spake vnto them.

(19) My Friends and Companions of equal fortunes, there heedeth no excuse for this my present authoritie or place, in regard of my Sex, seeing it is not unknown vnto you all, that the wonted manner of our Nation hath bene to warre vnder the conduct of a woman, and not only ours, but also of the greatest Monarchies swaied vpon this vniuersall Globe: for the Empire of the Aſſyrians (the first and most famous that euer was) vnder the command of Semiramis triumphed oer the fierce Aethiopians; and the gold-veined Indians; Babylon for strength and beauty was both defended and enriched by Nitocris her sole Empreſse. The Scythians vnder Tomyris ouercame, and slew the great Conquerour Cyrus. Aegypt governed by Cleopatra: yea and Romes Monarches themselves ruled, if not ouer-ruled, by Mefſalina and Agrippina the monſters of our Sexe. My blood and birth might challenge some preeminence, as sprung from the roots of most royall descent: but my breath received from the same aire, my body sustained by the same soile, and my glorie clouded with imposed ignominies. I disclaime all superiortie, and as a fellow in bondage beare the yoke of oppressions, with as heauie waight and pressure, if not more. Had I with Cæsars mother bene suspected of Treason, or with false Cartimandua defiled my Bed, to the disturbance of their peace, my goods might have gone vnder the title of Confiscation, and these prints of the whip vnder pretext of iustice. But why name I iustice in these grand Catalogues of oppressions, whose Actors respect neither person, age, sexe, nor cause? For what abuse can be so vile, that wee haue not suffered? or indignitie so contemptible, that wee haue not borne? My stripes, yet felt and scene against their owne lawes, and the violent rapes of these my harmlesse daughters, against the Lawes of God and Man, doe witness well what government they intend: and your wealths consumed by their wastefull wantonnesse, your painfull trauels vpholding their idlenesse, doe scale the illues of our succeeding miseries, if not timely prevented by one ioint endeavour. You that haue known the freedome of life, will with me consent (I am sure) that libertie (though in a poore estate) is better then bondage with fetters of gold: and yet this comparison hath no correspondence in vs: for wee now enioy no estate at all, nothing now being ours but what they will leave vs; and nothing left vs, that they can take away, hauing not so much as our very heads toll-free. Other subdued Nations by death are quit from bondage; but wee after death

" must liue seruaile, and pay tribute euen in our grankes. " Haue the Heauens made vs the ends of the world, " and haue not assigned the end of our wrongs? Or " hath Nature among all her free worker created vs " Britaines only for bondage? Why; what are the Romans? Are they more then men, or immortal? " Their flaine carcases sacrificed by vs, and their putrefied blood corrupting our Aire, doth tell vs they " are no Gods. Our personages are more tall, our bodies more strong, and our ioints better knit: and (to say as it is) euery part of vs framed more fit for the speare then for the spade. But you will say they are our Conquerours. Indeede ouercome wee are, but by our selues: our owne factions still giuing way to their intrusions: for had not the Dictator A Mandubrace? " Caligula an Admirus? Claudius a Bericus, and Co- " gidannus? Nero (that strumper, and our still-living shame) Cartimandua? Romes instruments, and Brit- " taines vipers? without which, you shall see Cæsar in single fight, lose his sword, and after flie the Countrey (a dishonour indeleble) Tiberius forgoe his Tribute, though extremely couetous, Claudius glad to make peace, and be quiet: and Nero might still haue followed his fiddling trade at home, if our discords had not made vp his Musike heere abroad. Our dissensions therefore haue bene their only rising, and our designs still weakened by home-bred conspirators. " Neither hath our noble resistance euer bene without desert and note of honour: their publike triumphs being made more admirable by one Britaines Conquest, then usually hath bene solemnized ouer whole Kingdomes. Caligula for beholding our cliffs only would haue diuine honours: and forgetfull Claudius remembered vnto posterities (in his Britannicus) a glorious surname from vs. Our strengths haue bene acknowledged the maine support of other States, and shall it not bee supplied to maintain our owne? Wee haue as much to keepe as Bith-right hath giuen vs, that is, our Island possessed by our Ancestors from all antiquitie: Ours by inheritance, theirs by intrusions, claimes so different in the scale of iustice, that the Gods themselves must needs redresse, and set the ballance in their equal poise. Wee haue scene their propitious beginnings, in making vs instruments ouer leuenty thousand of our enemies; and yet in this reuenge our forces not diminished, but much increased in number and power: it is which thing, as it serues to our encouragements (so is it to their feare. For Catus hath let the Seas (a sure defense) betwixt him and vs; yet not a Britaine pursuing: for surely if any had, he would haue hid himselfe in the waues. Petilius the field-mouse doth keepe his hole, and with the Moule works the earth for his safest refuge: And Posthumus their Campe-master is too wise to venture all at a cast. Only Plautinus fleshed by his late victorie ouer a company of vnarmed Priests, whose resistance consisted only in praiers, and a few weak women, whose weapons were only fire-brands, builds the hopes of his aspiring minde, as Caligula did his Trophy of Cockle-shells. For see wee not him encamped rather to defend his owne, then to offend others? His Army crouched together, as fowles flocked against a storme, or rather like to fearefull Hares squatted in their bushes, who no sooner shall heare the crie of their pursuit, but their Muske or Fortresse will bee left: and for their last refuge, as Hares, trust to the swiftnesse of their speedy feet. Suddenly, as hee was thus speaking, shee let slip a Hare which hee had secretly couched in her lappe, which with a great shout escaped thorow the Campe, and gaue occasion to the Army (who little suspected it was done by her of purpose) to construe it as an ominous and luckie signe of victory.

(20) And thereupon with great force they assaile their enemies, whiles Suetonius was likewise encouraging his Souldiers to the like resolution. The fourteenth Legion by his direction kept the strait as a sure place of defense, till the Britaines in the fury of their first onfet had spent all their darts, which with good successe they had bestowed: but then failing and wearied in their first coming on too hotly, the Romans filled out vpon the plaine, the Auxiliaries and Horsemen with long launces making their way, and beating downe all that stood before them. The Britains vnable to endure or withstand such fierce assaults, were forced to giue backe, and at length fought to saue themselves by flight, but were hindered by their owne Waggon placed in the reere-ward of the Army, which gaue the more impediment to their retreat, in that they were then full of their women who in confidence of the victory came thither to behold the fight, which were among the rest all slaine, without regard of sexe or mercie. This day was famous and comparable in renowne for victory to any other of former times, for therein were slaine of the Britains the number of eightie thousand men: And the Land brought vnder an vnrecourable subiection.

(21) Boudice seeing the overthrow of her Army, was notwithstanding vnvanquished in her owne Noble spirit, and coming to be a peccetle in their triumphs, or a vassall to their willes, after the example of Cleopatra, shee made an end of her miseries and life, by poison. And Pentius Posthumus, Camp-master of the second Legion, seeing the good successe of the fourth and twentieth: for that disobaying the Generall (contrary to the discipline of warre) he had defrauded himselfe and followers of their parts of glorie in that seruice, for verie griefe flew himselfe: and for their good feruence there performed, Nero greatly honoured the eleuenth, thirteenth and foureteenth Legions, reposing a mortuere trust in their valour and fidelitie, euer afterward.

(22) Suetonius animated with this victorie, gathered his Army, & encamped again, purposing to end the residue of the warre, if any resistors should remaine: And at that present were sent him out of Germanie two thousand Legionarie Souldiers, eight Cohorts of Auxiliaries, and a thousand Horse, whereby his strength was augmented, and the ninth Legion which had bene much weakened by the rashnes of Petilius, fully supplied: So that bootlesse it was for the poore Britains to make any further resistance, and such as did, or stood doubtfully affected, were daily put to the sword. But nothing distressed them so much, as did famine, and want of Corne, being a people in all ages more giuen to warre then good husbandry, and rather relying vpon the provisions of others, than by the plough to provide for themselves, fierce of nature, and slowlie lending care to peace, or their minde to such Arts as either nourish, or are nourished by peace.

(23) In these times Tullius Claufricius, sent from Nero to succcede Catus in his office of receipts, an enemy, & at variance with Suetonius, the more to cloud his renouance, gaue it forth for certaine, that a new Lieutenant was to be expected, who without either hostile rancour, or pride of a Conquerour, would intreat the yeelders with all Clemencie: And likewise by letters sent to Rome, he signified that no end of warre was to be expected, so long as Suetonius remained Generall, attributing euerie aduersé lucke to his intolerable pride, and euery prosperous successe onely to the good fortunes of Cesar and State of Rome. These Great mens diffentions awaked Nero, fearing lest the Britains, thereby would be more forward to advantage, with whom experience had shewed there was no dallying, and his former losses among them being againe recovered, he thought himselfe discharged and quit from all fatall calamities, as Tranquillus doth affirme. Therefore he sent Polyetes, one of his freed seruitors, with Commission to examine the differences, and to interpose his autoritie to worke a reconciliation: at whose greatnes it was also thought that the Britains would haue quaked, and come in vnder feare. Which thing fell out otherwise: for howsoeuer the Capitaine and Souldiers regarded him for his place, vnto whom he shewed himselfe both arrogant and terrible, yet the Britains made him but their laughing stocke, as being themselves borne free, and knew not what the power of freed-men was, much admired that such Commanders and Armies which had achieved so great exploits, could be brought to obey, and yeeld account of their actions to so base a bond-slave, as they termed him.

(24) But Suetonius growne great by his fortunes in these warres, and as it should seeme both suspected and feared of Nero, was by him commanded (the warres yet continuing) to deliuer vp his Armie to Petronius Turpilianus, who had lately giuen ouer his Consulship in Rome, a man of a softer, and more intreatable condition; and as a stranger to the faults committed before, readier to receiue to fauour and forgieue: who hauing composed the former troubles, not daring any further, neither egged, nor prouoked the Enemy, but gaue himselfe to a quiet, or rather idle life, which hee thought might passe vnder the title of an honourable peace. In which estate he gaue vp his charge to Trebellius Maximus, and was after slaine by Galba, nothing objected against him, but his faithfulness to Nero, in that he would not betray him, as the rest had done. For Nero now growne Odious to God and Man, Conspiracies were continually attempted, though not in act effected, vntill that Iulius Vindex Lieutenant of Galba opposed his proceeding, being the first stirrer, and the rowling stone that (as Tacitus tearmes it) tumbled Nero out of his Seate.

(25) For hauing proclaimed Galba Emperour, an old and weak man, at that time Governour of Aragon, neither priuie to the conspiracie, nor assenting to the title, he set vp daily many bitter and biting Edicts against Nero, whereby he was rowled from his lasciuious rest, and began to feare the fatal end, whereunto his impious life and bloody raigne had now lately brought him; who destitute of all power of resistance, did now let his whole hope and refuge, vpon that meanes, to which the compass of his time had euer pointed; for relying onely vpon his skill in Musique, hee intended his flight into Egypt, there to teach the instructions of that Art: into lush sudden basenes was his minde delected, that formerly had lashed out beyond all measure in luxurie, pride, and prodigalitie. Vnto this conspiracie ioined Virginius Rufus Lieutenant of high Germanie, with Nymphidius, Sabinus, and Sponius Tigellinus, Capitaine of the Guard, who after Vindex his death, (which happened vpon an accident euen in his entrance to Armes) maintained the election of Galba: and the Senate as forward to Neros destruction, proclaimed him Enemy to the State, and pronounced his punishment more maiourum, sending out each way to apprehend him aliue.

(26) In this feare Nero attended with foure seruants onely, had hid himselfe in a Country Cottage, not passing foure miles from Rome; whence hearing his decreed iudgement, and demanding what was meant by that sentence, it was answered, that his necke should be locked in the forke of a tree, and his bodie all naked, whipped to death; whereupon lamenting that so good a Minister should be made away, he ran himselfe through on his sword, and so rid the world of a Monster.

(27) Of stature he was indifferent, his body full of freckles, his haire somewhat yellow, his countenance rather faire then lovely, his eyes gray and dimme, his necke fatte, his bellie bearing out, and his legges slender and small; A most skillfull Musitian he was, and in that Art fought to excell others, and to equalize Apollo himselfe, as also in his Chariot-riding to imitate the swiftnesse of the Sunne. So prodigall in apparel, that he neuer wore one Garment twice, & so sumptuous in buildings, as is vncredible. He reigned thirteen yeares and eight daies, and died the eight of Iune, in the one and thirtieth of his age, and after the birth of our Saviour Christ the threecore and tenth: as Eusebius doth account.

In the death of this Tyrant, ended the progeny of the Cesars, and the Emperours succeeding were afterwards elected, either for the opinion of their owne worths, or els, (and that oftner) by the faction and voice of the Souldiers, whose violence the Senate euer feared to contradict, and whose Colonies in euerie Province sought to raise their owne Generall to that high estate. In which time of Combustion, though little be recorded of the British affaires, yet because the Monarchy of this Island was then and long after inuaded in the Imperiall dignitie, we may not omit to speake somewhat of the ensuing Emperours, as the chiefe Governours of this kingdom. Vpon Neros declining, diuers there were (as Vindex and Virginius, Nymphidius and Sponius) set vp against him, but Galba for his reputed integritie got the Garland from them all: who little dreaming of the Imperiall Diademe, fortune set it vpon his head before his hand had toucht the same: for Vindex in Gallia hauing proclaimed him Emperour, and himselfe in Aragon not free from Neros hatred, hee sought rather to hazard his life with the Glorie of a Crowne, then depend vpon his mercie, who had sent secretly the sentence of his death. And therefore mounting the Tribunal, the more to impress a fresh remembrance of former cruelties, he placed before his throne, the Images of certaine Nobles executed by Nero, with some personages sent for out of exile, whose presence might prouoke a deeper edge of hatred, and his Army about him readie for mutation, these, or the like words he spake.

(2) My fellow Souldiers and friends, wee at this time are assembled, to bestow that vpon others, which wee our selues haue finally enioied, I meane, libertie from bondage, and freedome from feares of a Tyrant. The life that I haue hitherto lead, will sufficiently discharge me from any aspiring conceit, and my owne Conscience doth witness that: I speake not vpon malice or priuate respects: It greuech me to say, but it bootes not to hide, that, which euerie man seeth. Hath euer Bond-man vnder a cruell master passed a yeere of harder seruice, then we haue done foureteen vnder Nero? what kind of exaction hath he not proued to supply with extortion, that which with shame hee hath spent? what kinde of crueltie hath he not practised? If we would conceale or seeke to suppress it, these dumb stones would declare them: For behold, hee poisoned his Father and brother, abused and slew his owne mother, murdered his wife, his Tutor, and what els so euer valiant or vertuous in Senate, in Ci-

tie, in Province, without any difference of Sexe or Age. I neede not to speake of the sorrowful sighes, and bitter teares of so many young gentlemen bereft of their fathers, so many wines robbed of their husbands, so many great men decried of their Country, all which cry vengeance vpon such a Prince: a Prince? nay an Incendiarie, a Singer, a Fidler, a Stage-plaier, a Cart-driuer, a Cryer, no Prince, nay no man; that hath a man to his husband, and a man to his wife, but a monster of mankind: And in truth a subiect, vpon whom, vice hath made her full experience, and raised her triumphs from the base of Cesars throne. Against whom, what Vindex in France hath already intended, I am sure you doe know, and I, for my part, am most forrie to heare. The whole course of my former life hath bene hitherto removed from Ambition in Court, or from aiming too high abroad, and this little that remains of my daies, I could hardly wish were to be spent in more care: But fith I know not by what my fortune, some haue imposed vpon me a Part which, I neuer meant to sustaine, and least of all at this age, I will not refuse, if you will also approue it, to sacrifice this old Carcase of mine for the wealth of my Country, not as Emperour or Augustus (which sacred names I adore afarre off, not daring to approach them) but as ———— And no further heard, was with great acclamations saluted Emperour.

(3) But such is the height of glory, which is raised by the blasts of the multitude, that it falls againe as the bubble burst in the swelling, which leaues neither circle nor signe of his former pride. And so is the state of Galba with one breath applauded, and placed vpon the Imperiall Throne; and that scarce cold, ere they dislike of their owne hastic election: for newes being brought that the State stood firme for Nero, and for certaine that Vindex in his quarrell was slaine, euen in his first enterprife of revolt; that Virginius was sided by his Germane Legions, and his name inscribed in their banners; that Nymphidius was the man whose defects could not be sufficiently honoured with lesse recompence then the princely Diademe: These distractions so much ouer-swaied his aged and passionate heart, that he retired to Clunia in great dejection, repenting himselfe of that which hee had done, and wished againe his priuate estate.

(4) But the death of Nero commonly diuulged, and Virginius his refusall of the Imperiall Title, gaue strength and life to his former election, now further ratified by the full resolutions of the Armie: who the more to seeme both strong and valorous, though indeed a weak, sickly, and filly old man, Souldier-like in his coat of Armes shewed himselfe, and in that array passed the vast mountains for Rome. With whose entrance, entred the dislike of his person, as one vnfit to support the state of others, that by age and imbecillie was not able to sustain his owne: to which were added the imperfections of his government, carried every way farre vnder expellation. And long hee late not before hee saw his owne defects: to redresse which hee elected Piso Licinianus, Cesar, joining him in power with himselfe, and declaring him his Succesor, in a short and blunt Oration, in presence both of the Senate and Souldiers.

(5) Whereat howsoever others stood affected, yet Marcus Salinus Otho (one, who for commerce in leaudnes was very deare to Nero, and whose hope depended vpon the common disturbance, for that his excessse in riot had now brought him to the brink of beggary) much enuied therat, rather because himselfe had entertained a hope that Galba would haue adopted him, and therefore as his concurrent set his own aspiring mind for the Crown. And even now this time best fitted his attempts, as being the wane of Galbaes authority, and before the full of Pisces power, his Astrologers and Starre-gazers forwarding him with their vaine predictions, a kinde of people euer to Princes vnfaithfull, to hopers deceitfull, and in a common-wealth alwaies forbidden, yet alwaies retained. The souldiers likewise euer disliking the present, and affecting the new, fell without respect to Othoes side: amongst whom Sulpitius Florus, one of the British Cohorts, slew Piso the elected Cesar; Galba himselfe being murdered and mangled by the Souldiers and band of Hortemen.

(6) He was of a good stature; his head bald, his eyes gray, and his nose hooked, his hands and feet crooked by reason of the gout, and a bunch of flesh or wen vpon his right side. A great feeder and Sodomite hee was, feare in iustice, and ouer-ruled by his seruants. Hee died aged seuentie three yeeres, hauing out-lived fise Princes. In prosperitie happier vnder the Empire of others, then in his owne; for hee late only fiseen months, and them with small contents. In his flourishing age with great renoune he had serued in Germany: Africke he ruled as Proconsul, and the neerer Spain vprightly and well; seeming more then a priuate man while he was priuate, and held capable of the Empire, had he neuer bene Emperour.

THE FIRST PLANTING OF RELIGION IN BRITAIN.

CHAPTER IX.

His short time of Galbaes gouernment, with the conspiracies against his Predecessor, admitteth small remembrances of our British affaires: which Province (saith Tacitus) amongst all other stirres against both Nero and Galba, held amity, and stood in quiet; whether it was the farre distance of place, secured by Sea from the seditions of the Reuolters; or that by continuall feruice against the Enemy the malice of their humours were spent, it is vncertaine. Therefore while to digresse from the Succession of our British Monarkes, and to fill vp the emptinesse of those Times with matters incident to our selues, let it not seeme either tedious or superfluous, to speake of the planting of this Kingdome in this Island, whose Rule in short time extended to the Ends of the Earth; and whose Ambassadours (as some haue written) about the midde of Neroes Reigne, and in the yeere of Christis Incarnation sixty three approached for the Inhabitants saluation, Aviragus then swaying the Scepter of this Kingdome.

(2) At which time (say they) were sent certaine Disciples out of France into Britaine by Philip the Apostle, whereof Ioseph of Arimathea, that buried the body of Christ, was chiefe; who first laid the foundation of our faith in the West parts of this Island, at the place then called Adulon, (afterwards Inis Vitrin, now Glastenburie) where he with twelue Disciples his Assistants preached the Gospell of life vnto the Islanders, and there left their bodies to remaine for a iofull Resurrection. This doth Gildas affirme, and Malmesburie in his Booke of the Antiquitie of Glastenburie written to Henry de Blois, brother to King Stephen, and Abbas of the same place, report, and is contented vnto (for the matter, though all agree not touching the time) by the learned Antiquaries of later times, grounded on the Testimonies of the best approved Ancient writers: who account the most happy influence of Christianitie, to haue bene by those glorious conduits conuayed into these remote parts of the world: that so (according to the promise of God by Esaiah) The Isles a farre off which had not heard of his fame, should be converted, and haue his glorie to them declared among the Gentiles.

(3) And if the credit of Dorotheus Bishop of Tyre, (who liued to see the Apostacie of Iulian) weigh any thing with vs, in his tract of the Liues and Deaths of the Prophets, Apostles, and Disciples, he bringeth Simon Zelotes (an Apostle of Iesus Christ) to preach the word, and to suffer Martyrdom on the Crosse here in Britaine: with whom Nicophorus, and after him Iohn Capgrane (in his Catalogue of English Saints) agree, saying that the same Simon spread the Gospell to the west Ocean, and brought the word of life into the Isles of Britaine: and, in the conuersion of Countries wrought by the Apostles, the same Nicophorus, with Egypt and Lybia assigneth Britaine also to be one. And the foresaid Dorotheus, as also Mirmanus, nameth Arifobulus one of the seuentie Disciples (the same whom Saint Paul in his Epistle to the Romans among others others saluteth) to haue taught the doctrine of Saluation, and to haue executed the office of a Bishop heere in Britaine.

(4) To these first Planters and Sowers of this heauenly Seed, Cesar Baronius, that voluminous Historian, ioineeth Mary Magdalen, Lazarus, and Martha, who (by his relation) being banished Ierusalem, in a masterlesse ship without tackling arrived in Gallia, and with them Ioseph of Arimathea, who afterward landed in Britaine (not tradunt, as hee faith, out of an old Manuscript which he saw in the Vatican Library;) yea and with them also Eurgain the sister of Ioseph, who afterwards married a Britaine named Siarkas, if the authoritie whereon George Owen-Harry doth ground that report, be of any credit.

(5) But yet there are others, who vpon a very good ground from the words of Gildas (the most ancient of our British Historians) will haue the Summe of the Gospell long before to haue risen in this our West, and this Island of Britaine to haue enioied the very morning of his Assent, the brightnesse thereof piercing thorow the mistie clouds of error, and shining heere in Britaine euen in the daies of Tiberius, towards whose end Christ suffered his death, and by whose indulgence towards Christians, their profession was propagated farre and neere. Which assertion the said Gildas doth not deliuer coldly or doubtingly, but with great confidence, & relying vpon good grounds, as it appeareth when he faith, Scimus, &c. Wee know for certainty, that this was in the latter times of Tiberius. Which was immediately after our blessed Sauours Passton.

To which vncontroleable testimonie some others haue added (though not perhaps on foundoubted warrant) that S. Peter the Apostle preached the word of life in this Island, as to other Gentiles he did, for whom God had chosen him, that from his mouth they might heare the Gospell and beleue, (as himselfe allegeth) and that hee heere founded Churches, and ordained Priests and Deacons, which is reported by Simon Metaphrastes out of the Greece Antiquities, and Guilielmus Elisingenius in the first of his Centurie, who faith that Peter was here in Neroes time; whereas Baronius thinketh it was in the reigne of Claudius, when the Iewes were banished Rome, and that therefore Paul in his Epistle to the Romans mentioneth him not. Indeed Baronius and some others plead very hotly for S. Peters preaching heere: but I see not well how it can stand either with Eusebius his account, which keeps him so long at Rome after he was Bishop there, or with Omphrius, who denieth that he went westward (being expelled by Claudius) but to Ierusalem, and thence to Antioch, where he liued till the death of Claudius: whence it must follow, that if Peter were heere at all, it was before euer he went to Rome, and that the Gospell was preached heere before it was in Rome, if Peter were the first (as some hold) that preached there: both which may be the more probable, if wee consider the huge multitudes of Christians (fifteen thousand, faith Baronius) which dispersed themselves into all parts of the world vpon the martyring of S. Steuen at Ierusalem, (which was presently vpon the death of Christ) and that Ioseph of Arimathea was one of that number, Baronius doth confesse. I am heere contented to step over that Monkish tale reported by Aluredus Rinalensis (the writer of King Edward the Confessors life) that a holy man (forsooth) studious and careful for a Gouernour to succeed, was in his sleepe told by S. Peter that the Kingdome of England was his, wherein himselfe had first preached, and would also provide him Successors. For seeing it was a dreame, for a dreame wee leaue it, and Peter among the other Elders to attend his Throne, that now siteth in glorious Majestie, and who in this life minded no such earthly preeminence, no not to diuide betwixt brethren, though the Kingdome and rule of all things was his alone.

(6) Certes Peter was principally the Apostle of the Circumcision, and therefore more likely to haue spent his endeuours on them: but for Paul (the Dottor of the Gentiles) his arrival heere may seeme more warrantable, who doubtlesse (after his first releasement from Rome) confirmed the doctrine of Christ to these Westerne parts of the world, and among them, as may appeare, to this Island of Britaine, as both Sophronius Patriarke of Ierusalem, and Theodore an ancient Dottor of the Church, doe affirme and approue, saying that Fishers, Publicans, and the Tent-maker (meaning S. Paul) which brought the Euangelicall light vnto all Nations, reuealed the same vnto the Britaines. That Paul came into Ilyricum, Gallia, and Spain, and filled all those parts with his doctrine, both Eusebius, Dorotheus, and Epiphanius doe testifie: and of this generally Ambassage the Apostle himselfe faith, that the sound of the Gospell went thorow the earth, and was heard vnto the ends of the world: which his sayings cannot more fitly bee applied to any other Nation then vnto vs of Britaine, whose Land by the Almightie is so placed in the terrestrial globe, that thereby it is termed of the ancient, The Ends of the Earth, and deemed to be situated in another world; for so in an Oration that Agrippa made to the Iewes, and Agricola to his Romans, it is called: which made Solinus write, that the coast of France had bene the End of the Earth, had it not bene for Britaine, which was as another world. And in Dion we read, that the old Souldiers of Gallia, whom Claudius commanded for Britaine, complained that they must bee enforced to make warre out of the world. And of this Land and latter Apostle (if credit may be giuen to a Poet) Procopius thus recordeth:

Transijt Oceanum, & qua facit Insula Portum, Quasq; Britannus habet terras, quasq; ultima Thule.

He crost the seas vnto the land, and vtmost coasts of Thule, Arriving at the Ports and Isles where Britains bare the rule.

(7) Thus for Paul: well known in Rome by his long imprisonments, and (at that time) in reuerend regard for his doctrine with many there: among whom also there were some Britaines that embraced the faith, whereof Claudia Rufina (remembered by Martial another Poet) was one, whom he thus extols:

*Claudia ceruleis cum sit Rufina Britannis
Edita, cur Latia pectora plebis habet?
Quale decus forme? Romanam credere matres Italides possunt, Atthides esse suam.*

*How hath Dame Claudia, borne of Britaines blew, Won fame for wisdom with our fages grave?
Her comely forme and learning, as their due,
Rome claimes for hers, and hers would Athens haue.*

This Claudia is by the learned commended to haue bene most skilfull in the Greece and Latine tongues; of whom heere them (not me) speake. At the commandement of the Tyrant Nero (say they from Tacitus) many Noble Britaines were brought to Rome, who remaining there their Confederates, they held it an honour to haue their children named after the nobilitie of the Romans: and from Claudius Cesar was this Ladie Claudin named, who according to her worth was matched in marriage to Rufus a gentleman of Rome, then a Coronell, after a Senator, a man of a milde disposition, naturally modest, a great Philosopher in the Sect of the Stoikes, for his sweetnesse of behaviour called Pudens, who by his graue perswasions caused Martial (the witty but wanton Poet) to reforme many things in his writings, and by him is commended for his humanitie, pietie, learning, and eloquence: as also his wife Claudia the Britaine, for her beautie, faith, fruitfulness, learning, and languages. In proofe whereof, Bale hath mentioned three feuerall treatises, besides others by her compiled, both in the Greece and Latine tongues. Dorotheus nameth Pudens to be one of the seuentie two, and Volateranus affirmeth them both Pauls disciples, from whom he sendeth greeting to Timothens in these words: Eubulus and and Publius, and Linus, and Claudia, and all the brethren salute thee. But some may object, that Martial Claudia could not be that Ladie, who living in Neroes time gaue hospitalitie vnto Peter and Paul at their being in Rome, for that she could not retaine such beauntie and perfection as the Poet to her doth ascribe in the raigne of Domitian, the fourth in succession from Nero, the time being too long (saith Ado, Bishop of Treuers, Psuarius and others) for beauntie to be so freshly preferred. Now these account her age then to be fixtie; but if we reckon according to Enfubius, we shall see that hee sets the last of Claudius in the year of grace fiftie fixe, and the first of Domitian in eightie three, betwixt which are but twentie seven yeeres, and yet Paul came not to Rome till the tenth of Nero, and in his thirteenth year, from the prison wrote his Epistle to Timothie, as the same Enfubius declareth: so that from hence vnto Domitian, is left but fourteene yeeres, a time no whit vnpossible to retain e beauntie, though twentie yeeres and many more of her age had beene formerly spent; seeing that in those times Plutarch praiseth Alcibiades to be passing faire when he was threcore yeeres of age.

This Claudia then with Pauls spirituall Manna, is said to send likewise the choicest and chafest of the Poetics of Martial (whose verses generally are no lessons besitting Ladies) for new yeeres gifts vnto her friends in Britaine, both for to feede their Soules with the bread of life, and to instruct their minde with lessons best fitting vnto ciuill behauiour; which thing moued the Poet himselfe with no small selfe-glorie in his verse thus to write:

Dicitur & nostras cantare Britannia versus.
And Britaine now (they say) our verses learns to sing.

(8) It hath also passed with allowance among the learned Senate of our Antiquaries, that when Claudius & Nero began to banish and persecute the Christians in Rome, (whose superstitions, as Tacitus pleaseth to teame them, from Iudea had infected the Cities it selfe) many Romanes and Britaines being conuerted to the Faith, fled thence vnto their remote parts of the earth, where they might and did more freely enjoy the libertie of their Professions, vntill the enuie of Tyrants by the flame-light of Persecutions had found out all secret places for the safeties and assemblies of Gods Saints: as after in the daies of Dioclesian we shall finde. And from this Sanctuarie of Saluation the sad lamenting Lady Pomponia Graecina, the wife of Aulus Plautius (the first Lord Lieutenant of Britaine) brought that Religion, whereof she was accused and stood indicted vpon life and death, which was none other, then the Christian Profession, seeing the same both by Tacitus and Suetonius, is curie where termed the strange superstitions and new kinde of Sect that the Christians embraced, and for which they were accounted vnworthy to liue.

(9) And much about these times (as Beatus Rheanus in his Historie of Germanie, Pantaleon and others do report) one Suetonius a Noble mans sonne in Britaine conuerted to the Faith by the first Planters of the Gospel in this land, and after his Baptisme called Beatus, was sent by the Brethren from hence vnto Rome, to be better instructed, and further directed by Saint Peter himselfe; and returning thorow Switzerland, found such willingness and flocking of the people to heare and receiue the Doctrine of Christ, that he there flatted and built an Oratorie not farre from the lake Thun, and neare the Towne called Vnderfesen, where in preaching and praier he employed his time to the day of his death, which happened in the year of grace 110.

And that there were Christians in Britaine at these times I make no questiō, though some exceptions may be taken against the Monk of Burton the reporter thereof, who saith in the 141 yeare and raigne of Hadrian, nine masters of Grantecester were baptized themselves & preached to others the Gospel in Britaine; howsoever the faith in the Emperours name, which yeare was the second of Antonius Pius his successor, and ascribeth to these men Schoole-degrees, altogether vnknowne for nine hundred yeeres after, yet these do not hinder the truth of the thing, though that Monke was none of the best Historians. It is reported also that Patrick the Irish Apollie, and Canonized Saint, long before the Raigne of King Lucius preached the Gospel in many places of Wales; As also that Ninianus Bernicius of the race of the British Princes conuerted the Picts to the Religion of Christ. Vnto these aforesaid authorities and testimonies howsoever we stand affected: yet it is certaine by Cheminutius citing Sabellicus, that the Britaines were with the first Conuerts: And Tertullian, who liued within two hundred yeeres of Christis Natiuitie, sheweth no lesse: Who the more to prouoke the Iewes against whom he wrote, calleth to witnesse the fruitfull increase of the Gospel of Saluation, through many Countries and Nations, and among them nameth the Britaines to haue receiued the Word of life, the power whereof (saith he) hath pierced into those parts whither the Romanes could not come. Whence Petrus Cluniacensis suppoeth the Scottish men the more ancient Christians, as not being in the like subiection to the Romanes, as other then were.

(10) Origen, who flourished not much about two hundred yeeres after Christ, in his Homilies vpon Ezechiel sheweth, that the first fruits of Gods harvest was gathered in the land of Britaine: who conuerted to the Christian faith by the doctrine of their Druides: that taught one only God: with whom Helior Boetius agreeth, saying, that some of these Druides condemned the worship of God in Images, and allowed not the applicatio of the God-head vnto any visible forme: which might be the cause why Claudius the Emperour forbad their Religion, as fauouring in these things too much of Christianitie, whom likewise he banished Rome, as some from Suetonius coniecture. Of these Druides we shewed before, that their offices were most imploied about holy things, and that their doctrine chiefly consisted in teaching the immortallitie of the soule, the motions of the heauens, the nature of things, and the power of the Gods: yea and Poellus from others will inforce, that they prophesied likewise of a virgins conception. These were the helps, saith Tertullian, that caused the Britaines so soone to embrace the Doctrine of Christ, and thereupon immediately after his death doth Gyldas fasten our conuersion, where he writeth, That the Glorious Gospel of Iesus Christ, which first appeared to the world in the later time of Tiberius Caesar, did euen then spread his bright beames vpon this frozen land of Britaine.

(11) Whereby we see the waters of life, flowing from Ierusalem Temple, into these farre feild Countries and vttermost Seas, to be made both fruitful & wholesome, according to the sayings of the Prophet, that in that day the waters of life should issue from Ierusalem, halfe of them toward the East Sea, and halfe of them toward the vttermost Sea, and shall remaine fruitful both in Sommer and winter: and euen in the infancie of Christianitie, both the Apollies themselves, and also the Prophets their Disciples to become fishers therein for the Soules of Men, as Christ in chusing of them said they should bee; whereby his Kingdom was soone enlarged vnto these Ends of the Earth, and his Throne established among those Heathen, whom God his Father had giuen to be his. So fruitful and famous was this spreading of the Gospel, that Baptista Mantuan, a Christian Poet, compares the increase thereof with that of Noah, thus alluding vnto it:

Sicut aquis quondam Noe sua misit in orbem
Pignora sedatis, ut Gens humana per omnes Debita Caelitum Patri daret orgia terras;
Sic sua cunctos vellet Deus alta in regna reuerti, Discipulos quosdam transmissit ad Vltima Mundi Littora, docturos Gentes quo numina ritu Sint oranda, in quibus Caelum placabile Sacris.

The Lawes of God vnto the World aright;
So Christ his Seruants sent abroad to preach
The Word of Life, and Gospel to each Wight:
No place lay shadowed from that glorious Light:
The farthest Isles, and Earths remote bounds,
Embrace'd their Faith, and ioy'd at their sweet founts.

(12) To which effect also the sayings of S. Iohn Chrysostome, Bishop of Constantinople, enforce, who shewing the increase of Christianitie, and the successe of the Gospel preached, sheweth the power thereof to haue extended, not only to the Countries farre iacent in the Ocean it selfe, and amongst them exprelly nameth this our Britaine; whose Inhabitants (saith hee) haue also consented to the word which is planted in euery heart, in honour whereof they haue erected their Temples and Altars. And againe: Those Britaines (saith hee) which had formerly fed vpon humane flesh, making no difference betwixt the blood of man and beast, now through the power of the word by them embraced, haue learned the law of true pietie, and giue themselves to a religious abstinence, and holy fasts. Of which Barbarisme S. Ierome also complained, that some of those Nations vied to eat the buttocks of boies, and Paps of Virgins, which in their Feasts were ferued for the daintiest dishes. But elsewhere speaking of the Britaines conuersion, he saith, that they had turned themselves from their westerne Paganisme, and now had directed their faces towards Ierusalem in the East, whose beauntie shined in the word of God.

(13) And thus we see by the planting of the Gospel in this land, the saying of the Psalmist accomplished, that God would giue his Ionne Christ the Heathen for his inheritance, and the Ends of the Earth (the proper attribute of this our Britaine) to be his possession. And the successe in Historie most apparently sheweth these parts (by an especiall prerogative) to bee Christis Kingdom. For albeit that Ierusalem and Antioch may rightfully claime the precedence of all other places, the one being as it were the charner where Christians were first borne, and the other the font where they were first Christened with that most sacred name: yet Britaine in some other graces hath outstript them all, hauing the glory to be graced with the first Christian King that euer reigned in the world, which was our renowned Lucius, the first fruits of all the Kings that euer laud their Crowne at the foot of our Sauours Crosse: as also for producing the first Christian Emperour that euer by publicke authoritie established the Gospel thorow the world, which was Constantine the Great, borne and brought vp here in Britaine by Queene Helena, a most vertuous and religious British Lady: vnto whose daies the succession of Christianitie did here continue, as by the martyrdomes of many Saints vnder Dioclesian is apparant. Herein also reigned the King that first vncrowned the head of the vipersing Beast, and triple-headed Cerberus, and freed the Land from his decouring Locusts: putting downe Idolatrie with Heczekiel that brake the Brazen Serpent: and with Isack new digged the Wells that those Phylistines had stopped. And lastly hath this land produced that most royall and Christian Monarke, whose learned pen hath first depainted Antichrist, and pierced the heart of all Papall Supremacie, as the sword of Gedeon did Zalmunna (* the Image of trouble). King of Median. And as a Lion hath he met that crooked * Serpent in the way of his vipersurped authoritie; whereby in short time vndoubtedly the * Kall of his heart will be broken, if other Potentates likewise by his most goodly example, cast off the yoke of vassallage, and in their seuerall Dominions gouerne (as free Princes ought) the people that God hath committed to their charge. So that in those and many other the like Princes of this happy land, most properly is performed that propheticall promise made vnto the Church of Christ: that Kings should become her nursing Fathers, and Queenes should be her nursing Mothers: Of both which may be truly said to Britaine, in imitation of that of Salomon, Many kingdomes haue done gloriously, but thou hast surmounted them all.

(14) And of such power hath Christ bene in these His Possessions, that euen the Hostile Kings and Conquerours thereof, were they neuer so fange and idolatrous at their first entrance, yet when they here had feasted for a time they became milde and religious, and gladly submitted their hearts to the Religion of those, whose necks themselves held vnder the yoke of subiection.

(15) Such were the Romanes in this land, whose Deputies at the day-spring almost of Christianitie were conuerted; as Trebellianus, Pertinax, and others, which submitted themselves to that profession, and were mortuies to King Lucius more publicly to maintain the flame: as also Constantinus the father of great Constantine, that here in Britaine permitted the profession of the Gospel, with the erections of Churches for the true seruice of God, and prohibited the superstitious worships of the Gentiles.

(16) The Saxons after them (in time, but not in Idolatrie) had neuer tasted the liuing waters of Siloh, till they were here seated in Christis Possession, where they changed their affections as farre from their wonted manners, as did the Messengers to Iehu, which turned after his Chariot to destroy the Altars of Baal: or as Saul and his seruants, who no sooner had entred Naioth in Ramah, but that their spirits were ioined to the Prophets, and the heat of their furie, with their garments, cast downe at Samuels feet.

(17) The Danes likewise, their Conquerours, and Successors in this Royall Throne, euer vntill then were both bloody and barbarous, and therefore of all our Writers commonly called the Pagan Danes, whose many delolations and ruines remaine as records of their cruelties in many places euen vnto this day: yet being a while in this Land, King Guthurn, with thirtie of his chiefe Princes and people, were drawn by the valour and vertue of King Alured to receiue the Christian Faith, by whose bounty thereupon they enioied the possession of a faire portion of this Kingdom. And afterward Canutus, their great King, no sooner almost had this Imperiall Diademe set vpon his head, but that hee held it his chiefe Maignite to be the vassall of Christ, confessing him only to be King of Kings: and with such religious deuotion as then was taught, crowned the Crucifix at Winchester with the Crowne he wore: and neuer after, throw all his raigne, by any meanes would weare the same: and the Danes his Souldiers remaining in England, began by little and little to embrace Christianitie, and in short time were all conuerted to the Faith. Thus then we see the happie increase of these holy seeds springing from the furrows of this blessed ground: and the Tents of Sem to be spread vpon the Mountaines of Britaine, wherein God (according to his promise) perswaded vs who are of Iapheth, to dwell.

(18) As hitherto we haue searched the first foundation of our Faith, so neither want we testimonies concerning the continuance of the flame in this Land vnto following Posterities; although the iniurie of Time and Warre haue consumed many Records. For the Britaines that were daily strengthened in their receiued faith, by the Doctrine of many learned and godly men, left not their first loue with the Church of Epheesus, but rather tooke hold of their skirts, as the Prophet speaketh, vntill the tortures of Martyrdom cut them off by death: And those Fathers euen from the Disciples themselves, held a succession in Doctrine, (notwithstanding some repugnancie was made by the Pagans) and preached the Gospel with good successe, euen till the flame at length went forth with a bolder countenance, by the fauourable Edicts of Adrian, Antonius Pius, and Marcus Aurelius Emperors of Rome (as Enfubius hath noted:) and in Britaine was established by the authoritie of Lucius their King: whereby this was the first of all the Prouinces (saith Marcus Sabellicus) that receiued the Faith by publicke ordinance: Of the teachers of those times Bale from

*Sicut erat celebris cultu numeroq. Deorum Cum Iouis imperium staret, Britannica tellus:
Sic ubi terrestres celo descendit ad aras
Espectata salus, patribus fuit incerta sanctis.
Qui Neptunicolim campos, & Cambricam rura,

*As were the Brittaines famous for their zeale
To Gentle Gods, whilst such they did adore,
So, when the Heavens to Earth did Truth reveale, Bless'd was that Land with Truth and Learnings store:
Whence British Plains, and Cambrins desert ground,
And Cornwalls Crags, with glorious Saints abound.*

In which number were Elianus & Medunius, those two learned Divines, which were sent by King Lucius unto Eleutherius Bishop of Rome, with whom returned two other famous Clerks, whose names were Euganius and Damianus; these together, both preached and baptized amongst the Brittaines, whereby many daile were dravne to the Faith: And, as a worthy and ancient Historian saith: The Temples which had bene founded to the Honour of their many Gods, were then dedicated to the one and only true God: For there were in Brittain eight and twenty Temples, and three Arch-Summs, in stead of which, for many Bishops and Arch-bishops were appointed: under the Archbishop of London were the Provinces of Loegria and Cornubia: under Yorke, Deira, and Albania: under Yrbs Legionum, Cambria: By which means, this happy Kingdome vnder that godly King, was nobly beautified with so many Cathedral Churches, and Christian Bishops Sees, before any other kingdome of the world.

That this Lucius should be the Apostle to the Baunians, or that his sister Emenita was crowned with the flames of Martyrdom fifteen years after his death, I leave to the credit of Aegidius Scandus, and Hermanus Schedelius the reporters, and to the best liking of the readers. But most certain it is, that the Christian Faith was still professed in this land, found and vndeified, as Beda witnesseth, notwithstanding the cruel persecutions of the bloody Emperours.

For, all this time (saith the said Dieticus) Christian Religion flourished quietly in Britannia, till in Diolethians time, their Churches were demolished, their holy Bibles cast into Bon-fires, the Priests with their faithful flocke bloodily murdered. In which number, about the year two hundred ninety three, as we read (in Beda, Malmebury, Randolphus, and others) Albanus with his teacher Amphibalus were both of them martyred for the profession of the Gospel at the old Towne Ferolaminum: as also in Leicester, those two Noble Citizens, Aaron, and Iulius, with multitudes both of men and women in sundrie places (saith Beda) as shortly after no less then a Thousand Saints suffered death at Lichfield, wherupon the place was called another Golgotha, or field of blood: In memorie whereof, the Cite beareth for Armes to this day, in an Eshucheon of Landspit, sundry persons diversly Martyred. And yet after these times also the Brittaines continued constant in Christianity, and the censures of their Bishops (for the great estimation of their Constancie, pietie, and learning) required, and approved in great points of Doctrine among the assemblies of some General Councils; as that of Sardis and Nice, in the time of great Constantine (the first Christian Emperour, and this our Country man, whose blessed daies gave freeway to that Profession, to the Councils Authoritie, and to the whole world Peace) had we our Bishops present; whose forwardness against the Arrian Heresie, afterwards Atanasius aduanceth in his Apology unto Ioaninus the Emperour, among three hundred Bishops assembled at the Council of Sardis, in Anno three hundred and fiftie: whose words (as Nicephorus reports them) are these. Know most Christian Emperour (saith he) that this faith hath bene alwaies preached and professed, and that all Churches of Spain, Britain, France and Germany at this day with one voice doe approve the same. As also at that of Ariminum, in the year three hundred fiftie nine, and in the reign of Constantinus, who caused foure hundred welterne Bishops to be there summoned in fauour of the Arrians, whereof three were out of Brittain, (as Salpustius Senecus the good Bishop of Burges hath reported) that gaue their suffrages against that Heresie. These doth Hilarie tearme the Bishops of the Provinces of Brittain, by whom they were somewhat derided, because beinge farre from their owne Countie they liued vpon the Emperours charge. And Beda testifieth, that from Diolethians time they both rectified their former Temples, and founded new also in memorie of their then fresh-bleeding Martyrs, and enioyed a generall and ioyfull peace in their religious profession, till that Arrian Heresie hauing first filled the Continent, sought and found passage ouer the Seas into our Island.

Gennadius in his Catalogue Illustrum Dinorum tells vs of another learned Bishop of Brittain, Eustidius, who in the time of Cessius Bishop of Rome, wrote vnto one Fatalis a booke de uita Christiana, and another de uiderute seruanda; of much diuine learning and comfort. Chrysanthus likewise is recorded by Nicephorus, to be sonne of Bishop Artian, who hauing bene a Consular Deputie in Italie vnder Theodosius, and made Lieutenant of Brittain, where with great praile he managed the common wealth, was against his will afterward made Bishop at Constantinople of the Neonians, that called themselves Cathari, that is, pure, makinge a schisme in the Church by their denial of Saluation, to such as fell into relapse of sinne after Baptisme once received. This is that Bishop of whom we read, that of all his Ecclesiastical reuenues he reserved only for himselfe two loaves of bread vpon the Lords day. And in the first Tome of Councils is mention of Restitutus Bishop of London, whom (because that, as is most probable, Christian Religion had in those primitive times taken more firme footing in Brittain then in France) the French Bishops called to their National Council, the second at Arles, in Anno three hundred thirty five, that he might with his Suffrage approve their Decrees. About the year foure hundred fcutenty, was a Provinciall Council held in Brittain for the reforming of Religion, and repairing of the ruined Churches, which the Pagan marriage of Vortiger had decayed, to the great griefe and discontent of the people, a pregnant signe of the continuing zeale, which vnto those daies had left a glorious memorie.

(20) And the Ensigne of Arthur, wherein the Virgin with her sonne in her armes (as is noted by Pancientius) was portraied, so often displayed for Christ, and his Countie libertie, against the Pagan Saxons, is as a seale to confirme vs of their Profession, and doth shew the badge of that ages Christianity. But the famous Monastrie of Banchor, as a College of diuine Philosophers, and by Clarinalensis truly acknowledged to be the Mother of all other in the world, and her Monkes distributed into seuen feuerall parts, euery part numbering three hundred soules, and earning their bread by their daily labours, doth notably witness to all succeeding ages, that Christian Religion was then both planted and preached in this Island. And in the Synod held at Austins Oke were seuen old Britaine Bishops, besides other Doctours, who met with that Romane Legate, and not in points of doctrine, but rather in their feuerall rites and ceremonies did varie, by any thing that in that Assemblies appeared. For as it is most vndeoubted, that (if we speake properly) Ierusalem is the Mother of vs all, and of all Churches; and our former allegations doe euince, that the first Plantation of the British Faith was altogether by Iewes and others of the Easterne Church: so the very rites of this Religious College of Banchor do euidently proue, that their first institution in Religion came from the East, Beda shewing that in all of them they differed from the Romane Church; yea, and that they neuer did, nor then would acknowledge any authoritie of the Bishop (shop of Rome ouer them in matters of the Church and service of God. All which accordeth right well with that before cited out of Zachary, that the waters of life should issue from Ierusalem. And S. Hierome, who spake most properly, in laying the Brittaines leauing Paganisme, had turned their faces to Ierusalem in the East.

The foundation of the said College is ascribed to King Lucius, from whose time vnto the entrance of this Austlin the Monke, foure hundred thirty eight yeeres were expired: in all which space we haue seene that the Christian Faith was both taught and embraced in this land, notwithstanding the continuall persecutions of the Romans, Huns, Visits, and Saxons: which last made such defolations in the outward face of the Church, that they droue the Christian Bishops into the deserts of Cornwall and Wales. In which number were Theomius and Thadocius Bishops of London and Torke, chusing rather to suffer aduerlity with the people of God, then to enioy the pleasures of sinne for a season. By whose labours the Gospel was plentifully propagated among those vast mountainies, and those parts especially about all other made very glorious, by the multitudes of their holy Saints and learned Teachers.

(21) Lastly, (for the close of all) that these testimonies are sincerely vs produced, for the first preaching and planting of the Gospel, and by such means and men as we haue declared, and particularly by Ioseph of Arimatea and his associates, the content of all Writers, both forraigne and home-bred, doth sufficiently approve: and the recurent regard had of the place, with the many Charters thereof to this day remaining, are strong inducements for those our first Apostles Residences and Burials: whereof one, exemplified vnder the Seale of King Edward the third, is to be seene at this day, reciting that the Abbey of Glasterburie being burned in the time of King Henrie the second while it was in his hands, at the request of the Patriarke of Ierusalem (then present in England) inquired further both by the Bishops and Nobilitie, hee did rectifie the same, causing diligent search to be made for the ancient Charters of that foundation, and among many recited in that exemplification, in one of them it is called, Origo Religionis in Anglia: in another, Tumulum Sanctorum, ab ipsius discipulis Domini edificatum, fuisse venerabilem. Also in the same Charter amongst many other Kings, there is mention made of King Arthur, to be a great Benefactor vnto that Abbey; whose Armes vpon the stone walles, both in the Chappell (called S. Ioseph) and in diuers other places of the Abbey, are cut: which is an Eshucheon, whereon a Crosse with the Virgin Mary in the first quarter is set, and is yet to this day remaining ouer the Gate of entrance, and is held to be also the Armes of that Abbey. This place is said to haue bene given to Ioseph and his brethren, by Arviragus then King of Brittain: and from hence were those two diuine Doctours sent to Euthierus by King Lucius, as by their Epithetes doth appeare: the one of them called Elianus Aulonius, or of Glasterburie; and the other, Medunius of Belga, that is, Welles, nere vnto this place. And to these persons and place, Polydore Virgil, that dwelled among vs, and had perused most of our Antiquities, ascribeth the originall and precedence of our Christian Faith, in these words: Haec omnia Christianae pietatis in Britannia existere primordia, quam deinde Lucius Rex accendit & adauxit, &c. And our other later Writers likewise with him agree of this place, further affirming, that at first but poore, and without all pompe, it was their Oratorie, built only of wretchen wands, as both Capgrave, Bale, Maier, Scrope, Harding, Thorne, and others affirme: Afterwards by diuers Princes raised vnto greater glory, with many large priuileges & Charters granted; to wit, of Edgar, Elmund, Elfred, Edward, Bringwalthus, Kentwin, Baldred, Ina, Kenwall, the Conquerour, Rufus, and others: all which were diligently perused by King Henry the second, as we haue said, & that Rectorie in these Charters continually termed The Graue of Saints: The mother Church: The Disciples foundation, and dedicated vnto Christ, as the first place in this Land wherein his Gospel was first preached and embraced.

(22) To conclude this digression, growen much greater then was intended, we see it is most apparant, that the Brittaines had a settled opinion in Christianity, before the found thereof was heard from Rome; and that the Lord had here set vp his Standard, whereunto these Islanders resorted as to the Tower of their strength, and was the first Kingdome of the Gentiles, that are said to bring their James thus in their armes, and their daughters thus vpon their shoulders, vnto the Lords Sanctuarie: whose knowledge continually increasing, hath hitherto, to Englands great ioy and fame, bene still continued, though the spiritual sparkes thereof for a season haue sometimes bene couered in the cinders of the Pagans defolations, or with the superstitious worships of mans inventions; both which now dispersed as clouds before the Sunne, the light appeareth in his full strength, and the most pure waters of the word run vntroubled. This land then, in this thing made happy before the most, the inhabitants became Instrumens of others, and in their earthly needs bare this heavenly liquor, which thorow their golden Conduits ran into many other Countie, and filled their Cesternes with this water of life. For from hence was Netherland conuerted to Christianity, as testifieth the story of Switzerland: Burgundie by our Columbanus, saith Siebert: Scotland by Brandanus, as Bernard the French Monke affirmeth: Swedenia by Gallus, as saith Petrus de Natalibus; and Frissa by Wilfred, as is recorded by Beda and Matthew of Westminster: the Francians, Hestians, and Thuringians, by Winifred our Deuonshire man: the Norwegians by Nicolas Brekspere of Middlesex; and the Lithuanians by Thomas Walden of Essex. Again, if we shall call our eie on all the Reformed Churches in Christendome, and with them on Luther, Husse, and Prage, they will all confesse, they first deriued their light from the learned Wickliffe of Oxford; the Lampe of whose sacred knowledge hath illuminated not onely all the corners of this Kingdome, but also all those forraigne States, whom it hath pleased God to deliuer from the thraldome and vengeance of Babylon: so that with the German Poet, to Gods glorie, and Brittaines praile, the English thus may sing:

Quin se Religio multum debere Britannis Seruata, & late circum dispersa, fatear.

*Religion doth confesse, to Brittaine deepe she stands
In debt, by whom preserued she now firs forraigne Lands.*

In which regard, Polydore Virgil doth rightly call England the Parent or Mother-Monastrie of all Europe. As likewise Peter Ramus termeth Brittain to be twice Schoole-mistresse vnto the Kingdome of France. And the Annals of Flanders testifie, that no Nation had so many Diuine Nobles (they might likewise haue said, so many Noble Diuines) as England hath had; neither any more bountifull to Gods Saints. Our Kings for sanctitie ranked before all other Potentates of the earth, as Vincencius recordeth: Our Nobles truly honourable, and the sonnes of Princes: Our Diuines and renowned Nurseries of learning and Religion, shining like the two greater lights in our British firmament. CHAPTER X.

Ann. Do. 70.

But leaving Christi proceedings to the dispose of himselfe, let vs returne to the subiect from whence wee haue wandered, and continue the successions of Great Brittaines Monarchs, vnto them that haue held it, whether by chance of warre, or voice of Election: In which sort (as is said) Galba got it, and but short time kept it: And from him Otho tooke it, and a shorter time enioied it.

Otho his original.
Tacit. Hist. 2. cap. 17.

(2) Whose Original (sith Tacitus) was from Ferrentum, his Father a Consull, his mothers blood somewhat disparaged, but yet not base; his youth run ouer with voluptuous wantonnesse and prodigall expences, more ready for disturbances, then depending vpon preferment or dignitie of State; and hauing gone thorough all his wealth, retained onely the heartie affections of the Souldiers, which Galba had vtterly alienated. Neither did Otho himselfe bandy against Galba, but Vitellius in Germanie was fauoured against both; Two persons so vile and ambitious, as was much feared, would proue the scourge of the Empire, and the ruine of Rome.

Vitellius much fauoured.

(3) Vnto Vitellius sided the Brittaines, vnder the Conduct of Trebellius Maximus, (remembered before) a man vnfit for warre, and vnexperienced of seruice, compounded altogether of conceitnesse, and for his niggardly sparings, and vnmmerciful pollings, exceedingly hated of his Armie: which was further aggravated by Rafcius Calus, Lieutenant of the twentieth Legion, his ancient Enemy, betwixt whom the sparks of enmie shortly burst forth into flames of reciprocal accusations. Trebellius being charged of insufficiency for command, with the begging of the Province, and Legions; and he againe accusing Calus of factious behaviours, & diffusing of discipline: through which dissensions a negligent regard was held of the Souldiers, who carried themselves arrogantly, euen against both; and as men that had rather be doing ill, then doing nothing, grew daily into mutinies. In these strifes Maximus finding himself vnable to withstand Rafcius, (the common affection swaying on his side) with his friends and followers entred Germanie in the quarrell of Vitellius, and joined those British forces to maintain his cause, who now presuming vpon his owne strength, and others his Confederates, ambitiously plaied the Prince, growne to that height euen of nothing.

Rafcius Calus & Trebellius accuse each other.

(4) Otho his Concurrent (in this thing only commendable, fought by all meanes to stay the effusion of more ciuill blood, and that already spent, so possessed his thoughts, that his minde was still distracted and nightly affrighted with the seeming appearance of Galbaes ghost: for which causes hee sent conditions of peace to Vitellius, offering him an equal part in the Empire, and to giue him also his daughter in marriage. But Vitellius disdainning any competition, refuseth all Capitulations, and prepares himselfe for the warre. Otho thus constrained, sets forth his forces, and in three feall skirmishes had the victorie, but in the fourth at Brixellum lost the daie; yet not so much weakened or vnrecouerable, (his Armie in number and courage surmounting the other) as himselfe was vnwilling to trie the chance of warre any more; for being importuned by his Captaines and Leaders, to re-enforce the Battaille, with many reasons, and probabilities of an assured victorie, in a thankfull and short Oration, answered thus their Petitions.

(5) To hazard your vertues and valours for one Mans estate, I hold dangerous, and needlesse if it, that my life should be prized at so deere a rate; already fortune and I haue had sufficient experience each of others, and not the least in this my short time of glorie, wherein I haue learned, it is harder to moderate affections in the excess of felicitie, then either industrie or hazard for attaining the same. These ciuill warres Vitellius beganne; which I for my part purpose not to continue, and hereby let Posteritie esteeme of Otho, that others haue kept the Empire longer, but neuer any that left it more valiantly. Let this minde therefore accompany me to the Grane, that you for your parts would haue died for my sake, and I to saue your liues die voluntarie and vnuanquished. I blame not the Gods, nor enuie your Emperors rising glorie: It is sufficient that my house hath touched the highest strain of Honour, and my selfe to be left in records, The soveraign Monarch of the World.

(6) And thereupon solemnly taking his leaue of the whole Army, went to his Tent, and with his dagger wounded himselfe vnder the left pappe, whereof immediately he died, in the year of his age thirty seuen, and daies of his raigne nineteen sine. He was of stature but lowe, feeble in his feete, and vnto so great a minde, his bodie not any waies proportionable; his face without haire and woman-like, his attire nice and delicate, and his life and death nothing at all consonant or agreeable.

Hen certaine newes of Othoes death was brought Vitellius, he presently assumed the name of Caesar, and administred the affairs of the Empire, with no lesse authoritie then the absolute Commander of the World. And of such acceptance was the accident, that he dedicated the dagger wherewith it was done, vnto Mars in his Temple at Colley, as the luckie instrument of his aduanced Estate.

(2) Naturally ambitious hee was, and now the same the more inhaunched by his strengths of the German Souldiers, and the flatteries of the Senate, which euer bare faile with the fairest winde. His entrance into Rome was about measure magnificall, hauing the naked sword of Iulius Caesar borne before him, with sound of Trumpets, Ensignes, Standards, Banners, and Flags, accompanied with an Armie worthie of a better Prince then Vitellius was.

(3) His original is diuerly reported: either framed according to the affections of his flatterers, or blasted with the tongues of deprauing back-biters; & both in extremes, extremely disagreeing. For Quintus Ennius, as Suetonius writeth, deduceth his descent from Fannius King of Aborigines, and Lady Vitellia his wife, worshipped in many places for a Goddess. But Cassius Severus affirmeth him to be sprung from a better roote then a Cobyler, and a common naughty-packer the daughter of a Baker. Howsoeuer, true it is, that Lucius his father bare thrice the Consulship in Rome, was Prouost of Syria, and in such credit with the Emperour Claudius, that in his absence and expedition into Britaine, he had the whole charge of the Empire committed vnto him: himselfe in special fauour with Tiberius, and in use for his trumpets: with Caius, for his Chariot-running: with Claudius, for his dice-playing: and with Nero, for his flatterie: vnto whose Ghost in publike shew hee sacrificed, and disposed the Imperiall affaires at the discretion of base Stage-Players.

(4) His vnmeasurable gluttony was such, that the whole imployments of his Capitaines were to provide him Cates, and that in such excess, that two thousand dishes of fish, and seven thousand of fowle, were serued to his Table at one supper; and yet was he not affamed to commend his owne Temperance, in a set Oration before the Senate and People, who well knew him to be guiltlesse of that vertue: in so much that Tacitus reporteth, in those few moneths wherein hee raigned, he had wasted nine hundred millions of sesterces, which amounteth to seven millions, thirty one thousand, two hundred fiftie pounds sterling. And Iosephus thinketh if he had liued longer, the whole reuenues of the Empire had not bene sufficient to maintaine his Gluttonie. A Prince otherwise no way memorable, as being indeed without skill in profession of Armes, without counsell in matters of the greatest importance, commonly drowned in surfeit, and farre vnmeet to wield weighty affaires.

(2) These defects found ready vent to his Opposites, and gaue libertie of speech in the Assemblies of their Estates: amongst whom Vespasian was held the only Morning-Starre, worthy to ascend on the setting of this darkend Sunne, vnto whom Licinius Mutianus, Gouernour of Syria, was no aserle, Marcus Clnius Rufus of Spaine stood very well affected, and Tiberius Alexander of Aegypt for him the formost. All with him sided the Kings Sohemus, Antiochus, and Agrippa, with the beautifull Queene Berenice: vnto whom Vespasian and his sonne Titus were well knownen, Gouernours together in the Prouinces of Syria and Iudaea.

(6) The first that did reuolt were the Illyrian Bands: to suppress which, Vitellius sent vnto Vespasian Bolanus Lieutenant of Brittain, for aid of that Province, hauing had good experience of their seruice in his warres before. As when Hordoneus Flaccus brought eight thousand Brittaines to his quarrell against Otho. As also when Trebellius Maximus (formerly mentioned) joined them to the German forces. Which last man had now againe resumed his former place in Britannie, without either Maistie or Authority; but rather ruled by way of intreatie, and at the discretion of the Souldiers.

(7) Vnto whom, this Vespasian Bolanus succeeded for Deputie: a man of no great parts in warre, but more temperate, and not odious for any crime. His answer vnto Vitellius was, that the Countrey of Brittain stood not so quiet, that he might spare any number thence, the Souldiers and Confederates hauing their hands full, to hold all vpright. Neither (in truth) were they fast to his side, but rather affected Vespasian, whose reputation in warlike affaires was first gotten amongst them in Brittain, in the raigne of Claudius: though we find in Tacitus, that the Vexillaries of three British Legions followed Vitellius in his expedition against the Illyrian Armie, wherein the flower and strength of all the Brittaines are reported to haue been, and that their fourteenth Legion came to his aide, in whom notwithstanding he had no good confidence: but hearing the daily reuolts of the Prouinces, and the approach of Vespasian, was minded to resigne his dignitie vnto him, had not the out-cries of the people bene against it.

(8) Finally, when he had raigned only eight moneths, and five daies, as Iosephus accounteth, he was slaine in most ignominious manner: for his hands were bound behinde his backe, a halter fast about his necke, his clothes rent and torne, a sword point set vnder his chinne, and head held backward by a bush

O acceptable was the fall of this Prince, and such hopes reuiued at the entrance of his Successour, as that all mens mindes were raised to an expectation, that the glorie of the Empire, so much eclipsed through the ciuill broiles of Galba, Otho, and this last

Vitellius, should now shine againe in the beaurie of her former libertie, by the desired gouernement of aged Vespasian; whose integritie, valour, and seruice, had bene sufficiently approved by his many Expeditions in all the Provinces wherein he had to doe.

(2) His descent was from the Flavian family, and that but base and obscure: his Father called Titus Flavius, his Mother Polla Vespasia, his Wife Domitia, and his Sonnes Titus, and Domitian, both Emperours succeeding after him.

(3) In his young yeares, hee serued as a Militarie Tribune in the Countrey of Thracia, and as Questor in the Provinces of Crete, and Cyrene: Vnder Claudius the Emperour, he went forth into Germanie, as Lieutenant of a Band, and from thence was sent into Britaine, to be Leader of the second Legion, where the foundation of that greatnes whereunto after hee attained, was first laid: for as Suetonius hath written, therein with victorie hee fought thirty set Battales, and was also Conquerour of the Ile of Wight: whereby two mightie Nations were subdued to the Romanes, and twentie Townes wonne from the Britaines: for which exploits he had Triumphall ornaments, worthily assigned him by Claudius, whose owne Triumph, (as Josephus saith) was gotten without his paines, but by the only prowess of Vespasian. After this, he gouerned Africke with singular integritie and much honour, and was lastly sent by Nero for his Vice-roy into Syria vpon this occasion.

(4) There had bene spread thorow all the East parts, an old Prophecie and felied opinion constantly beleued, that it was appointed by the Destinies, there should come out of Iurie him that should be Lord of the whole world: which how it serued for the Iewes to reuolt, or for the Romanes to apply onely vnto Vespasian, the euent sheweth, which cannot agree to any other, then to the person and power of Christ Iesus, there borne, and throughout the whole world still reigning: Yet vpon the confidence of such an accomplishment, the Iewes reuolted from the Romanes obedience, and slew their President Sabinus by name, putting to flight Gallus, Lieutenant General of Syria, that came to his aide, and got from him the maine Standard, or Ensigne of the Eagle. This Nation was so populous and strong, that none was thought fitter to stay their attempts, then was Vespasian, who with great honour and approbation, reduced that Province vnto their former subiection, and there remained the short time of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius their Raignes, of whose proceedings there Josephus writeth at large, vnto whom I must referre the vnatisfied Reader.

(5) All which times, the ciuill stirres amongst the Romanes, gaue the Provinces occasion to attempt their former libertie; as did the Batauians, Germanes and French, with whom the Britaines also rooke hart to reuolt: But the first that sided with Vespasian, were two thousand expert Souldiers, drawne out of the Mesian Legions, and sent to aide Otho against Vitellius; who marching as farre as Aquileia, they heard there of the certaine death of Otho, and thereupon taking the aduantage of the offered opportunitie, with an vncontrolled libertie, committed many robberies and outragious villanies: In so much, that fearing condigne punishment, they held it their best policie, to combine some speciall man by their fauours vnto them, whereby their facts might bee either quite smothered, or lightly repared: neither in their opinions was any so gracious for desert or power, as was Vespasian, and therefore with one assent they proclaimed him Emperour, and wrote his name in their Banners, thinking themselves as worthy to make an Emperour, as were the Legions either of Spain, or Germany.

(6) Of the like minde were his owne Legions in Syria and Iurie, growne now so famous by the prosecution of those warres, that they highly conceited his his valour, and their owne sufficiency to bee inferiour to none: And therefore all on the sudden at Cæsarea, both Captaine and Souldier salute him Emperour; which title when he resolutely gainesaid and refused, with drawne swords they threatened his death. Thus their being brought into danger euery way, he sent his letters vnto Tiberius Alexander, Lieutenant of Aegypt, who likewise at Alexandria, presently proclaimed him Emperour.

(7) At this time Vettius Bolanus sent by Vitellius, was Lieutenant of Britaine, there ruling in a gentler and milder manner then was fit for so fierce a Nation: for the Souldiers hauing gotten head, by the remisse Gouernment of Trebellius Maximus, continued the same loosenesse in discipline still; and Bolanus in stead of awe and Obedience, retained onely their affections and good wils. But most especially the short Raignes of these last Emperours (whose beginnings were altogether imploied to fatisfie their licentious pleasures, and latter times spent for the defense of their Liues from violent Deaths) gaue way to many imperfections of the Gouernors, and midemeanours of the common Souldiers.

(8) But when Vespasian had assumed the Empire, great Captaine and good Souldier, were sent into the Provinces, and into Britaine, Petilius Cerealis, that had formerly there made prooue of his seruice vnder Nero, in the warres against Boduo, and afterwards in other parts, as against the Gauls and Batauians, with prosperous victories. The fame of this man strooke great terror into the hearts of the wauering Britains, and amongst them of the Brigantes, the most populous State of the whole Province: against whom at his first approach he warred, and in many battles, and some of them bloody, the greatest part of these people were wasted, and their Countrey came into the Romish subiection.

(9) Whereby the glory of Cerealis might well haue dimmed the fame of his Successour, had not Julius Frontinus a great Souldier also, sustained the charge with reputation and credit, in subduing the strong and Warlike nation the Silures: where he had, beside the force of the enemy to struggle with, the straits, and difficult places of rocks and mountaines, for access.

(10) After whose gouernment (no further Acts being mentioned) Julius Agricola, who in Rome had bene Questor, Tribune, and Pretor, and Lieutenant in Aquitania, was sent General into Britaine by Vespasian the Emperour, the yeere before his death. This man formerly had there serued vnder the command of Petilius Cerealis, whereby hee had gained experience both of the People and Province; and at his first approach gathered the Ensignes of the Legions, and other aids of the Auxiliaries, (who for that yeere attended an end of their trauels, because the Summer was almost spent) left by protracting time, the violence of the Ordovices should further burst forth, who a litle before his entrance, had vterly almost cut off a wing which lay on their Borders, the rest of the Countrey, as men desirous of Warre, allowing their example.

Against these Agricola addressed, who kept themselves in places of aduantage, and durst not defend into indifferent ground. Hee therefore being himselfe foremost, lead vp his Armie to their encounter, and seconded with the courage of his trained Souldiers, put them all to sword and flight, whereby the whole Nation was almost quite destroyed.

(11) And now that his fame began to ascend, he knew well that with instance it must be followed, and as the first affaires had issue, the rest would succede; he therefore deliberated to conquer the Iland Mona, from the possession whereof Paulinus Suetonius was reuoked, by the general Rebellion vnder Boduo. But in a purpose not purposed before, and ships wanting, the policie of the Captaine deuised a passage; for hee commanded the most choice of the Aids, to whom the shallowes were well known (and without whom the Romanes did almost attempt nothing) to put ouer at once, and suddenly to invade them. These Britains, after the vse of their Countrey manner, were most skilfull swimmers, and in swimming armed, able to gouerne themselves and horses. The *Mona*ns thinking themselves secure, for that no Ships were scene in their Riuer, now thus suddenly surprized, as men amazed, firmly thought that nothing could bee inuincible to them, who came with such resolutions to Warre, and therefore they humbly desired Peace, and yielded the Iland vnto *Agricola*s deuotion.

(12) Who now in these prosperous proceedings of his fortunes, fought not with any glorious relations or letters of aduertisements, to improve and augment the greatnesse of his honour; but rather in seeking to suppress his fame, made it shine more bright; and addressing himselfe for ciuill gouernment, reformed many abuses in his House, his Campe, and in the whole Province, and those especially that most touched the poorer sort, as by moderating the increase of Tribute and Corne, wherewith the Britains were daily burdened: by the suppressing of which enormities (and the like) an honourable opinion of him was euery where entertained, and a general inclination vnto Peace, which partly by the negligence, partly by the auarice of former Gouernours, had bene no lesse feared then Warre it selfe.

(13) And whereas the Britains hitherto still harried with Oppressions and Warres, had little leisure or will to apply themselves to things which accompany Peace, and are the ornaments of Ciuill and settled Societies, and therefore were prone vpon euery occasion to reuolt and stirre: to induce them by pleasures to quietnesse and rest, he exhorted them in private, and help them in publike, to build Temples, Houses, and Places of Assemblies, and common resorts, and likewise provided that the Sonnes of their Nobles should be instructed in the liberal Arts and Sciences, commending the industrie, and preferring the wits of the Britains before the Students of France, as being now grown curiouse to attaine the Eloquence of the Roman Gentrie, (yea euen the Gowne, the habit of peace and peaceable Arts) and to delight in gorgeous Buildings, Banquets, and Baths.

(14) And thus farre had Agricola proceeded before the death of Vespasian, whose managing of the Imperiall dignitie was euery way answerable to so high a place, and whose death was as much lamented, as his Vertues did furmount his Predecessours. But as touching his miraculous cures of the Blinde and the Lame, as they serue not either to bee vrged or inserted in this our present Historie; so yet may they conuince the indurate Atheists, whose conscience is feared with the sinne of incredulitie of the Miracles wrought by our blessed Saviour Iesus Christ. For if the wisest Historians of those times haue beleueed themselves, and left Records vpon their credit to following posterities, that by his touch onely hee cured a Lame-man, and with his spittle opened the eies of the Blinde, being a mortall and sinfull man; shall it then be doubted, that hee which knew no sinne, neither receiued the gift by measure, either in power could not, or in act did not worke such Miracles as were the witnesses of his Godhead, and for such are recorded to confirme our faith? But to our purpose.

(15) When Vespasian had liued threescore and nine yeeres, seuen moneths, and seuen daies, and had reigned ten yeeres, as Eusebius saith, hee died peaceably in his Bed; which no Emperour since Augustus cuer did, having bene a great Scourge and Instrument of God against the miserable Iewes; whose kingly race from Dauids line hee fought by all meanes to extirpate, that so all their hopes and expectations might for euer be cut off.

(16) Hee was of a middle stature, well set, and strongly compact: his countenance not altogether amiable, neither any waies deformed; a great fauourer of Learning, very Liberal, a Iust, Wise, and most Valiant Prince.

at his death.

Recently vpon the death of this Emperour, Titus his eldest sonne, surnamed Flavius Vespasian, without all contradiction was receiued and obeyed for his rightfull successor: as well for that his Father in his lifetime had made him his Partner in the Empire, and at his death by Testament declared him his Heire, as also for the generall opinion conceived of him, for his inbred goodnes and noble conditions; called & esteemed the lonely darling and delight of mankind. Indeed of a most comely presence he was, & fitted thereunto with all heroically vertues, a great Souldier, learned in the Arts, a good Orator, a skillfull Musitian, and could by artificiall characters write both very fast and very faire.

(2) His youth he spent in Militaric qualities, and served in Germanie and Britaine with exceeding commendations, and in Iurie warred with the like glories, which is nothing impaired by the learned stile of his Recorder Iosephus, vnto whom againe for these affaires I must referre the curious Reader.

(3) Ierusalem, with the slaughter of cleuen thousand Iewes, euen on the birth day of his daughter, with such honour he wonne, that thereupon presently he was saluted Emperour, euen in the life time of Vespasian his Father: and from that day carried himselfe as his Associate in the Empire; for with him hee Triumphed, and with him he jointly administered the Censorship, his Colleague he was in the Tribunes authoritie; and his Companion also in seuen Consulships: In all which, though the Edicts went forth in his fathers name, yet were they penned by himselfe. Of this his victorie over the Iewes, hee left the remembrance to posteritie by stamping vpon the reverse of his coines IVD. CAP. with pictures expressing his Triumph and the Iewes overthrow, which in the front of this Chapter we haue also placed.

(4) Somewhat he was blemished with the loue of Berenice, the beautifulle Queene of Iewes, and much more with the murder of Julius Civilis, by through icalousie conceived of her: and whether what was the sinne whereof at his death he repented, is vnertain, when lifting vp his eyes to Heauen, hee complained why his Life should be taken from him, that excepting one offence defered not to die. As himselfe in glorie wielded the Emperiall Scepter, so did his Substitutes gouerne the Provinces; at which time in Britaine, Agricola was President, and therein had spent almost two yeares vnder the raigne of Vespasian, in such manner as wee haue declared.

(5) In his third yeare, he discovered new Countreies, and parts of this Iland, yet vnouched, or at leastwise not thoroughly subdued, as altogether vninhabited of that which was gotten, & sought to draw the confines of the Empire with a larger compass: therefore marching Northward to the Frith of Taus, waited all as he went, and without any resistance fortified the places with Castles and Bulwarkes, which hee stored with sufficient prouision; where euerie Garrison winning, garded it selfe, and with the Summers seruice, euer repaired the Winters euents, whereby euermore the Enemy went to the worse, and his designs prospered as himselfe wished.

(6) The fourth Summer was spent in perusing and ordering that which he had ouer-runne. And if the glory of the Romane name could haue permitted, or so beene satisfied, it needed not to haue sought other limits of Britaine: for Glota and Bodotria, two armes of two opposite Seas, shooting farre into the Land, and onely diuided asunder by a narrow partition of ground, the same was both garded and fortified with Castles and Garrisons: so that the Romanes were absolute Lords of all the South-side, and had cast the Enemy as it were into another Iland.

(7) In this state stood this Province of Britaine at the death of Titus, whose short raign hath left no long matters of discourse, and his Acts greater vnder other Emperours, then when he was Emperour himselfe; yet that little time wherein he gouerned, was with Iustice, Liberalitie and Loue of all. A great Enemy he was to Promoters, Pettifoggers, and Extortours of penall lawes, which Canker-wormes of Common-wealths, and Caterpillers to Courts of Iustice, he caused to bee whipped and banished out of Rome. Louing and familiar hee was to all his Subjects, and so desirous to giue them satisfaction, that his vsuall saying was, No man ought to goe sad from the speech of a Prince. Mercifull he was to the poore, and so ready to do them good, that one day being spent by him without any notable action, in sorrow he said: I haue quite lost a day. He died the thirteenth of September, the yeare from Christs Nativity eightie three, when he had reigned two yeares and two monthes, and in the two and fortieth yeare of his age, being poisoned by Domitian his Brother and Successour.

Domitian attaining the Empire by the death of Titus, (wrought by himselfe) as farre differed from him in vertuous conditions, as he was linked nere him in confanguinitie of blood: His youth not spent in Armes, with his Father and Brother, but inertiouly consumed in lasciuiousnesse and penurie.

(2) At Rome hee was in the Vitellian troubles, where, with Sabinus his Vncle, he had beene murdered, had not the Sexton of the Capitoll hid him in his house, and in the habit of a Minister vnknown, thence escaped: which place afterwards, when hee came to be Emperour, hee gorgeously built for a Temple to Iupiter his supposed Prefecur, and consecrated himselfe in the lap of that heathenish Ioll. Hee very speedily apprehended the hope of an Empire, for no sooner was his Father made Emperour, but that hee assumed the name of Cesar, and in Rome carried himselfe with such prodigality, and so liberally made promises of the Imperiall Offices, that his father hearing thereof, said, he marvelled why his sonne sent not one to succeed him in his place. But to dissemble and cloake his idle conceits, he gaue himselfe to the study of Poesie, (although with little affection, as the end prouoed) for which notwithstanding both Plinie and Martial doe highly commend him, as it is the manner of men to admire the very shadow of a good quality in Princes and great ones: and so doth Iuuenal and Suetonius praise his braue minde, for his shewes in the Amphitheater, wherein not only men, but women also were brought, and forced to fight for their liues with wilde beasts: a cruell spectacle neuertheless, and vnbecoming to humanity.

(3) His first entrance into state and dignitie was neither greatly applauded nor gainesaid, hee seeming to carrie an equall mixture, and his vertues to hold leuell with his vice. But Ambition now supported with Soueraignty, did quickly set the scale onely for the worse side. The affaires of the Empire hee altogether neglected; and impatient of labour, or affection to Armes, daily retired into a priuate chamber or Gallery, wherein hee vsuall applied himselfe onely to catch Flies, and with the point of a bodkin to prick them thorow: whereupon one being asked what company was with the Emperour, replied, Not so much as a flie. In which princely exercise let vs a while leaue him, and returne to his better employed Lieutenant Agricola.

(4) Who now in the fifth yeere of his gouernment took the Seas, and with many prosperous conflicts subdued some adiacent places and people, before that time vnknown, and furnished with forces those parts of Britaine, which lay coasted against Ireland: to which Countrey also hee had a minde, and would often say, that if the Romanes were therein planted, the Libertie of the Britaines would soone be banished quite out of fight, and out of hope.

(5) Now in the sixth yeere of his Prefecture, because a general rising of all the farther Nations beyond Bodotria was feared, and passages were all beset with power of the Enemies, he manned a Fleet to search the creekes and harboroughs of the ample Region beyond it, and with his Armie marched further North. The Britaines heereat, especially at sight of their ships, much amazed and troubled, knowing now that the secrets of their Seas were all discovered, and no refuge left if they were overcome, armed themselves with great preparation; and the Caledonians (a most puissant and strong Nation in those parts) the foremost, who, as challengers, braued the Romanes so boldly, and in such manner, that some counselled the Generall to retire his forces on this side Bodotria, and rather of his owne accord to depart, then to bee repelled with shame.

(6) Agricola, whose courage could not be clouded with any dauntless fear, held on his intents; and hearing by prisoners taken, the manner of his Enemies proceedings, ordereth his host accordingly, diuiding his armie into three battles, and so lay entrenched; the weakest whereof, containing the Ninth Legion, the Britaines by Night assailed, and hauing slaine the Watch, brake into their Campe with a furious noise: to whose rescue, Agricola sent his Light horsemen, and a Band of foot, whose Ensignes and Armour glittering in the appearance of day, so rebated the edge and further purposes of the Britaines, that they gaue backe to the gates of the Trench, where, in the straits the conflict was sharpe and cruell, till in the end they were forced to quit the field. Vpon this battle so manfully fought, and so famously won, the Romanes presuming that to their prowess all things were now easie and open, cried to lead into Caledonia, and to finde out the limits of Britaine, with a course of continued Conquests: and those which crewhile were so wary and wise, waxt forward and bold after the event, and grew to speake bigly: such being the hard condition of Warres, that if ought fall out well, all challenge a part, misfortunes are onely imputed to one. Contrariwise, the Britaines presuming that not valour, but skill in the Generall by vpling the occasion, had carried it away, abated no whit their wonted courage, but armed their youth, transported their Children and Wiues into places of safety, and fought by Assemblies & Religious rites to establish an Association of the Cities together. And so for that yeere both parties did depart, incensed to further preparations.

(7) In the beginning of the next, Agricola sending his Naue before, which by vnexpected spoiling

Galgacus their Generall.

His Oration to the Britains. Tacit. in vit. Agric.
The cause of a flourishing estate. The necessity of resolution.

A dishonour for the chiefe of a Nation to be daunted.

Former battles not vnfurortate.

Subjection will not caule.

The Romans gouernement and peace.

The last to bee conquered ought most to scift.

Manhood and finelle of place more iustified of a zealous Soueraigne.

in severall places, should induce a greater and more vncertain terror, followed himselfe with his Armie by Land: having drawne to his partie some of the valiantest Britains, whom by long experience in Peace, he had found most faithfull for his Warres: and so arrived at the Mount * Grampius, where the Britains had lodged themselves before, and as men nothing dejected by the vnfurortate chance of the former battaille, had now prepared themselves attending onely for Reuenge or Scrutide. And being taught, that common danger must be repelled with mutuall Concord, by Leagues and Embassages they assembled the power of all their Cities together, aboute thirtie thousand armed men, as by view was taken, besides an endlesse number of youth which daily flocked vnto them, and many lustie Old men renowned in the former warres, and bearing the Badges due to their honour: at what time, Galgacus, for vertue and birth, of all the Leaders the Principall man, seeing the multitude hotly demaund the Battell, is said to have vied this, or the like speech.

"(8) When I behold this present Assemblie, and consider the cause of this instant necessitie, I haue reason to presume, that this day, and this agreement in consent, will giue a happie beginning to our freedome, and an end of troubles vnto our Land. For, wee which inhabit these furthest Pro-montories, know no Land beyond vs whereunto we may flie, nor no Seas left vs now for safetie, the Romane Nauie thus (as you see) surueying our Coasts: So that combat and armes, which men of valour desire for honour, the very dastard of force must now vie for his securitie. Wee that are the flower of the British Nobilitie, and are seated here in the vttermost part of the Ile, far neuer yet the borders of those Countries which serued in slaucerie, our eies being vprolled and free from all contagion of Tyrannie. Our former Battailles fought with the Romans had their euent, yet so, that refuge and hope rested still in our hands; wee haue hitherto liued in libertie, whereas none beside vs are free; vs hitherto this Corner and secret recess hath defended, now the vttermost point of our Land is laid open: and things the lesse they haue bene within knowledge, the greater the glorie is to atchieue them. But what Nation is there now beyond vs? what else see we but Water and Rocks, and the Romans within, Land-lords of all, nay rather Robbers of all, both in Land and Sea? whose intollerable pride by humble subiection in vaine shall wee seeke to auoid. If the Country be rich, they seeke to winne wealth; if poore, to gaine glorie: but neither Eaſt nor West, can satisfie their greedy affection, much lesse this cold North can let an end to their desires. To kill, to spoile, and take away by force, that falsly they terme Empire and Gouernement: and when all is made a waste wilderness, that they call Peace. Most deare vnto man are his Children and blood; but those are pressed for their warres, and serue as their slaues, we know not where; our Goods are their tributes, our Corne their prouision; our Wives, Sisters and Daughters, in Warre violently forced, in Peace vnder title of friends and guests, shamefully abused, and our own Bodies worne & consumed in paing of Bogs and other seruile drudgeries, with thousands of stripes, and many indignities more. Slaues which are borne to bondage are sold but once, and after are fed at their Owners expences; but Britanie daily buyeth, daily feedeth, and is at charges with her owne Bondage. We are the last to be conquered, and therefore is our destruction most sought, as being the most vile in account: No Fields we haue to manure, no Mines to be digged, no Ports to trade in, and to what purpose then should they refuse vs aliege? Besides, the Manhood and fierce courage of the subiect, pleaseeth not much the ialous Soueraigne; and this Corner being so secret, and out of the way, the more securitie it yieldeth vs, in them

"it workes the greater suspection. Then, seeing all hope of fauour is past, let vs take courage to defend and maintaine our owne libertie as well as our honour. The Teemans led by a Woman, fired the Colonie, forced the Castles, and if that luckie beginning had not bene ended in a carelesse securitie, the Southerne Britains might with ease haue shaken off the yoke. We as yet neuer touched, neuer subdued, and borne to be free, not slaues to the Romans; wee (I say) now are to make proofe of our valour, and to shew in this encounter, what men Caledonia hath reserved for her selfe. And do you thinke, that the Romans are as valiant in Warre as they are wanton in Peace? I assure you, nothing lesse: for not by their Vertues, but by our larrings, they are growne into fame; and of the enemies faults they make vie to the glory of their owne Armie, composed (we know) most of diuers Nations, and therefore as in prosperitie they hold not all alwaies together, so doublelesse, if fortune turne aside, their seruices will appeare: vnlesse you suppose the Gauls and Germanes, and (to our shame be it spoken) many of our owne Nation, (which now lend their liues to establish a foraine vsurper) bee lead with hearts affection; whereas contrariwise it is apparant, that Terrour and Distrust, (weake workers to conserue loue) are the onely causes, which once removed, then those that haue made an end to feare, will soone begin to hate. All things that may incite vnto victorie are for vs: the Romans haue no Wines to harden them, if they faint; no Parents to vpraid them, if they flie, most of them haue no Countrey at all, or if they haue, it is by intrusion taken from others: A few fearefull persons stand here before vs, trembling and gazing at the strangeness of the heauen it selfe, at the Sea, and at the Woods, whom the Gods haue deliuered, mewed vp and fettered into our hands. Let not their braue shewes of glittering Gold or Silver, any way dimmy you, which of themselves neither offend nor defend. And be you well assured, amongst our enemies wee shall finde many on our side; The Britains will agnize their owne Cause; The Gauls will remember their wonted libertie and former estate; And the rest of the Germanes will leaue and forsake them, as of late the Vspians did. What then shall we feare? The Castles are empty; the Colonies peopled with aged and impotent persons; the free Cities discontent, and in factions, whilst those which are vnder, obey with ill will, and they which doe gouerne, rule against right. Here you see before vs is the Generall and Armie, on each side Tributes, Scrutides and other miseries inseparable, which whether we shall continue for euer, or cast off subiection as free-borne Britains, it lieth this day in this Field and your approued manhoods. Wherefore I beseech you in ioyning Battell, beare in your Minds your worthy Ancestors, your Selues, and following Posterities, which if you faile, shall for euer liue in subiection and slaucerie.

"(9) This speech was so vehemently deliuered, and so cheerefully of them all received, that with songs and confused acclamations (after their accustomed fashion) they clustered together on heaps, and some of the boldest advanced forward, whilst Agricola likewise was encouraging his men, who straightwaies ranne to their weapons, and rushed on furiously toward the Enemy.

"(10) The Britains were marshalled in the higher ground, fitly both to the shew, and to terrifie: the first Battalion standing on the plaine, the rest on the ascent of the hill, knir and rising as it were on: ouer another; the middle of the field was filled with clattering and running of Chariots and horsemen. Agricola seeing their number to exceede his, drew his battaille in length, and leauing his horse, advanced himselfe before the Engines on foote.

the Britains, employing both art and valour, with their great swords and little Targets, avoided the volue of the Romans, shewing down withall great force of theirs vpon them, wherewith they were both galled and fore wounded. Agricola seeing his men thus stoutly resisted, tooke another course: for, spying the advantage, he commanded three Bataian Cohorts, and two of the Tungrians, to preece forward, and bring the matter to handy strokes and dint of sword, a thing which (in respect of their long seruice) they were very expert in, but contrariwise to the Britains very preiudiciall, by reason of their little Bucklers, and huge swords, being blunt pointed, and no waies fit for the close in fight. This command aduantaged the Romans much; for these with the pikes of their Bucklers, when they came to deale blowes, so managed the faces of the Britains, that they were not able to stand before them; and the rest, gathering courage vpon emulation of these, ascended the hill, bearing downe all that was in their way, so that many halfe dead, and some wholly vntouched, were ouer-passed, and left for foote of winning the field. In the meane while the Chariots mingled themselves with the battle of footmen, and the troops of horsemen began for to flie; who albeit they had lately terrified others, were now distressed themselves, by the vncuennesse of the ground, and thicke ranks of the enemy, and were forced to fight standing still, and by the maine weight of hories to beare downe one another. The wandering Wagons alide, and matterlesse hories, as chance or feare did guide them, ouer-bare many times their friends, and thwarted their way that met them.

"(12) The other Britains that kept the hill, and had leisure to behold the manner of fight, beganne to come downe by little and little, and sought to compasse the backe of the enemy; which intent Agricola soone preuented, by sending four wings of Horsemen, retained purposely about him for sudden dispatches and chances of warre. These so fiercely assailed them, that a most sharpe and bloody battle ensued, wherein the Britains on each side were beaten downe and slaine, notwithstanding many of them shewed both valour and reuenge euen to the end: the rest disbande, turned their backs, and fled towards the desert; whose pursuit was followed vntill Night, and fullnesse of blood made an end of the chafe.

"(13) Of the Romans side were slaine (if wee must credit their owne friends) onely three hundred and fortie persons, and of them, one of extraordinary note and account, Aulus Articus, Captaine of a Cohort, who vpon a youthfull heat, and fiercenesse of his horse, was carried amidst his enemies. Of the Britains fell ten thousand, and their designs so defeated and broken, that as desperate men, they forsake their houses, and in despite set fire on them themselves: the hurt persons they carrie and draw with them, and call them that are vnhurt, hopping to be releued by them. One while they chuse out holes to lurke in, for their liues safetie; etsoones in great haste forsake them, as doubting therein their owne securitie. Dispersed asunder, they lament, and attend death: assembled together, expostulate of their meanes and life: one while conceiuing a glimmering of some small hope, another while dejected with vter despair: Sometimes at the sight of their dearest beloued, moued to pittie; but much oftner stirred to rage, for reuenge; and many of them, euen by way of compassion, slew their dearest Wives and Children, to rid them from their future miseries.

"(14) Agricola hauing made euery where a desolation and silence, withdrew his Armie towards the Horrifians, where taking hostages for their fidelitie, sent the Admirall of his Navy to saile about the North Coast of Britanie, who with strength and store tooke the Seas, their terror gone already before, himselfe with easie and gentle iournies disposed his foot and horsemen in their Wintering places, and planted Garisons vpon the Borders betwene Glota and Bodo- iria. And his Nauie with prosperous winde and successe arrived at the Port * Tratulenſis.

"(15) Thus, after many conflicts, about the space of one hundred thirtie fix yeeres from Julius Caesar first entrance, the vtmost limits of Britannie, and the Iles of the Orades lying on the North side of it, were by the valour and indutrie of Julius Agricola first discovered, and made knowne vnto the Romans; and the South part of the Ile, in the fourth yeere of the raigne of Domitian, (being the yeere of our Sauour eightie six) reduced into a full Prouince, the gouernment whereof was euer annexed and appropriate to the Roman Emperours themselves, and not at the disposition of the Senate, as other Prouinces were;

"(16) This state of affaires in Britannie, Agricola signified by letter, without any amplifying termes to Domitian the Emperour, who (after his manner) with a cheerefull countenance and greened heart, received the Newes, being inwardly pricked with feare and distaine, that his late counterfet Triumph of Germanie (wherein certain slaues bought for money, were attired, and their haire dressed as Captiues of that Countrey) was had in derision, and iustly scorned abroad; whereas now a true and imperiall victorie of so many thousand enemies subdued and slaine, was currant and famous in euery mans mouth: as being indeed a thing dangerous, that a priuate mans name should be exalted about his Prince. In vaine then had hee suppressed the studie of Oratorie, and other worthy politicke Arts, thereby to keepe downe other mens reputation, if he should in Military glory be discredited by another. And to be a good Commander of an Army, was to be a beaue priuate estate, that being a Vertue peculiar for a Prince, and therefore not lightly to be passed ouer. With these and the like incentives his minde was tormented; yet thought he it best to dissemble his malice, vntill the heat of his glory, and loue of his soldiours were somewhat abated. And forthwith he commanded for Agricola, Triumphall ornaments, statue, honours, and what else vually conferred in lieu of Triumph; hee yet remaining in charge, from whence, with the like policie also, hee was shortly displaced. For Syria, by the death of Attilius Rufus, lay destitute of a Lieutenant; and that place reserved for Men of great qualitie, Domitian gaue forth was purposed for Agricola, and sent him both his Patent and Succesor into Britanie; who thereupon deliuered vp the Prouince in a peaceable estate vnto Salustius Lucullus, and returned to Rome.

"(17) Where the life of Domitian was now grown vnmearurable vaine. The surname Germanicus he assumed to himselfe, for some finall seruice therein done. The Moneths September and October he changed into the names of Germanicus and Domitianus, because that in the one hee entered his Empire, and in the other was borne. He caused his Statue to be made in gold, and commanded, himselfe to be called G O D. His cruelty euery way marchable to his pride. The Senatours and Nobles vpon small surmises hee murdered: many new tortures hee inuented: Confiscations and Banishments, were fauours, not punishments. Amongst all which, the Christians bare a part, whose Second Persecution this Tyrant raised and began. The great Euangelist Iohn hee banished into the Ile of Patmos, where hee received his Reuelations from Iesus Christ, appearing vnto him in no lesse Maieſtie then Daniel before time had seene him in his Visions, and both (after a sort) in one and the same manner: their Visions alike, and almost to the like end: For as Daniel saw a Lion, Beare, Leopard, and Manser with Ten horns, persecute the Iewes Gods people, and to fall before the Stone cut without hands, which brake into powder the Image of their Tyrannicall Gouernment, to giue place to the peaceable Birth and Kingdome of Christ; so Iohn saw one Beast compacted of these foure, mouthed like a Lion, footed like a Beare, spotted as the Leopard, and horned for number and power with the Manser, retaining their Tyrannie in raising Persecutions in the Church of Christ, and clouding with Idolatry the

(18) Among many others slaine by Domitian, Salustius Lucullus whom he had made Lieutenant General of Britaine was one, and the onely cause is reported to bee, that hee had deified and made certaine Spears or Launces for seruice, which hee caused to be called Lucullians after his owne name; which was a matter held very suspicious by Domitian, who thought euerie memorable act done by another, did plucke a feather from his plume. And in these courses continued so long, that lastly hee grew odious to all, euen to his nearest friends and followers which himselfe had raised, who, together with his Wife, conspired his death.

(19) The chiefeft in the Action was Stephen, a Procurator and Steward to Domicilla his Emperesse, who faining himselfe lame of the left arme, in deliuering him a scroll containing the names of the conspirators, stroke him into the bellie with his sword, & the rest comming in, with seuen wounds made an end of his life; whose death was so acceptable to the Senate, that they disgracefully abused his carcase, cast downe his scutcheons and Images, and forbad all manner remembrance of him; albeit some of the Souldiers as much stormed, seeking to reuenge his death, and canonized him for a God.

(20) Of stature he was tall, his complexion faire, his countenance modest, his head verie bald, his eies red, full, great and dimme, of a comely forme, onely his bellie bearing out, his legges small, and his foote somewhat short. He died the eighteenth day of September, aged forty five, when hee had reigned fiftene yeeres, the yeare of our Lords incarnation ninetie eight, with whom both Tacitus and Suetonius end their Historie.

CHAPTER XV.

Nerva Emp.

Ann. Do. 98.

Itherto haue wee pursued the successions in the British monarchie, together with the Inuasions, attempts, and successesse of affaires, for the Conquest of this Iland, vnder the first twelue Emperours of Rome: And that from such writers, who though they were the most fauourable Registers of things done by the Romanes, yet had they beft means to know, and publish their Histories with warrant of truth. But after the death of Domitian died many Records, and the Provinces proceedings (especially those that most concerne Britaine) left vncertaine; and therefore are neither with the like largenesse prosecuted, nor with the like authoritie auouched. And were it not that these Romane Emperours succeeding, did onely continue the succession of our British Monarchs, many of them might be quite omitted, as neither themselves, nor deputies, allies, or enemies once spoken of concerning our affaires, and the Government of this Province, during those times so maimed and defective (in respect of any warrantable relations) that hardly a method can be obserued to the fitting of a continuall Historie. Yet as we finde it, let vs haue libertie to deliuer it, and rather to expose Truth in the meane attire that Time hath left her, then by disguising her in richer robes to abuse the World, and make her seeme nought else but a counterfeite, as Plutarch in the life of Pericles hath complained.

Arviragus the father of Marius. Chap. 6. lib. 11.

(2) Domitian therefore thus made away, Cocceius Nerva, a prudent, honourable, and aged person was elected Emperour by the Senate, assisted by Petronius Secundus, Capitaine of the Pratorian Armie, and Parthenius chiefe Chamberlaine, and one of the Murthe- rers of Domitian. His birth was noble, and of Italy in the Citie Narnia, and of the Prouince Vmbria: ruling so well as he may be esteemed too good a Prince, long to continue in so bad an age.

(3) What Lieutenants vnder him were in Britain or vnder his Successor Traian, I find not in Record: but our English Writers from the Arch-Deacon of Monmouth, bring a succession of British Kings, and amongst them Marius, who conquered Roderick, King of the Picts accompanied with the Scots, whose Tro- pie erected neere vnto Carlisle, remained a long time after, bearing the inscription of his victorie: and after him his sonne Coilius brought vp in Rome all the time of his youth, retained their fauours, and paid them tribute without constraint. Albeit by Iuuenal, it seemeth that Arviragus the father of Marius, a great re- sifter of the Romanes, liued in the reigne of Domitian, as hath beene touched, vnlesse you will say; that Menigius and Arviragus was the same Marius, as a worthy Antiquarie affirmeth. But through these vncertainities and disagreements occasioned by the silence of better Authors, our Histories rest doubt- full, and so must we leaue them, returning to finish vp briefly the Raigne and Life of this good Emperour Nerva.

(4) Who hauing reformed many enormities, and remitted many greuous Tributes and exactions, as that of Carriages mentioned on the reuerse of the prefixed Coine, minted by authoritie of the Senate, in eternall memorie of his goodnes; recalled from banishment the Christians leuerally dispersed, and suffred them to enioy the freedome of their profession. At which time John the Euangelist returned from Pathmos, (wherein he had beene confined) vnto Ephesus, a Citie in Asia the lesse. And Nerva reigning only one yeare, foure moneths and nine daies died (of a passi- onate anger conceiued against a Senator) in the yeare of Christ his incarnation ninetie nine, the twentie se- uenth day of Ianuary, & leuentie sixth of his own age.

TRAIAN.

CHAPTER XVI.

Traian Emp.

Ann. Do. 99.

Sextus Aurelius.

Traian raised the Romanes to the highest glory.

Dion. Cass. lib. 68.

Traian neuer heard of the Romanes till Traian came.

Traians affability and moderation towards his sub- jects. Eusebius.

Nto Nerva succeeded Vulp- pius Traian in the Roman Empire; borne neere vnto Scall in the Territories of Spaine: of a noble familie, but was much more en- nobled in himselfe for his princely endowments, which moued Nerva in his life time to adopt him into so high a calling, and the whole Senate after his death ioiufullie to confirme his Election, and so often to hon- our him with the title of the Most Excellent Prince, in publike dedications, as on the Coine aboue.

(2) Hee raised the Romane Empire vnto the very highest pitch of glory, and spread the power of their Command into the largest circuit that euer before or since hath beene possessed. For the Kingdom of Da- cia hee subdued; Armenia, Parthia, and Mesopotamia made subiect; Assyria, Persia, and Babylon conquered; passed Tigris, and stretched the confines of the Roman Empire vnto the remotest dominions of the Indies, which neuer before that time had heard of the Roman Name. And indeed, if wee looke vpon his policicke managing of the government, he may seeme (in com- parison of others) a right worthy, memorable and lovely Prince, of much affabilitie, and familiaritie euen with his inferiours, and of such cariage towards his Subiects, as he himselfe would with his Prince (he said) to vie towards him, if he were a Subiect. A great ob- server also of Iustice, in so much that when he inuested any Pretor, in giuing him the Sword, he commanded him to vie the same euen against his owne person, if he violated Law or Equitie. But yet against the good Christians he vied neither of both: nay hee stirred vp their Third Persecution, wherein Ignatius and many other worthy Saints of God, receiued the Crowne of Martyrdome, in such cruell manner, as that his other vertues are much clouded by that taxation: for mol- lification whereof, he was compassionately intreated by Plinius Secundus his Tutor, whose Epistles to that purpose are yet extant.

(3) The Iewes in his time rose vp in armes against the Gentiles, and in Cyrene, Aegypt, and Cyprus, slew a great number: against whom Traian sent his Cap- taines with forces sufficient, and in diuers parts of the Empire put the Iewes to death, in such infinite num- bers, as that Massacre is accounted the greatest Exe- cution that euer had beene in the world. God suffering this their punishment to light vpon them for their in- fidelitie and obstinacie against his Christ.

(4) Finally, after his Conquests in the East, return- ing towards Rome at Seleucia in Asia the lesse himselfe was conquered by the stroke of death, by a fluxe the seuenth day of August, after he had reigned nineteene yeeres, six moneths, and fiftene daies, the yeere of our Redemption one hundred and eightene, and of his age fixtie foure: whose ashes brought to Rome, were inclosed within the Crowne of a goodly Pillar, wrought of one intire stone, containing one hundred forty foot in height.

(5) Of stature he was bigge, of complexion swar- thie, thinn of haire both head and beard, a hooked nose, brode shoulders, long hands, and a pleasant eie; whose liuely Image was borne in Triumpher after his death, and that in most glorious and pompous man- ner, in celebration of his great renowne and fame at- tained in his life.

(6) How

Rowardus in Praetorium.

(6) How silent fouer writers haue beene for this Emperours affaires in this our Iland, yet it is to be thought that vnto this, as well as vnto other Provinces, both Properors, Lieutenants, Proconsuls, Pretors, and Proconsuls were sent, and euery Citie to haue their municipal Magistrates. The Pretor that yearly proclaimed solemn Sessions, wherein himselfe sat aloft vpon a high tribunall seate, and guarded with his listers about him in great estate, did execute his authoritie throughout his owne iurisdiction, and determined all causes brought before him, where rods and axes were prepared for the common people, that were enforced to receive a new Ruler euery year. And surely as this yoke of bondage was grievously borne of euery Province, vpon whose necke, it was imposed & laid: So the Britaines vnderwent the weight of that subiection with such vnwillings, that in the time of this Traian, they revolted and rebelled, though presently suppressed, as it is euident out of Spartianus.

(7) The care that this good Emperour had for the weale of his Subiects is projected by his prouidence in making wayes passable from place to place, whereof remaine many testimonies by those his Causies drawne with wonderfull diligence, euen thorow the whole Iland, which now, though dismembred and cut in peeces by the Countrey people, wherethorow they passed, yet doe many remnants thereof

remaine, especially in pastures, or by-grounds out of the rode way, with bankes so high, that euidently they shew themselves. Of these Causies Gallen writeth as followeth: The waies (saith he) Traian repaired, by paving with stone, or raising with bankes cast up such peeces of them as were moist and miry: by stocking up and ridding such as were rough and overgrown with bushes and briars: by making bridges ouer Rivers that could not be waded thorow: where the way seemed longer then needed, by cutting out another shorter: if any where by reason of some steepe hill, the passage were hard and vn easie, by turning it aside thorow easier places: now in case it was haunted with wilde beasts, or lie waste and desert, by drawing it thence thorow places inhabited, and with all laying leuell all meuen and rugged grounds.

Along these Causies the Emperour caused to be set little pillars or Columnes, with numerall Characters cut in the, to signifie how many miles was from place to place. Of these Sidonius Apollinaris writeth thus:

Cuius per spatium satis vetustis
Nomen Casareum vires columnis.*

*Breake not the ancient Causies strong, Whereon the Columnes stand along,
Nor names of Casars doe not wrong.*

One hundred twentie foure, attended on by three Legions: of which, his Army for this exploit was then composed, as appeareth by his money in the entrance of his life, fixed in memorie of this vnder taking: With these hee encountered the Northern Riders, recovered such holds as they had taken, and forced them into the Woodes and Mountaines, whither the Romane Horsemen without danger could not pursue them. But perceiving the Aire too sharpe for the Romans constitution, and the Soile rough and of lesse profit then the rest, hee made a Fortification or strong Wall of Earth, which (as Lampridius saith) did continue on the West from Ituna, (that is, the River Eden in Cumberland neere Carlisle) vnto the River Tina, or Time at Newcastle in Northumberland in the East, and was no lesse then Eightie miles in length. This Wall (saith he) was made of stakes driuen deepe into the ground, and bound together in the manner of an hedge; and with Turfe and Earth intermured as a Rampire or Bulwarke to defend the Incurfions of the wilder Britaines and ill Neighbours that daily molested the peace of the Romans. Hadrian his worke finished, and the Province reduced to the obedience of the fatal Gouernesse Rome, at whose feet he had laid againe the name of Britaine, as appeareth in the first Ruerse of his Coin, placed in the fronture of this Chapter) triumphantly returned to Rome, and for his honourable aduenture and Expedition had his name inscribed vpon his Coin with this addition: THE RESTORER OF BRITANNIE.

(6) Neither after this seemed the Southerne Britaine greatly to contend, but patiently bore the yoke of subiection, which Time and Custome had made lesse painfull, the rather, for that they saw themselves to stand in neede of the Romans helpe against the inroades of their owne Countreymen, whose crueltie was now as much feared, as in former times the Inuasion of Strangers: whereupon they conformed themselves more willingly to the Romane Lawes, both in Martiall and Ciuill affaires: which were then principallie directed by Licinius Priscus, who had bene not long before imploied by Hadrian in the seruice of Iewrie, and was at this present Lieutenant of Britannie.

(7) This Iewish warre happened in the eighteenth yeere of the Raigie of Hadrian, who suddenly assailed and slew where they came, both Romaines & Christians: for reuenge whereof, besides an infinite number of them slaine and tortured, their Citie Ierusalem was also rased euen to the ground, and another built, but not altogether in the same place; and the name thereof changed to AELIA: the Iewes utterly banished thence, and (as Aristion Pellucius writeth) not lawfull for them to looke towards that Citie nor Saile, no not through the Chinke or Crevice of a dore: And vpon the Gate that leadeth towards Beth-lehem, hee caused a Swine to be engrauen, a Beast by the Law accounted most vnclane, and by them abominable.

(8) But as this Emperour was exasperated against the Iewes, so was hee gracious and fauourable to the Christians, and the rather at the request of Quadratus, a Disciple (as is supposed) of the Apostles, who wrote vnto him concerning them; and of Aristides a learned Philosopher of Athens, who made an Apologie for their defence, so that the Persecution then in practise was forbidden by Hadrian in a publicke Edict; who (as Lampridius writeth) was minded to haue built a Temple to the seruice of Christ, had not some dissuaded him therefrom. In extremie of sicknes hee designed Cesar, Lucius Aelius, whose Coyne wee haue hereunder expressed. A man deare to this Emperour, if we consider at how great a rate hee bought for him the acceptance of the Commons and Militarie men: And how short a time the blaze of that Honour continued: for hee died so soone, that Hadrian himselfe had wont to say,

(9) When hee had reigned in great honour and loue the space of one and twenty yeeres, five moneths, and fifteene daies, hee died, the eighth or tenth, of Julie, of a dropsie: which maladie so tormented him, that willingly he refused all sustenance, and languished away through faintnesse. Hee was of personage tall, and very strong, of a good complexion and amiable countenance, wearing the haire of his head and beard long, and died aged fixty two, the yeere of our Lord God, One hundred thirte nine.

Polychr. lib. 4. c. 14.

After the decease of Traian, his Nephew Elius Hadrianus, by the consent of the Armie, who swore to him obedience, was proclaimed Emperour, the Senate likewise confirming their choice, as beeing a man indued with gifts both of Art and Nature, answerable to the fortunes of his Estate.

His birth was of Spaine, in the Citie Italia, neere vnto Ciail, where Traian was born, his Father Noble, and his Mother in Cales descended of an honourable stocke.

(2) A great Mathematician he was, skilfull in Arithmetike, Geometrie, Astronomie, and Indiculous Astrologie; learned in the Greeke, and Latine Tongues; in which languages he wrote both Poesie and Prose: well scene in Physicke, and knew the Vertues of Herbes, Rootes, and Stones: A singular Musitian both for Theorie and Practise; and could both limme & carue with approbation of the skilfull: but about all, is the admirable report of his Memorie, who neuer forgot any thing that he either read or heard.

(3) His first businesse for the Empire, was rather a care to hold securely what was gotten, then by enlarging the bounds to endanger the Best: and therefore lessening the Compasse, and bettering the strength, he planted his forces along the River Euphrates, and assigned that for the Easterne limits, leaving out India, Armenia, Media, Assyria, Persia, and Mesopotamia, as Countreies too remote for the Romans to hold to their profit. By which his doings other Provinces tooke occasion to revolt, thirthing after Libertie, and among others the Britaines (as euer most impatient of Seruitude) attempted alterations, whose Lieutenant Cneus Trebellius (Successour to Julius Agricola) could not so gouerne his Souldiers which were growne out of discipline, and by long rest farre out of Order, but that they fell at variance among themselves, and disquieted the most peaceable of the Britaines by their licentious manners.

(4) The Northern Inhabitants, that were more at libertie, and imboldened by their Bogs and Rocks vnaccessable, set themselves to withstand their wrōgs, to whom also many others ioined their affections and forces, whereupon some bickering infused with losse and blood; to repress which Julius Seuerus was sent by Hadrian: but ere hee could settle the Commotion, was againe recalled and imploied in Syria, to suppress the Iewish rebellion.

(5) These stirres here still continuing, the Emperour tooke it to be of such importance, that hee resolved in Person to adresse for Britannie, which he performed in his third Confullship, the yeare of Christ one

Ext vnto whom succeeded Antoninus, (for his many vertues) furnamed the Pious: and by the Senate, Father of his Countrey. This man did not onely equall his Adopter and Predecessours, in wisdom and other princely qualities, but was also compared, for his peace and policie, vnto Numa Pompilius the second King of Rome, who for his renowned gouernment, is so famously in their Histories recorded. His birth was in Lombardy, the son of Aurelius Fulvius, and Nephew to Titus Aurelius Fulvius, that had bene Consul, and held other Offices of dignity and State. The whole time of whose Raigne was so spent in peace, that small remembrances remaine of any martiall affaires: yet such as we finde in Britannie we will deliuer.

(2) At his first entrance into the Empire, about the yeere of Christ, One hundred thirtie nine (as appeareth by the money minted in memorie of the reduction of Britaine) the Northerne Britaines in that part of this Ile began to stirre, and made inroads into the Prouince, notwithstanding the Rampire or Wall that Adrian had made. Against whom Lollius Vrbicus Lieutenant here vnder Antoninus, brought his power, and with some skirmishes put them backe: taking from the Brigantes part of their Land, as a Mulck, for the waffe they had done to the Genouians, a Prouince adioining vnto the Brigantes, whose people had put themselves vnder the Emperours protection. Which done, he repaired the Wall with stronger Fortifications; or (which is more probable) raised vp another not farr from the same, to double the defense: for (saith Iulius Capitolinus) Lollius the Legate to Antoninus ouercomming the Britaines, built another tursse Wall to diuide the Prouince, and to impeach the incursions of the barbarous. Notwithstanding the honour of this seruice (as is testified by the ancient Panegyricke) was (by one Fronto) attributed wholly to Antoninus the Emperour himselfe: who, although absent and in his Palace at Rome, yet sitting as it were at the Helme of a Ship, did command and direct the enterprise, and therefore had right to the glory thereof. This Wall also (as M. Clarenceux coniectureth, hauing seene it so traicted in an ancient Chorographical Chart) was drawn from the Riuer Tine vnto Carleill, but Time and Warre haue worne it now away.

(3) In the meane while a new insurrection was kindled among the Brigantes, that annoyed some of the Romane Confederates. But by the discretion of the Generall, it was quenched before it came to flame: for vpon the first rumour of the Reuolt, Lollius marched thither with part of his Armie, commanding Seius

Saturnius, Admirall of the British Fleet, to waffe vpon the North of the Iland, both to defend the Coast from danger, and also vpon occasions to further the Land-seruice, if need were: by which means, the Brigantes were easily reduced to obedience, euen by the presence onely of the Lieutenant, who for his good seruice done in Britaine, during the short time of his imploiment there, obtained the surname Britannicus. This may be the first figure in the face of this Chapter (being in the third Consulship of this Emperour) be coniectured to haue hapned in the yeere of Christ one hundred forty one; and by inscription of the last Coin in that ranke it is manifest that there was some other expedition against Britaine the yeere following.

(4) I cannot omit, though not directly pertinent to our purpose, the care that this good Emperour generally had for the distressed and persecuted Christians (who no doubt by his bounty enioied much tranquillitie here in Britaine also) in whose defense he wrote to his Deputies in Asia, and published an Edict against their Accusers, the effect whereof (from Eusebius) is this:

(5) The Emperour Cesar Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Augustus, Armenicus, Pontifex Maximus, fifteene times Tribune, thrice Consul, vnto the Commons of Asia sendeth greeting. I doubt not but the Gods themselves haue a care that wicked persons shall bee brought to light: for it much more doth appertaine vnto them, then it doth vnto you, to punish such as refuse to yeeld them worship. But this course which you take doth confirme them whom you persecute, in this their opinion of you, that you are impious men, and mere Atheists; whereby it cometh to passe, that they desire in the quarrell of their God rather to die, then to yeeld to the wils of such as you are, and to embrace your forme of Religion. Let it not seeme vnseasonable to call to your remembrance the Earth quakes, which lately happened, and which yet are to your great terror and grieue; because I vnderstand that in such like accidents you cast the enuy of such common misfortunes vpon their shoulders, whereby their confidence and trust in their God is much the more increased: whereas you being still ignorant of the true causes of such things, doe both neglect the worship of the other Gods, and also banish and persecute the seruice of the Immortall God, whom the Christians doe worship, and you persecute to the death all the embracers of that Profession. In the behalfe of these men many of the Prouinciall Prefects haue written before vnto our Father of famous memory: to whom he answered, that they should not bee molested, vnlesse they were proved to haue practised Treason against the Emperiall State: and touching the same matter some haue giuen notice

"vnto me; to whom I haue answered with like moderation as my Father did before me. And by this our Edict doe we ordaine, that if any hereafter bee found thus busie in molesting these kinde of men without any their offence, we command that hee that is accused vpon this point, be absolved, albeit he be proud to be such a man as he is charged to bee, that is, a Christian: and he that is his Accuser shall suffer the same punishment, which he sought to procure vpon the other.

This Edict was promulgated at Ephesus in the General Councell of all Asia: so fauourable was this good Emperour to the true Professours, and (indeed) to all sorts of men, hauing that Apothezme of Scipio Africanus rise in his mouth: That he had rather saue one Subiects life, then kill a thousand Enemies.

(6) He was of Stature tall, of a seemely presence, in countenance Maiesticall, in maners milde, of a singular wit, verie learned and eloquent; a great louer of Husbandrie, peaceable, mercifull and bounteous; in the last of which vertues, he so much exceeded, that thereby he set going whollie his owne priuate estate & demaines, wheratt when his Empresse much repined, he told her, that when hee vnderooke the Title and State of an Emperour, he then did forgoe the interest and proprieties of a priuate Person: meaning that a Prince is not much to respect his priuate wealth, so as the publike wealth and welfare of the State may bee aduanced. In fine, this large Euloge and praise is fastened on him, that neither in his youth he did anie thing rashly, nor in his age any thing negligently: In which honourable course, hauing raigned twentie and two yeeres, (some say twentie three) seven months, and twentie sixe daies, he died of a feuer at Lorium the seuenth of March, the yeare of his life seuentie fixe, and of Christ one hundred sixtie two.

(2) This man chose to him for his Associate in the Empire, Lucius Verus, the Sonne of Lucius Ceionius Commodus, whom Pius had adopted (but died before him) and therefore this Verus was respectfully commended vnto Aurelius; betwixt whose natures and conditions was as much oddes, as betwixt Day and Night: The one very moderate, louing, and industrious, the other proud, careless and cruell: the fruits whereof, the poore Christians felt, whose chiefest pillars, Polycarpus, Bishop of Smyrna, and Iustinus Martyr, an excellent Philosophy with infinite more, were put to most cruell deaths; and by him the fourth persecution of Gods Saints was begun: whose licentious and bloodie life, lasting in Authority the space of nine yeares, was cut off by an Apoplexie in the presence of Aurelius being then in expedition towards Germanie, whose Coin we haue here expressed as wee finde it minted with his face and reuerie.

(3) Aurelius the Emperour following the warres against those, who there reuolted, was inclosed about with his Enemies, called the Quadi, and suffered great mortalitie both by Pestilence, and much more by want of Water, whereby himselfe and Host were almost consumed: At which time many Christian Souldiers being in his Campe, and commanded (as Jonas was) to call vpon their God, they fell prostrate on the ground in prayers, and obtained of him so plenteous a shower of raine, as therewith after five daies extreamest drouth and thirst, the whole Army was refreshed, and the Quadi contrariwise by Thunder & Lightning were quite dispersed and ouerthrowne.

(4) This wonder (saith Eusebius) is reported euen by those Historians, who fauoured not Christianitie: and the prudent Epistle of the Emperour himselfe, (which hee wrote to the Senate for confirmation of this miracle, yet extant) doth warrant the same: whereupon he both mitigated the rage against Christe Professours, and (by testimony of Apollinaris) named that Legion of the Christians, for an euertlasting remembrance, The lightning Legion.

(5) In his Raigne Calphurnius Agricola was sent Lieutenant into Britannie, where the inhabitants sought some alterations of the State, fore repining at the oppressions of the Romans. But the Surname Agricola reuiuing the remembrances of their former ouerthrowes, so daunted their Courages, that at the presence of the Generall, who came amongst them to preuent all occasions, they gaue over their intended enterprise: for which, and for many other his policies there vsd, he worthily deserued great commendations, but (for the most part) the glorie of all such seruices

CHAPTER XX.

Ann.Dom.
181.
Eutropius.

HE prudent life, and love conceived of so good a Father, gaue hopefull signes and ioiull entrance vnto the Raigne of yong Commodus, his soone degenerating Sonne; who had nothing from him but Nature, and that also much suspected: The knowne

Adulteries of Faustina, his Mother strongly confirming the opinion of Bastardie.

(2) At nineteen yeeres of age, he was inuested Emperor, his raigne not long, but life as loose and impious as the worst: in fortiff pride equalizing Caligula, for intemperancie another Vitellius, and in cruelties a second Domitian. Three hundred Concubines continually he kept, and vpon one of them, named Martia, so doted, that he wore her painted Picture vpon the outside of his Garment; and infliting his money Hercules Commodiano or Romano, which was stamped about the yeere 193. Sometimes (Hercules-like) would shew himselfe robed in a Lions skinne, bearing a Club in his hand in stead of a Scepter. Other whiles wantonly clad in the habit of an Amazon woman; alwaies costly, but seldom ciuill.

(3) The Month August, he named Commodus, September, Hercules, and December, Amazonius, according to his owne or his Concubines names. Commendable in nothing but for his skill in darding, and for some small breathing of the persecuted Christians; which came not of himselfe, but (as Xiphilius writeth) by the mediation of Martia his beloued Concubine, who was found very fauourable to their doctrine: But the outrageous wickednesse of his life made him so hateful to all, as that his death was often plotted; and once by some of the Noblett, with whom Lucilla his owne Sister conspired; for which fact he put her, with the rest of the conspirators, to death. The Empire and all things els he wielded at the discretion of others, attending only his voluptuous pleasures, howsoever the State or Prouinces fared vnder him.

(4) In Britanny the Northern Borderers brake thorow the Wall, and finding the Frontiers but weakly guarded entred the Prouince, where suddenly they surprized the Roman Generalls, and killing many of the Souldiers, ranged the Country, waiting (without resistance) all where they went. Commodus at Rome, hearing these stirres in Britaine roused vp his spirits, and sent one Vlpivs Marcellus to stay their fury; who with great difficulty forced them back beyond the Wall: and seeing the carelesse seruice of the Souldiers, reuiued againe the ancient discipline of Warre, that by long ease had been left off by the Romans. The repressing of this incurfion, as it seemeth by some reuolt of the prouince, was about the yeere of Christ one hundred eighty six, as appeareth by the monies of this Emperour set in the entrance of his life, at which time in memory of some worthy expedition and victory against the Britains he stamped them.

(5) This Lieutenant Marcellus is reported to be of a marvellous great temperance and strange diet; for all the time of his abode here hee would eat no Bread, but such as was baked in Rome, neither slept he more then would maintaine nature, whereby both his private businesse and protects for publike seruices were commonly dispatched by night. Seuerer he was in the execution of his place, not led by fauour of the person, nor staid from iustice by corrupted Bribes, esteeming Money only for necessity, and riches no further then made for publike good: But those his vertues though now with vs they get him honour, yet then did purchase him Ennie with the Emperour. Who line (saith Lampridius) for his Subjects mischiefe and his owne shame: For Commodus hearing Marcellus daily commended, contrived his Praise to be his owne Reproach; and doubting lest he should grow too high, thought good to crop him off betimes, and so sent him Letters of discharge.

(6) The Armie then feeling the raines loose that ere-whiles had bene borne with a stiffer hand, fell straight to a disordered mutinie, and therein proceeded with such boldnesse as they openly refused any longer to acknowledge Commodus for their Soueraigne: At which time Perennius was a chiefe Agent and so ruled all in Rome for the Emperour, as that he entertained a hope to be himselfe (in time) an absolute and sole-ruling Emperour, and hauing now fit occasion offered to spread his power further, he tooke vpon him to redresse these disorders (whilst Commodus wallowed in his lasciuious idleness) and displacing some worthie Captaines at his owne pleasure, sent other persons of meane respect or parts, to command those Legions in Britaine, that formerly had been led by Noble Senators and men of Consular dignity, whereby greater mischiefe began to accrew and ciuill dissensions daily to burst forth, the Armie scorning their vpsitall Commanders, and the Captaines insulting o- uer the Souldiers, (of all sides) the Aides so disquieted, that had the Britaines followed the aduantage, the whole Prouince at that time had been in hazard to be lost: vpon which distractions no lesse then fiftene hundred Souldiers at once went out of the Land to Rome to complaine their wrongs vnto Commodus: where charging Perennius to bee the stirrer of these troubles, with an intent thereby to raise himselfe or his sonne to the Emperiall Maieity (a string that cannot be touched without found in a Soueraignes care) they were so farre heard and beleueed that Perennius was to them deliuered to be put to death, which accordingly they accomplished with all extremity.

(7) Then was sent for Lieutenant into Britaine Helvius Pertinax, a man of low birth, but high Fortunes, being risen from the state of a common Souldier, to the dignity of a Consul, and had been Commander before that time ouer many Prouinces. Him had Perennius discharged from Britaine, and with disgrace sent and confined into Liguria where hee was borne, whose credit Commodus again with such fauours repaired, that he gaue him the Sirname Britannicus, which glorious title also himselfe had taken about the yeere 184. At his first entrance and arriage, he assayed by rough hand to suppress the rebellions of the Army, and aduentured his person so farre in some tumults that he was stricken downe and left for dead: but afterwards proceeding with better aduice he composed those troubles with most seuerer punishments of the principall offenders: whereby notwithstanding he presently grew odious to all, and thereupon so far feared his own safety, that he made suit to the Emperour to be discharged of his Lieutenantship.

(8) Vnto him succceeded Clodius Albinus in the Government of Britaine, a man of great birth, forward enough, and fortunate, for which the Emperour Commo-

dus either vpon fauor or feare, did honour him with the title of Caesar, though Albinus seemed vnwilling to accept of the same, and afterwards discovered his disposition more openly in approving the Ancient and free state of the Romans. For vpon a false report of the death of Commodus, he made an Oration to the Legions in Britanny in fauour of the Senate, whole kind of Government he much commended and preferred before the rule of the Emperours: Of which his affection when Commodus vnderstood, he sent Iulius Seuerus in all hast, to take charge of the Armie: and Albinus retired himselfe from all publike affaires, vntill the death of Commodus, which not long after followed, and was wrought vpon this occasion: He hauing assigned many to die, and to that end had inrolled their names in a scroll, it chanced Martia his Concubine to light on the same, wherein the saw her selfe allotted for one: And reuealing this his purpose to others, that stood in the same list, and in the like danger; they together thought best to secure their owne liues by his death: and with poison, stabs and strangling made him away, when he had liued one and thirty yeeres, foure moneths, and viciously reigned thirteene yeeres eight moneths and fifteen daies, the yeere of Christs nativity one hundred ninety and three: the night before the Kalends of Ianuarie.

(9) Of stature he was indifferently tall, of a fine constitution of Body, very faire of complexion, with cleere eyes and golden locks, neither in person nor in Princely parts resembling his Father: How ioiull the death of this Tyrant was both to People and Senate, their execrations pronounced against him; and their assemblies in the Temples to giue thanks for their deliuerance, do manifest, as is at large reported by Lampridius, who wrote his life, and titled by al, Hostis humani Generis, The enemy of Mankind: The very name of the diuell.

PON the person of this Helvius Pertinax, (of whom we are now to speake) Fortune (as it seemeth) meant to make the full experience of her power, and from a very slender foundation to raise the building of her owne Pride: His birth was but poore, and parents as meane, whose Father from a seruile condition got to be free, and traded in Mercury wares for his liuing: himselfe educated according to his birth rose by degrees to mount the Chaire of all worldly glory, and to be the Monarch of the whole world.

(2) At first a Schoole-master, and taught the Grammar; next a Civil-Lawyer, and pleaded causes in Courts; and lastly, a Martial-man, and serued in Campe: where Fortune attended him with such fauourable successe, that within fise daies, out of the rank of a common Souldier he was preferred to bee Captaine of a Cohort, in the Syrian warres against the Parthians, which ended, he was imploied into Britannie, Aflisia, and Germany, and also had charge in chiefe of a Fleece vpon the Flemmish Seas: he serued likewise in Dacia, with such honourable proofe of his valour, as that wife Emperour Marcus Aurelius held him in high esteeme, and afterward made him Senator of Rome. Then was hee assigned Gouvernour of all Syria and Asia, the greatest place of Credit and reputation that might be; and from thence sent againe into into Britaine, chosen out as the principall man, of note for to stay the Commotions there raised against Commodus, where in the Field he was left for dead : but thence also returning after hee had gouerned foure feuerall Consular Provinces, was created Proconsull of Africa, and immediately after Præfett of Rome. Neither yet made he his stand there, (though the greatest of any subiectiue degree) till hee had mounted the Throne of Maiefty, and had obtained the command ouer All : which fell to his lot by the death of Commodus; and by the meanes of Martia, Ælius Lætus, and other Conspirers of his end.

(3) For the Murder being done in the dead of the night, Lætus in great haste repaired to Pertinax his lodging; at whose sight the Old man in bed, expected nothing but Death, as supposing him sent from Commodus to no other end. But Lætus saluted him by the vnexpected name of Emperour, carrying him with acclamations vnto the Army, and in the morning to the Senate, where, of them all with great ioy, he was confirmed Augustus.

(4) His first businesse was to bridle the Licentious liues of the Prætorian Cohorts; & iniuries done by them vnto the Romane Citizens, which gained him such hatred, that it was cause of his death : For these men growne disordered and lawlesse in the raigne of Commodus, held themselves wronged, to be now locked vnder the constraint of Læwes ciuill Gouernement : and these only enuied the peace & prosperity of Pertinax, whereas all the Provinces abroad at the very hearing of his Election, and fame of his Imperiall vertues, laid aside their weapons, and desired to embrace peace with a Prince so nobly qualified.

(5) The first that conspired against his life, was one Falco; whom notwithstanding hee freely forgave, yet punished certaine Souldiers thereto necessary : whereupon, the rest assembling themselves in tumultuous and furious manner, with their drawn swords inuaded his Palace. Hee seeing their purposes fought no escapes, but defending the Palace, met them in the bale Court : At whose presence and Maiesty they were much amazed, and a while made a stand : vnto whom with great grauity, and without shew of any feare, he thus spake vnto them.

(6) Souldiers and Companions, if you come to kill me, (as I thinke you doe) you shall therein perforce an act neither valorous, nor otherwise very commendable for you, no, nor any way grieuous vnto my selfe, for euery mans life hath his limit, and to mine, by Natures course, the last period cannot be farre: Or thinke you that I feare death, who now am so ripened for it, and haue already gotten the very height of all renouue vnto my Name? Surely

“ you are deceived : but at this I grieue, that my life and short time of Gouernment, which I had deuoted to the good of all, should seeme so disgustfull vnto any, as to deserue a violent and hastned death, especially by you, who are by office, the Guarders of my Person : you (I say) whose charge and Oath is, to secure your Soueraigne from perill, and now seek to sheath your Swords in his breast, shall either leaue a Testimony of my bad life deseruing it, or brand your places with such stains of Treason, as Time shall neuer weare away. And what I pray is mine offence for maintaining your Læwes? why, it was the charge your felices imposed vpon me. Are Læwes so strait? surely, not to the virtuous, who are euen a Law vnto themselves : are they needlesse? why then were they made? and being made, why should they not be executed? If the death of Commodus grieue you, was I the cause? If he were made away by Treason, your felices are conscious of my innocency. And this I assure you, in the word of a Prince, that his death shall deprive you of nothing, which you require, if you require nothing but that which is honest and iust. My life, whilst I was a Subiect, was spent with you in Warre, now (being your Soueraigne) is consumed with cares for your Peace : which if you free me of, by taking it away, my troubles shall thereby end, but your conscience shall begin to grone vnder the guilt of blood : and perchance bee touched with too late Repentance.”

(7) His words were spoken with such a mouing grauity, and vnmooued resolution, that the formost in the attempt gaue back, and were ashamed of their audacious enterprise, but the rest furiously driuing forward, one Trullus with a Lance ran him into the Breast, whereupon Pertinax couering his Head with his robe, quietly yielded his body to the traitorous strokes of them all, and so died that poore, old, and innocent Emperour. The yeeres of his life, saith Iulius Capitolinus, were sixty, seuen moneths, and twenty five daies: But Dio, Spartianus and Herodian accounteth them to extend to sixty eight : Eusebius to aboute seuenity. The like disagreement there is for the short time of his Gouernment : for Eusebius saith that he reigned not fully six Moneths : Eutropius saith but three : Iulius Capitolinus and Aurelius Victor, eighty five daies : Dio, Herodian, and Spartianus, two Moneths and twenty eight daies : how long so euer, thus hee liued, and thus he died, the fift Calends of April.

(8) He was of an honorable and Maiefticall presence, strong of body, large and full breasted, long bearded, curle-headed, smooth of Speech, and indifferently eloquent.

CHAPTER XXII.

An.Do.194.

HE state of man continually attended with vn certaine chance, apparently doth shew, the weak condition that nature enioiceth, and with what vn surenesse the fear of maiesty is posselt, as is scene by the precedent Emperour, who sitting at peace in his Palace at Rome, renowned, beloued, and guarded with the strengths of Europe, Asia, Africa, Aegypt, and Greece, was notwithstanding surprisid and slaine at noone day, by a Band of Souldiers, not much exceeding the number of three hundred, and all escaping unpunished, the deed was so suddaine and mens minds so distracted, that it could not be fully beleued, though witnessed by sight.

(2) The Senators mistrusting each others, abandoned the Citie, and the Citizens in secret secured them-themselves, all in an vpror, but none for reuenge of the treason : The murderers, in as great feare as any, fortified their Campe, and with weapons in hand stood vpon their guard : But seeing all in a maze, and nothing against them attempted, a further boldnesse (the like before neuer heard of) ensued: for by a Common Crier they made Proclamation for the sale of the Empire, to any man that would giue them most: which offer was readily accepted by Didius Iulianus (a man of much more wealth then honesty of life, and a Lawyer, saith Eusebius) who with larger promises than euer were performed, obtained the Imperiall Diadem.

(3) His birth was in Millen, the sonne of Petrinus Seuerus, his mother Clara Emilia, and himselfe brought vp in seruice vnder Domitia Lucilla, the mother of Marcus Aurelius, by whose fauours, he was first made Questor, next Edile, & then Prætor in Rome. In Germany as a Captaine hee seru'd vnder Aurelius, then was he appointed Gouernour of Dalmatia, Bithinia, and of the Lower Germany, and was Consul with Pertinax, and afterwards Proconsul in Africa. These were his risings and meanes to that Maiesty, which not long he kept : for hated in Rome and not approoued abroad, Syria chose for Emperour their owne Generall, Pescennius Niger; Germany, Septimius Seuerus. By whose consene Clodius Albinus leader of the Britaine Armie was first elected Cæsar, and then his fellow in the Empire, whereby the Eagle, the fairest of Birds became monstrous, and in one Body bore three Heads.

(4) For Albinus at that time hauing gotten againe the government of Britaine, where erecting his owne Statues and stamping his picture in his Coynes, gaue great suspection that he intended to be a Competitor, and with his Army a force meant to haue gained the Emperiall seat it selfe, by aduantage of Septimius forces, absent in suppressing of Pescennius, which to diuert inforced Seuerus vntill better opportunity, to declare Albinus his companion, for he much more feared him then either of the former : Because Didius in Rome, and Pescennius in Antioch consumed their times in banquetting, and vnmartiall disports, whilst Albinus managed his office most souldierlike, and was highly esteemed and honored of them.

(5) Seuerus hauing towards Rome, was met in Italy by Ambassadors from Didius, with faire offers of peace, and possession of halfe the Empire: but refusing compulsion and making still forward, the Senate that so lately declared him a traitor, now proclaimed him an Emperour: And the Souldiers vnatisfied of the couenanted promises, and in hope to purchase fauour with Seuerus, slew their Chapman Didius in his Palace, the Calends of Iulie, being but five daies after he had done himselfe as much for Pertinax, when he had reigned, as Eutropius saith, seuen months : Spartianus saith but two, and Dio fixty six daies : the yeere of his age fifty seuen, and of our Sauours appearing in our flesh, one hundred ninety and foure.

SEPTIMIUS SEVERVS

CHAPTER. XXIII.

Sept. Seuerus.

An.Do.194.

SEuerus hauing by this bloody accident of the giddie multitude gained with more facility then he expected, the fatal seat of gouernment, it was his next in place to suppress Pescennius by force, and Albinus by fallhood : whose Actions & liues since they hapned with this Emperour, and ended with his sword, I will record together, beginning with Caius Pescennius first, since first he fell vnder the fortune of this man.

This olde man in the yeere of Christ one hundred ninety foure, was elected Emperour by Acclamation of the Syrian Armie, of which (though begun but by a handful in respect of all the other Emperiall forces) hee had good hope, since to the honor of that Godde he dedicated the first marke of his Soueraigntie, the minting of his mony.

A person he was of seemly stature, louchly feature and faire skinn, except his Neck, which differing so farre from the rest gaue him the surname of Niger: his complexion was ruddy, his Body fat, his voice fo piercing, that it would be heard a mile off : and his haire for more ornament long hee wore in reflected curls vpon his shoulders. A commendable souldier and well bearing himselfe in the military offices hee vnderwent. In his Lieutenancy abroad he was seuer, and at home he so well acted his part when hee was Consul, as in his Clemency and Iustice hee seemed emulous of Pertinax. Thus all his life he enioied the goodnesse of his merit and fortune, and had not his ambition begun, where his yeeres were ending, had so parted : For no sooner had hee put on the Robe Emperiall, but Seuerus defeated his Armie at Cizicum, pursued him to Antioch, and tooke him at Euphrates, sending to Bizantium his head a Trophie of the Conquest, and to his wife, children, and followers (vnto whom at first this Victor granted banishment) in the end denied life.

(1) Now as soone as Seuerus made his approach neer Rome, he gaue command that the Prætorian Cohorts should attend him disarmed, which done, he vehemently checked them for their proditorious treachery against Pertinax, and pronouncing sentence, depriued them both of name, honor, and armes of Souldiers, and banished them from Rome, and the circuit thereof for one hundred miles distance : which act of his wonne him such reputation, that in Rome the whole Story of Pertinax his ruine, and Seuerus his aspiring to his Throne, was at large portraited in an excellent peece of worke, of folide molten brasse, as Herodian relateth, though he ascribeth the occasion of it, to a dreame of Seuerus.

(2) Those two obiects Didius and Niger, who gaue some hinderance to Seuerus his beginning, being thus defeated of their high hopes; the third, which was Albinus, seemed now a more dangerous cloud, which would altogether ouer-cast his brightnesse & glory, if it were not dispersed or blown back in time: and therefore to make faire weather with him, hee created him Cæsar and his Successor in the Empire, but afterwards his good fortunes thus swelling in the East, and himselfe still courted by Ambassadors from all parts, with their tender of subiection, he began to grow proud, and to disdain any Copartner in State: and thereupon first secretly fought the destruction of his Cæsar; which Raigne, he then proclaimed him Traitor and Enemy to Rome.

(3) Clodius Albinus brought into these vnexpected dangers, prepared his strengths, and with the choice of all Britaine entred France, and nere vnto Lions tooke the field against the Emperour, but with no better successe, then Pescennius had done in Asia the lesse, in the same place (as Herodian, Eutropius and Spartianus asseme) where Darius was first ouerthrowne by Alexander. The Armies ioining, a bloody Battaille was fought, which through the great prowess of the Britains went at first for fore against Seuerus, that being beaten off his Horse, despairing of Victorie, and almost of Life, cast off his Imperiall Robe, and flying, ignobly hid himselfe. Let us one of Seuerus his Captaines, kept aloofe all this while, of purpose as was thought, to bring the Emperour to ruine, and now vpon report that hee was slaine, came on most furiously with his forces, in hope of winning both the day, and the Empire to himselfe: whereupon the Emperour drawne againe into the field, the day was his by the meanes, but not the meaning of Letus: whom on attainer of his Treason he afterward put to the sword. That day a great part of the flower of Britaine was slaine, together with their valiant Leader Albinus, a Captaine of exemplary Seuerity and Marciall discipline, a great admirer of Hannibal and Marius; for the Scipio's he thought them rather fortunate then valiant, and in the time of his seruice in this Island, there was no toile which hee commanded his souldiers, but himselfe would beare therein a part, euen in carrying of burdens on his Backe: and yet so farr from vaunting of his valour, as that when an Historian would haue recorded his noble Acts, he willed him to write of theirs who were already dead, whom he need not to flatter, holding it a foppery to write of those, of whose fauour or wrath the Indiers stood in hope or feare: Being such a one, no maruaile if Seuerus so feared him, as he did, which he shewed euen after hee was slaine, by putting incredible numbers of great Personages both in the City and Provinces to death, with this one Pretence, for all that they wished well to Albinus.

Albinus vanquished
by Seuerus.

After this ouerthrow Seuerus forthwith sent Heracianus hither, to keepe the rest of the Britains in quiet, and to be Lieutenant in Albinus his roome, as Spartianus write ch: Of whose affaires therein little remembrance is left, onely it seemeth by a Coine of Seuerus minted in his second Consulship, which fell in the yeere of our Sautiour one hundred ninety eight, and about the period of this his last Competitor, that the Britains gaue not at first their seruice and seruitude to this man, vntill he had made the purchase of it by his sword; the brand of which he hath left to posterity in figuring the Goddesse Victorie seated vpon spoiles, and writing in a field, Victoria Britan.

of Britaine.

Vnto this Lieutenant Virus Lupus succeeded President of Britaine, as Vipian the Lawyer termes him, and was about the yeere of Christ one hundred ninety seuen, as appeareth by this Inscription erected at Olinaca amongst the Brigantes, in memory of the reedifying of that place by this Emperour and his eldest Sonne, then first designed Cæsar, by which the time is discovered, and in this stone inscribed.

(4) This man strengthened the Prouince especially in the North, with many strong Castles, repairing many places ruined either by fire or fury of the bordering wades: Of which Laus Ra*, where the first Cohort of the T. brasians lay, was one, as appeareth by this Altar there erected to the Goddesse Fortune, and since removed to Conington the house of Sir Robert Cotton in Huntingdonshire.

He warred against the Maate and North Britains with such bad successe, that he was forced to redeeme his peace with money, and was so much weakened by losse of his men, that he sent to Rome for present supply, with relation of his great danger, and the Enemies strength: which newes touched Seuerus to the quick; and notwithstanding his yeeres (sixty at the least) and gout wherewith hee was continually grieved, yet would he vndergoe that iourney in person himselfe, as well to satiate his owne vaine glorious humours, as to traine his Sonne Basianus from his licentious life, wherein hee wallowed idly in Rome, who together with his brother Geta, accompanied their Father into Britaine.

(5) The Britains then hearing of the Emperors approach, sent him their Embassage for intreaty of peace peace, whereby the Island might haue been settled and secured without blood, but the old man (saith Sabellius) had so vnchangeable a desire to beare the glorious Sirname of Britannicus, that he preferred warre, and accepted not their proffered subiection.

(6) Seuerus thus entred, Geta was appointed to remaine in the South of the Prouince, and to gouerne those parts that stood in quiet, assisted by Emilius Papinianus the famous Lawyer, whose Tribunall seat was held in Yorkeshire himselfe and Basianus marching further into the North against the Maate and Caledonians their neighbours, both which bare themselves boldly vpon the aduantage of their Countries, their waters brackish, and vnholosome drinke for their Enemies, the aire sharpe and contagious to their constitutions, and the soile it selfe so pestred with Loughs, Bogs, Meares, and Mountaines, that the Romans were forced to make way by continuall Labour, in cutting downe Woods, in building of Bridges, and in draining of Meares, so that by distemperature of diet, continuall labour, contagiousnesse of Aire, and afflictions by sicknesse, fifty thousand of them perished, and that without Battaille, saith Dio: many Souldiers also, whose spirits were spent, and through feeblenesse could not keepe ranke in their March, were for meere pittie slaine by their fellows, left they should fall into the hands of their Enemies.

(7) These miseries, notwithstanding old Seuerus indured and fought many Battailles, but (as Sabellius confesseth) euer with more difficulties to the Romans then to the Britains, and yet in some small skirmishes he went away Victor, and continued his courses with such resolution, that lastly the Caledonians thought good to intreat their peace, which vpon these conditions was granted: first, that they should forthwith lay aside all hostile Armes, without any further resistance: next, that they should deliuer into the Romans Possession, those Countries that were next abutting on their Prouince: and lastly, that thenceforth they should liue in quiet, attempting nothing against the publicke Peace.

(8) The State thus settled, Seuerus bethought himselfe of some further meanes to secure the Prouince, by building many In-land strengths anew, and repairing those with Stone and Cement which formerly were but of Turfe and earth, as appeareth by this Inscription found in the Ruines of one of his workes nere vnto the Riuer Vra, in the County of Richmond erected.

And neglecting the uttermost and vast Northerne parts of this Island, drew a Wall or Fortification, which might serue as a Rampire and diuision betwixt the savage and more ciuill people, stretching it selfe thorow the whole Island, euen from Sea to Sea; that is, from the Bay of Tan (otherwise Solweyfrith) in Scotland, to the doore of Tine or Tinnmouth, containing in length One hundred thirty and two Miles, as Sextus Aurelius Victor, Eutropius, and others account them, and by some more. This Wall he built of Turfes and Timber strongly fenced with Bulwarkes and Turrets, nere vnto (if not vpon) the foundation of Adrians Wall, the tract wherof thorow the Countries of Westmorland and Northumberland, is more pleasing to be scene, then easie in word to be exprest. For which his Aits thus heere attchieued about the yeere of grace two hundred and eleuen, he assumed to himselfe his much desired Sirname Britannicus Maximus, causing in his owne and his sonnes Coines that inscription to be stamped.

(9) And according to posteritie the glory of his first atchieuement heere, vpon the reuerie of those his monies, whereon he sometimes formed a Trophy erected vpon spoiles with two Captives, vnder setting the word VICT. BRIT. sometimes a winged Victorie: graving a Shield, hung on that tree which is the meede of Conquerours, VICTORIAE BRITANNICAE: and sometimes in such a forme and phraze as is exprest in the entrance of this life. And now retired to York, he left his eldest sonne to finish this worke of warre by him begun, as being rather alliaied then altogether ended.

Basianus disloy-altie.

(10) Basianus thus set in the one part of the Island, as Geta was in the other, fought rather to gaine the affections of his Army, by a loose libertie to doe what they list, then to maintain the trust reposed on him, by the restraint of Marciall Discipline, and exaction of Military duties: hoping by such his plausibilitie and indulgence, to purchase to himselfe their best concurrence for the obtaining of the Empire, which hee so thirsted after, as that hee often tampered with them to raise him, by the fall of his father.

Caledonians
rebell.

(11) The Caledonians vnderstanding the dissolutenesse of his Campes, and the want of a better Captaine, suddenly assailed the Romans, putting many to the sword, and taking great booties, (which they dispersed amongst their neighbours) without any regard of the obligation of their former Covenants: wherat the restle old man was so much diquieted, and so farre enraged to reuenge, that hee gaue an expresse charge to make a generall Massacre, without exception of any; vling in his speech to his Souldiers, these verses borrowed out of Homer:

A generall Massacre of them
by Seuerus.

*Nemo manus fugiat vestras, cademq; cruentam:
Non setus, grandis Mater quem gestat in aluo, Horrendam effugiat cadem.*

Let none escape your bloody rage, with terror let all die:
Spare not the mother, nor the child that in her womb doth lie.

(12) This (which seemeth to haue bene the worke of Seuerus second yeere in Britannie, Anno two hundred and twelue for so it is exprest vpon the monies of himselfe and sonnes) may (and with a fit and easie inference from the same authoritie) seeme to haue bene heere the fortune and effect of two encounters and Conquests that same yeere: for whether we obserue the two seuerall coines of victorie then minted, on one of which is the Statue of that armed and winged Goddesse, at whose feet are two Captives prostrate bound; or the other bearing on it a double figure of that Lady, graving the sculpture of the former, VICT. BRIT. vpon a Shield, it can conclude no lesse in probability.

(13) Seuerus remaining in York, where the Sixth Legion called Victrix kept, which place afterwards grew to be one of the chieftest for account among the Brigantes, as commonly the Stations of the Romans Colonies were the feed-plots of all our Cities, and principal Townes) grew feeble and sicke, being weakened with age, and wearied with trauell, his maladic more increa-increasing by the disturbances of the Enemie, and the daily disloialtie of Bassianus his sonne, in somuch that despairing of life, hee called his Counsell and Captaines before him, and vnderlaied with pillows, he thus addressed his speech.

(14) Eightene yeeres almost haue I wielded the affaires of the Empire, and borne on my shoulders the burden of her encombred estate, both at home and abroad; at my first entrance, troubled euery where, now at length quiet, euen here in Britaine, the most vniquiet and molestious Prouince of all: The profit of which triuels I must now leaue for others to enioy, and wish ease in peace to keepe that which I with care and warre haue gotten. If therefore amity and mutuall concord, be embraced (the only finewes of a Common-wealth) the glory of the Empire shall yet shine more bright, fith by concord we see that small things grow to greatnesse, whereas contrariwise, discord is the ruine of all. I die and must leaue the successe of all to my Successors and Sonnes by Nature, though the Elder vnswall: I meane Bassianus new made Antoninus and your Emperour, who often ere this hath fought to gaine that title by his sword and my death, but knoweth not the dangers that attend a Diadem, neither remembreth that high places are continually garded with Enuie and Feares. But so blind is Ambition, as it seeth not that a Soueraignes greatnesse is such vnto others, but least in himselfe, and that the things possessed are not the very things they seemed: It is not these Titles therefore can make man happy, the line of his life being drawne forth with so many vnccertainties, and the height of his power laied vpon so weake foundations. My selfe at this instant may serue for example, of whom this may be said, I was all things, yet nothing, seeing I must pay my debt to Nature, and leaue my exploits in East and West to be registred (either at your disposall) for matters of moment, and good of the Empire, or blotted to the reproch of my gouernement, with the shadowing pencile of Obluion. That therefore my care for the welfare of this State may suruiue my selfe, and bring forth the happie fruits thereof when I am withered, this shall be my last and onely request, that you will eueraffist my sonnes both with your counsell and aide, whereby they may rule according to Lawe, and you obay according to Right, that so in you both, the good of the Empire be about all things respected. With which words hee ended both his speech and his life.

(15) This Emperour by Historians is rancked with the best, both for his wartes, wherein hee was verie fortunate, and for his wisdom in gouerning the Empire: and yet is he taxed very sharply both by Sabellius for sundry vices, and by Eusebius for stirring vp the fift Persecution of the Christians in the tenth yeere of his Raigne. In which Irenius the learned writer, among many others, suffred Martyrdome: howbeit, towards his end, he became more milde to them, as faith Saint Ierome: as also that he was a diligent reader of the excellent workes of Tertullian, whom usually he termed his Master.

(17) Of stature he was tall, and of a comely personage, his countenance seuer and representing Maiesty, his beard white and long, and the haire of his head he wore vsually curled. He was very learned in the Mathematicks, a good Philosopher, an eloquent Orator, and of a deep sounding voice. Hee reigned eightene yeeres (faith Eusebius) by Dion Cassius, Herodian, and Eutropius, seuenteen yeeres, eight months, and odde daies. He died in York, the fourth day of April, in the yeere of Christ two hundred and twelue, not so much of sickness, as of discontent and greefe, or (if our British writers may be credited) of a deadly wound given by Fulgence, Captaine of the Picts, who as the Monke of Chester faith, was brother to Martia, the first wife of Seuerus and mother of Bassianus. His second wife was Iulia Domna the mother of Geta, (though some thinke that she was mother to both) a woman of a surpassing beauty, and an earnest instigator of the two Bretherens reconciliation, had she not been blemished with other vices, as after we shal here.

An. Do. 212.

Bassianus Caracalla, and his Brother Septimus Geta, together were declared Emperours by old Seuerus in his lifetime, and both of them by their father surname Antoninus, a name very gracious in the esteeme of the Romans, the elder so stiled about the yeere of Saluation two hundred and fise, and the younger foure yeeres after, (as it appeareth by the minage of their moneys,) were approued and applauded by people and Senate, and of all men saluted and acknowledged for Emperours. Bassianus the Elder, stiling himself Britannicus Maximus, as it should seem, was admitted his Fathers fellow Emperour at York at his residing there, to quiet the Northern Britains; wherein also hee gaue him the name Antoninus, for so implieth that famous Law, bearing iointlie the names of Seuerus and Antoninus, enacted by them at York, touching the interest and right that matters haue to the goods and possessions of their seruants. His mother, the first wife of Seuerus, was Martia a British Lady (say our British Historians, though Sabellius doth iudge her to be an African) and himselfe better beloued of the Britains for her sake, then for his owne.

Geta was the sonne of the Empresse Iulia, a second wife, a woman of passing beautie and surpassing lust, who being perswaded (by some Oracle or dreame) that her husband successefull should be an Antoninus, lest her Sonne should lose his hope of the Empire, she importuned Seuerus to bestow the name of Antoninus also on Geta, who with it gaue him likewise the title of Cesar, about the yeere two hundred and two.

And to vnite the affections of his two sons, as well as to eternise their memories, he minted their features vpon one Medall, inscribing the one side ANTONINVS PIVS AVG. PON. TR. P. IIII. the other, P. SEPT. GETA. CAES. PON. TR. P. IIII. hauing the yeere before matched the together vpon the reuerse of his owne money, and incirculing their heads with this word, AETERNITAS IMPERI. as if the separation of their affections were the dissolution of his and the worlds Empire.

(2) Vpon Seuerus his death, Antoninus Caracalla, hastning for Rome, proffered good conditions of peace to the Britains, who long tired with warres accepted thereof, and hostages were given for conseruing the same. Whereupon the Empresse Iulia accompanied with both the Cesars, departed hence, carrying with them the funeral ashes of the deceased Emperour in a golde Urna to Rome, where they solemnly consecrated him a God: the ceremony wherof (because it concerneth so great an Emperour and Monarch of this kingdome) is not vnworthy the inferring.

In the Porch of his Palace was a bedstedd all of Iuory, dressed with richest bedding and furniture of gold, wherein was laied his image portrayed to the life, but yet in manner of a sicke man. On the left side fate all the Senators and Princes in blacke mourning weeds; on the right, all the great Ladies, cladde in white (which then was the mourning colour of that Sexe.) The Physicians diligently comming to visit him, and feeling his pulse, as if he were aliue, doe signifie that his disease did still increase vpon him. This they all did seuen daies together: at last, as if then hee were dead, all the prime of the Nobility carrie him in his Iuorie Bed to the Forum, where all the Patrician youth, & Noble Virgins, incompassed him with noft dolefull Hymnes and ruefull ditties. Thence againe he was removed to Mars his field, where was erected a four-square frame of Timber, of a huge height and compass, the stories still mounting to the toppe with sundry ascents, and richly beautified with strange varieties of gold and purple ornaments, and images of great Art and price: On the second of which ascents, was placed the Emperours said Bed and Statue, with infinite store of sweetest odours, brought thither from all parts of the Citie: which done, the young Nobles brauely mounted on Horsebacke, rid round about in a kinde of dance or measure, and another fort likewise (who represented great Princes) in their Coaches, whereupon his successor in the Empire, first setting fire to the frame, forthwith all the people did the like on all sides: and when the whole began to be on flame, an Eagle secretly enclosed within, was let fly out of the toppe, which soaring a great height, and out of sight, the people followed it with shouts and praises, supposing that therewith the Emperours soule was carried vp to heauen. And thus Seuerus, which was before a man of Gods making, was now become a God of mans making: and the more to preferue the memory of his fathers glory, Caracalla erected a magnificent Edifice, which he inscribed Seuerus his Porch, wherein with most exquisite Art, and admired workmanship, were portrayed all his Fathers warres and triumphs, achieued here in Britaine or elsewhere.

Sabellius.

(3) But presently after, these two vngodly sonnes of this new supposed God, so much emulated each others glory, that the deadly sparkes of enuy, blowne a long time with the bellows of their ambitious desires, brake out into the flames of murder and blood, being brethren by one Father, but not by the same mother (as it is said) & in this only like, that they were both starke naught, though both in contrarie kinds of Pices. And albeit the Empresse Julia had sought by all meanes to make peace betwixt them, both formerly, here in Britaine, and now, after their returne to Rome: yet the desire of a sole sovereignty, had bene a long time so rooted in Basianus his heart (for which he had twice attempted his Fathers life, and so much hated his death, that hee slew his Physicians, because they had dispatched him no sooner) could not indure an equall (much lesse a conforter) in authority, and therefore in the Court and in the armes of the Empresse, he slew her sonne Geta, in a time least suspected, when he had sate with him in state and disdaine, the terme of one yeare and twenty two daies.

Geta slaine in his motheres armes.

Herodian.

(4) And to cloake this fratricide with shew of constraint, first to the Souldiers, and then in the Senate, he accuseth his Brother to haue sought his death, and that in defence of his owne life, he was forced to slay the other, and flying to the Pretorian Cohorts for the safetie of his life, as though further conspiracies had been intended against him in the City, & at his returne commanded Papinianus the famous Ciuitian, to excuse the murder in his Pleas at the Barre: which when he refused, hee caused him to bee slaine, as also all those, that had bene acquainted with Geta; whereby so many of the Nobilitie perished, that he was thereby accounted another Nero in Rome: and by his fauorites the name of Geta was rased out of all monuments & imperiall inscriptions, as we haue seene some of the defaced vpon some Altar stones found here in Brit.

(5) Of nature he was subtle, and could well dissemble with them whom hee feared, and make shew of loue where hee deadly hated; alwaies fitting himselfe to the humours of flatteries: Among the Germans, counterfeiting their gate and garments; In Greece, belike Alexander, bearing his necke somewhat awry; In Troy, would resemble Achilles; alwaies to Ca- melion-like, as the Romans (his followers) were therewith ashamed. In a word, Caracalla (saith Dio) neuer thought of doing good, because (as himselfe confessed) he neuer knew any goodnes.

Dio.

(6) And to fill vp the measure of all iniquitie, as one regardless of humanity or shame, he married Iulia his mother in law, late wife to his owne Father (a sinne (saith S. Paul) not to be named among the Gentiles) and by Sept. Aur. Entrop. and Spar. reported vp on this occasion. It fortuned that Iulia in presence of Caracalla, either by chance, or of purpose rather, let fall the vail which she wore, disclosing thereby her naked breasts and beauty, which was great; whereat the Emperour casting his lasciuious eie and bewraying his affection, presently said, Were it not unlawfull, I should not be unwilling: to whom she replied (without respect of modesty) that all things were lawfull to him that made lawes for others, but was subject himselfe to none: forgetting at once both the murder committed vpon Geta her sonne, and the scandals that accompanied fo she a sinne, the pleasure wherof they did not long enioy, both their deaths (by Gods vengeance) soone after ensuing.

(7) For Caracalla remaining in Mesopotamia, and carrying (as it seemeth) a guilty conscience, and suspicion of his life, sent to Maternus, whom hee had left Gouvernour of Rome, to assemble all the Astrologers & Mathematicians (vnto which learned imposters he alwaies gaue especiall credit) and of them to enquire how long he should liue, and by what death he should die. Maternus hauing so done, wrote for answer, that Macrinus his Prefect of the Pratorium (then with him in his expeditio) went about to murder him. Which is thought rather in enuy of Macrinus to haue bene faued, then by any Astrologicall directions so giuen forth. This letter and others comming to Caracalla his hand, at such time as hee was busied about his disport, he deliuered them to Macrinus to reade, and giue him the report at his returne. In perusal wherof finding himselfe to be accused of Treason, and fearing lest by the sequell hee might bee brought into greater danger, he incensed one Martial a Centurion (whose brother the Emperour had lately slaine) to murder him; which was soone performed, and occasion in the fields offered for Caracalla stepping aside from his traine to ease nature, Martial, as though he had bene called, ran hastily in without hindrance or suspect, and with his dagger stabbed him to death, but being too late perceived, was yet so hastily pursued, that he was hewed to peeces before his tongue could reueale the principall Traitour. Julia his incestuous wife hearing of his death, with poison slew her selfe at Antioch, leauing her shame to suruiue her life.

(8) Antoninus Caracalla, saith Eusebius, reigned Emperour seuen yeares and sixe moneths, but Herodian, Spartianus, and Dio allot him fixe yeeres and two moneths: he died the eighth of Aprill, and yeere of Christ two hundred eightene. The testimonies of these many writers notwithstanding, together with the place and circumstances of his death, and the person by whom it was committed, the British Historians do contradict, reporting him to bee slaine in Britaine in Bartaille against the Picts, by one Caracaus a man of a lowe and obscure birth. But by this it may seeme some wounds receiued by him in those British warres, gaue occasion to that error. He left a sonne not by his incestuous mother, nor by Glantilla his wife, who he exiled into Sicily; but by a mitris, whose name was Iulia Simiamira his cosen German, and indeed no better then a common strumpet: which corrupt rootes brought forth as bitter fruites, euen Helioababalus, of whom hereafter we shall haue occasion to write.

On the other side, considering the Succession of all our British Emperours (that Royall Title beinge those other Emperours) I suppose that somewhat also be said of their affaires in places farre remote from the continuall triuing for the Imperiall crown, made them to giue Britaine some peaceable breathing, and priue vs of the Romans Records of those times: want if I should suppose of our home-bred Writers, I might be thought, not so much to the ruines of our Monuments, as to heape more rubbish vpon them. So farr from suspicion of Caracallas death, by the outward appearance of a seeming sorrow, that hee was held of all most free from the Treason, and the second person worthy of the voice. For first, the Title was conferred vpon Macrinus, a man of good fortune, much experience, an excellent Captaine; whose life could not be drawne to aduventure in the life of the weighty and dangerous Crown. CHAPTER XXVI.

Antoninus
Heliogabalus
Emp.

An.Do.219.

Oung Brianus, surnamed Heliogabalus, the sonne of Caracalla before mentioned, thus elected, and prospering at his entrance, gaue hopes to his raisers, of many princely parts, and signes of those things that in sequele by better prooffe appeared to be on-lie signes indeed: for nature had plentifully adorned him with the complements of her gifts, had his mind beene answerably furnished with vertue. But as the one was ouer-prodigall and lauish in his outward forme, so was the other as sparing and defectiue in bestowing of her inward gifts: insomuch that both in minde and garment, he seemed to bee that which in truth he was not. This Emperour, as appeareth by the reuerse of his money, tooke it no meane addition of honour to his Imperiall Dignitie, to be stiled, The Priest of the Sunne; which in the Assyrian Tongue is called El, from whom he tooke the surname Elagabal.

Heliogabalus exceeded in inue-nedness all others before him

(2) Assoone as hee had settled the Empire firme vpon himselfe by the death of Macrinus, he began to discouer his owne dispositions, and in wantonnesse, apparell, lightnesse, and diet, to exceed any that had gone before him in Rome; and so farre differed from the manners of men, that modestie will not suffer vs to record his greatest vices.

(3) His apparell was rich, and most extreme costlie, and yet would he neuer wear one garment twice: his Shoes embellished with Pearles and Diamonds; his Seats strowed with Muske and Amber; his Bed covered with Gold and Purple, and beset with most costly Jewels; his Way strowed with the Powder of Gold and Siluer; his Vessels (euen of basest vfe) all Gold; his Lamps burning with no other Oile then the Balmes of India and Arabia; his Fish-Ponds filled with no other water then of distilled Roses; his Ships (in his Naumachies or Ship-fights) Noted in a River of Wine; his Bathes most stately built, and againe after they were once vfed, presently plucked downe; his Plate of finest Gold, but neuer serued twice to his Table; his Rings and Jewels most rich, yet neuer worne twice; his Concubines many and chargeable, but not one laine with twice; his Diet so profuse, that at euery supper in his Court, was usually spent a Thousand Pound Sterling: inuiting the chiefe Citizens to a Feast, hee strowed all the Roomes with Saffron, as it were with Rushes, saying, That such Cattle were worthy of such costly Litter. Neere the Sea, with him no Fish was eaten: in the Land, no Fleish: whole Meates made of the Tongues of singing Birds and Peacocks, or of the Brains of most costly creatures, alwaies saying, That meat was not sauorie, whose sauce was not costly. And indeed so costly it was, that the redenewes of Germany, France, Britaine, Spaine, Italie, Sicilia, Gracia, Asia, Syria, Egypte, Arabia, and all the Ilands, were not sufficient to defray the charges.

(4) In his Progresses, six hundred Chariots followed him, laden with Strumpets, Boyes, and Bawdes, for whom he built a Stewes in his Court, wherein himselfe in the attire of an Idolot, made to them solemne and set Orations, terming them therein his Fellow-Souldiers, and Companions in Armes, with Instructions for them how to practise with most varietie their filthy Luxuries. In regard of which kinde of actions, one doth make this doubt, whether were greater his boundlesse Prodigality, his stupendious Lecherie, or his foppish Foolerie: the last of which his Imperiall Vertues, he gaue prooffe of, when he gathered in the City ten thousand weight of Spiders, professing that thereby he vnderstood how great a City Rome was: at another time, ten thousand Mice, and a thousand Wizels, which hee brought forth in a publike shew to the people, for some wise State-purpose, like the former.

(5) In Rome hee built a Temple consecrated to the Sunne, (like to that in Phenicia, whereof himselfe was Priest) commanding the Christians therein to worship: as also a Chatter-house for women to meet and determine of their Attires; and brought into the Senate-house his mother Semiamira, allowing her a Voice among the Senators. In modestie I forbear to write the particulars of his unmanly libidinous filthinesse, adding only that which a iudicious Author speaks of him: Kings (saith he) as they have greater power to sinne then other men, so haue they lesser safety in sinning then anyman; for being let aboute others in the eie of the World, they are as Markes that are aimed at, and lie open to the shute of Reuenge. And so was the state of this Superlative Monster, whose owne Conscience still stung him, euen in the midst of his sweetest sinnes, and therefore euer expecting some violent end, hee prepared ilk Halters richly wrought to hang himselfe, if need were; and Golden Knives to stab himselfe, or cut his throat; and built a goodly Tower of exceeding height, adorned with Gemmes and Gold of inualluable cost, that thence he might cast himselfe headlong, hauing these words oft in his mouth, That howeuer he died, his death should be pretious in the eyes of all men. But he failed of his hope, though not of his desert; for against him the Pratorian Souldiers suddenlie arose, no wrong offered them, more then vnto others, but out of a Iustice in God, who repaith sinne with sinne, and fufillth not such outrageous wicked ones to escape vnuenged.

(6) These breaking into his Palace, found him not in estate answerable to his calling, but hidde (for feare) in a homely place fureable with his dirty conditions: from whence with Acclamations throw the streets of Rome, more like a Dogge then a Man, they dragged him with his mother, saying, The Bitch and her whelpes must goe together: and after their fure spent, threw their bodies into the Common Sinke of the City, and thence into Tyber, sinking them downe with great great stones, left the carcases cast vp with the waues, should either find buriall, or infect the aire. The Senate approving all that was done, decreed that his name should be obliterated out of all monuments in Rome, and neuer any Antoninus (a name before very gracious) should rule againe their Empire: so odious was the remembrance of this Image of Ignomy.

(7) He was aged but foureteene yeeres when hee became Emperour; by Herodians computation, hee reigned sixe yeeres, and died at twenty: By Aurelius Victor hee died at seuentene, & reigned not fully three yeeres: Eusebius saith, that hee reigned fully foure: Omniphrius would haue him to liue eighteen yeeres, & to dy the 8 day of March, Anno two hundred twenty three.

ALEXANDER SEVERVS.

CHAPTER XXVII.

BEfore the death of Heliogabalus, his Cousin German Alexandrus, by the working of his mother Mammae, was made his Cesar, whose vertues daily increasing, with his age, gaue hopes to the better sort of some happier times by his meanes: but so farre incensed Heliogabalus (who hated nothing more then vertue), and so dimmed his fame, that he often assailed to take away his life by treachery: But suruiuing him, whom no man wished to liue, he was with publike blessings, and vnspcakable ioy elected Emperour; * his name they changed from Alexandrus to Alexander, and his surname giuen of old Seuerus.

(2) He was the sonne of one Varus, a Syrian borne, and of Mammae, sister to Simiamira, though there are who say that both the sisters attending on their Aunt Julia the Empresse, were gotten with child by young Caracalla, and so hee father of Alexandrus: howeouer, he was brought vp in learning from his childhood, hauing a naturall propension to all humane vertues, and diuine pieties: He was very skillfull in the Mathematicks, Geometrie, Musike, Carniug, and Painting, & composed some Bookes also of Poetrie, so great a louer of the liberrall Arts, that hee allowed the professors thereof annuall stipends for their further encouragement: and that which most is, hee much fauoured the Christians, from whom hee tooke to himselfe examples of life, and vrged their Precepts vnto others, and this one especially * NOT TO DO TO OTHERS WHAT WEE WOULD NOT HAVE DONE TO VS. Their Christ hee honoured (though as a Heathen man) and would haue had him consecrated among the Romane Gods: vnto whom hee also was minded to haue built a Temple, had not his Idol-Priests hindered the same, but a place of their holy assemblies hee allowed them by his Imperiall warrant: for when certaine Vintners or Viticulturalles laid claime to the place whereunto the Christians resorted to pray, he thus decided it, That it was much fitter that God therein should be worshipped, then belly-gods should be pampered to surfet there. (A good document of a Heathen for some Christians, who turne places consecrate to Gods diuine seruice into Sheep-Coates, or to the like prophane vses) This good inclination of Alexander the sonne, was vndoubtedly stirred vp by the indignations of Mammae his mother, who, as Eusebius witnesseth, had sent for Origen (the Christian Doctour) from Alexandria to Antioch: by whom she was so wel instructed, that Ierome giues her the honourable Title of a most holy Woman.

(3) Himselfe, though yong, ruled the Empire with great Wisdome and Iustice: admitting onely such for his Counsellors, as were men vnecorrupt, sage and learned, skillfull in the Ciuill Law, and experienced in Antiquities of elder times, and preferring none to any office or charge by suite, but only by the commendation of each mans worth and fittnes for the place: In regard whereof, hee caused Taurinus (one of his Courtiers who tooke money of diuers, with promise to procure the Emperours fauour in their suites) to be put to death by smoake, the Crier proclaiming, That hee had sold smoake, and therefore with smoake he should die. And likewise to cut off, in Law-ers their continuall selling of Iustice (the bane of all Common wealths) for a fee, hee granted a publike & set reward to such as should plead gratis. By which courses, his ciuill affaires were nobly managed, and his warres likewise proued as prosperous: for hee triumphed with great glory ouer the Parthians: The Germanes also, who in furious manner had passed the Riuers Danubius, and the Rhine, in many skirmishes hee put backe, and forced them to their former obedience.

Bountifull and liberal he was both to the people & soldiers, as by the reuerse of his Coine aboue prefixed is seene, wherein is expressed the fourth Donatium and Congiarium, bestowed by the bounty of this Emperour vpon the Souldiers and common people, of which Lamprius maketh mention in his life.

(4) But as Enny euer attends persons of Estate, and a desire of change, breeds a dislike of the present, so the Roman Legions growne farre out of order by the prodigious Gouvernement of the last Emperour, proued now vnaturall to their dread Soueraigne: whose warres drawing him into Germanie, and thence hither into Britaine, hee found some of his Souldiers here so tumultuous, that hee thought fit to vfe exemplary severity towards them, whereupon they, being Maximinus Emp.

Maximinus Caesar.

Maximinus, a man barbarous by birth and disposition, (himselfe a Thracian, his father named Nicea, borne in Gottland, very obscure, his mother Ababa of little better rancke) spent his youth in keeping of Cattell, the poverty of his parents admitting no better

(3) The ignoble Ypsart thus borne from the dunghill, vpon the wings of Fortune, vnto the feat of Maieftie, thought the increase of his pride was an increase of State; and knowing hee had nothing for which he might deserue to be loved, he studied in the whole managing of his estate, how by all meanes hee might be feared. Hee therefore displaced Senatours, Captaines, Souldiers, and whom nor? with murders, banishments, and confiscations of their goods: all such especially he did cut off, whom hee supposed to haue knowledge of his base beginnings. The Christians likewise vnder him were martyred, (whereof Origen wrote a Booke, not now extant) and he is by Writers accounted the sixth Persecutor of Gods Saints: so that, whereas his flatterers at first called him Milo, Anteus, and Hercules, for his strength; now they all teamed him, Busiris, Phalaris, and Cyclops, for his farrage crueltie.

(4) But his life being odious to God and Man, was often attempted to be taken away; first, by Maximus, a man of a Consular dignitie; then by Quartinius (whom Capitolinus calleth Ticus) set on by the old Souldiers of Septimus Seuerus, that had bene disgraced by Maximinus; and lastly by the Army in Africa, who elected Gordianus (their Proconsul, a very worthy and learned man of fourescore yeeeres old) Emperour, and his sonne (of the same name and Princely qualities) his Caesar: the Senate likewise confirming all that they had done. He tooke to himselfe the surname Africanus either in respect of his Proconsulship which he exercised in that Province, or else as descended from Scipio his family who bore that surname: His sonne Gordianus likewise was stiled Augustus, as appeareth by his Coines, whereon hee writeth himselfe A V G. and vpon the Reverse, Liberalitas A V G. (5) In the meane while, aged Gordianus with the Enligens and glory of an Emperour, entred Carthage, with blessings and acclamations of ioy: whereat his old enimie Capellianus, Governour of Numidia and Mauritania (Provinces in Africke) much enuid; and gathering forces in Maximinus his name, made head against him, and shortly gaue him Battle, wherein Gordianus the younger was slain before the walles of the Citie. The father seeing his Caesars disastre, and himselfe an Emperour onely nominall, and his new risen Sunne to haue passed the circle of his height, and now to approach to the setting and fall, withed againe his priuate estate; and in despaire, griefe, and disdain of his enemies successe, with the Girdle which he wore, strangled himselfe to death, when hee had bene stiled Emperour only twenty six daies: whereat Maximinus was not a little ioyfull, and the Senate no lesse perplexed, seeing themselves depriued of their hopes, and now laid open to the Tyrants will, who like a Lion came raging on, threatening reuenge in all their blouds.

(6) The State thus standing, all the Peeres and Princes thereof assembled themselves together at Rome: and in the Temple of Jupiter, after long debating of their present dangers, concluded, that Maximus Pupienus and Clodius Balbinus together should bee Emperours; men of great account and fauour with the people. These taking Oath and Imperiall Robes, leuied forces to maintain their cause: and Balbinus taking charge of the Citie, Pupienus marched to meet Maximinus, who in great pride had passed the Alpes, entred Italia, and now laid siege against Aquileia, in which this was very memorable, that The Citizens vnto off the haire of their heads, to make bow-strings for resistance of so hatefull a Tyrant: where after long assault preuailing little, his discontented Souldiers fell to mutinie: and entering his Paulion, at noone day without resistance slew both him and his sonne, bearing the same name whom hee had created his Caesar, and whose monies, as he minted them, we haue inserted at the entrance of his Empire. Their heads for a Trophy they sent before them to Rome, where with such acceptations they were receiued, as that the Senate acknowledged themselves to be rid of a Monster.

(7) Hee was, as is said, exceedingly tall, his body great, and joints proportionable, faire of face, full eyes, and of such strength as is vncredible: and according to his limmes, so was his diet; for hee daily deuoured forty pound waight of flesh, and thereto dranke six Gallons of wine. He died aged fixty yeeeres and odde, when he had reigned three yeeeres, in the yeere of our Lord two hundred thirty and eight.

Pupienus Maximus and Clodius Balbinus thus elected together for Emperours, the one in action, and the other resident, a great sedition chanced betwixt the Senate and Souldiers, which grew to a bloudie issue among the Citizens; and Rome it selfe was set on thoritic little preuailing: which stricke such feare into their hearts, that they accounted these times most vnfortunate, and themselves and present estate to be most desperate. But the death of Maximinus (and his head happily brought them at the instant) gaue present life to their dying hearts. And Pupienus comming to Aquileia as much quieted the Armie, sent backe the Lieutenants to their places of charge, and with great pompe and praife returned to his Fellow Emperour.

both noble and ancient, made Citizens of Rome by great Pompey, and himselfe borne at Cales in Spaine. Pupienus Auncelors were much latter, yet had hee borne many Offices of Magistracie, and euer discharged them with wisdom and valour: both of them highly accounted of in Rome.

(3) Peace thus established beyond all expectation, with shoutes and applauses the Emperours enter the Senate-house, where (according to the custome and their deserts) they were tiled, The Fathers of the Senat, with thanks as to the onely preferuers of their liues and estates: and some extolling the Senate highly for their prouident foresight, in electing such sapient and worthy Emperours, contrarie to the rash and vndiscreet practise of such as chose their Gouernours to fit their owne fancies, rather then the charge to which they aduance them; and whose bad liues brought commonly their vintimely, but deserved deaths. The Pretorian Souldiers tooke themselves to bee taxed with those aspersions, and the rather, because the German Strangers were brought in to be of the Guard, as if themselves were not to bee trusted: so turning their spleene against the present Emperours, fought to set vp a new, which shortly after they found opportunitie to effect.

(4) For these Emperours, though aged and wise, were not so linked together in affection, as they were neere ioined in authoritie: and therefore the winde of emulation had the easier passage betwixt the chinkes of their owne conceits; the one prizing his wisdom and government to be more iudicious; the other, his birth and Nobilitie to be more honorable: and each of them hauing his owne Guard, stood vpon his owne Guard, though one Palace contained them both: and both their endeouours euer well conforing for the businesse of the Empire.

(5) At this time the Prouinces of Parthia and Germanie grew vnquiet, and by ciuill discords, endangered their subiections: to repress which, the Emperours agreed to goe in person, the one into the East, the other into Germanie. Now whilst these great preparations were in making, the Capitoline Games were celebrated in Rome, whereunto all (almost) resorted, but especially the new-come Guards of the Emperours. The Pretorians finding the aduantageous time, which they had long waited for, suddenly in armour assailed the Court; which Pupienus perceiving, sent in all haste for Balbinus, and both their Guards for defense. But his Fellow-Emperour, vpon a vaine suspicion detracted time himselfe, and hindered the forwardnesse of the Guards, so that these Traitors had easie access into both the Emperours Chambers, where in their rage they dispoiled them of their Imperiall Robes, and haled these poore aged and innocent Emperours, like two Thecues thorow the midst of the Citie: Lastly, they slew them, and left their bodies to despoightfull ignominie.

(6) These Emperours reigned together one yeere, and somewhat more, and died the yeere of Christ two hundred thirty nine: in which yeere happened so great an Eclipse of the Sun, that the noone-day thereby became as darke as the mid-night.

M. ANTONINVS GORDIANVS.

CHAPTER XXX.

M. Antoninus
Gordianus
Emp.

An. Do. 239.

Gordianus (for Antoninus he might not be called, a law formerly acted inhibiting the same) was the sonne of a daughter to old Gordianus (that had made away himselfe in Carthage, as is declared) at the age of eleven yeeres was created

Cesar by the Senate, with Pupienus and Balbinus; and at their deaths by the Pretorian Souldiers, elected Emperour, not yet fully fourteen yeeres of age. Greatly was he strengthened by the Alliance and Counsell of one Mithrius, his Prefect and Instructor, whom for his great learning he so honoured and loued, that he tooke his daughter for his wife; and by whose onely direction, he profpiously administrated his State affaires.

(2) Touching the affaires of our Prouinces proceedings, or what Lieutenants were employed in Britaine since Virius Lupus there placed by Senerus (since whose death our storie hath spent twenty seuen yeeres) we finde not recorded. Yet now in the raigne of young Gordianus, some glimmering light for her Gouernour appeareth by an Altar-Stone found in Cumberland at a place then called * Castra Exploratorum, with an inscription for the happy health of the Emperour Gordian the third, his wife Furia Sabina Tranquilla, and their whole Familie: which votiu Altar was erected by the Troupe of Horsemen surnamed Augusta Gordiana, when Emilius Crispinus a natiue of Africa gouerned the same vnder Nomius Philippus Lieutenant Generall of Britaine, in the yeere of Christ, two hundred forty three, as appeareth by the Consuls therein specified: whose forme and inscription wee haue followed by the Stone it selfe, now remaining at Connington among many others, in the custodie of Sir Robert Colton Knight.

* Old Carleil.

* I O M.

In his first yeere, the Parthians vnder the Leading of Sapor their King, had passed into the confines of the Romane Prouinces, as farre as Antioch in Syria, which Citie they had taken, with spoile of the Countries adjoining: against whom, the yong Emperour in warlike maner addressed himselfe, and in person prepared to vndergoe the warres.

(3) In Rome the Temple of Ianus that long had stood shut, he caused to be opened, a sure token that warres were in hand: and departing the City, passed the Straits of Hellespont, and tooke his way thorow Mysia, to stay the Goths that were come downe to inhabit Thracia. Thence marching to Antioch, recovered the Citie, forcing Sapor to forsake the Prouince, and to content himselfe with his owne demaines.

(4) But long this Sunne went not without a Cloud, nor his fauourable fortunes without a checke; for Mithrius, his Nestor, paying Natures debt before it was due (being poisoned by Philip, as Eutropius affirmeth) was wanting in counsell, & mislead for trust: to supply which, Philip (an Arabian, and of ignoble parentage) was made his Prefect; wife (I must needs say) had hee become moderate; and valiant in Armes, had hee beene true. But the glory of a Diademe beheld with the false light of ambition, so dimmed the eie of his dutifull affection, and blinded the senses of his aspiring mind, that he, who from nothing was risen to be something, thought that all nothing worth, whilst it was shadowed with the name of a subiect. First therefore he sought to winne credit with the Souldiers, to whom he was facile; to regard the poore, to whom hee was liberall; and in all things to outstrip his Soueraigne, to whom he was treacherous. Yong Gordianus vnable to endure his Prefectors designs, or his owne disgraces, and perceiving the marke whereat he aimed, complained his wrongs in open as-semblies, and to the Souldiers after this tenor.

(5) I got not this state from my Parents by birth, nor yet by any deserts (I must confesse) in my selfe, being the least of many that did deserue it better: but it was you, my fellow Souldiers (vpon what fate I know not) that haue made me what I am. If then I haue defrauded your hopes, by carrying my selfe vnder your expectations, I wish to bee set in the place where I first was; or rather (if I so deserue) my life, and state, may at one instant be ended by your vnering hands: For Noble mindes cannot brooke to be curbed with the bitte of base indignities, nor suffer their vassals to bee Corriuals of their Maestie. It is a ialous obiect (I must needs confesse) and many times casts great suspicion where is small occasion, but I, for my part, haue alwaies thought of that humour, that men causlessly ialous, doe most iustly deserue what they vniustlie feare; and both your selues will bee my witnesses, how farre I am from the touch of that staine, and also the daillie occurrences of my Cesar, (if so low I may terme him) doth make more then manifest. I am but yong, yet elder by fixe yeeres then I was, my body tender, yet exposed to the chaunce of warre; my counsell raw, yet bettered by your wisdomes; and my conquests in my selfe nothing, but yet in your valours both glorious & famous. What then are mine errors, that I may amend them? or your discontents that I may redresse? for by the powers of heauen I protest, it is your loues which I most esteeme, and the good of the Empire, for which I onely wish to liue; the first is in your powers to bestow at your pleasure, but the other in me (if it be possible) shall liue euen after death.

(6) These complaints notwithstanding, Philip so politickly, nay, rather traitterously brought his owne

protects to pass, as that the young innocent Emperour was displaced, and abandoned of all: in which distresse he first sued to be made his Cæsar, and that denied, to be his Pretorian Prefect: but neither would bee had, yet at length the charge of an ordinary Captaine, was with some difficulty granted him. But Philip bethinking himselfe of the greatnes of Gordianus his blood, his loue and esteeme both in Rome and the Provinces, and his owne vertues equalising any, hee commanded him to be slaine in the twenty two yeere of his age, and the first of his raigne. The Senate hearing thereof, elected M. Marcus, and after him again, L. Aurel. Seuerus, Osulianus. But Philip through the giddie multitude, prevailed against both. This Emperour though young, so well demeaned himselfe, that the Senate by authoritie added to his titles T V T O R R E I P V B L I C A E, and P A R E N S P R I N C I P V M P O P V L I R O M A N I, and after his death euen by his owne murderers, his Monument of faire Stone was raised in the confines of Perusia, and vpon his sepulchre this inscription set

DIVO GORDIANO VICTORI PERSARVM VICTORI GOTTHORVM VICTORI SARMATARVM DEPVLSORI ROMANARVM SEDITIONVM VICTORI GERMANORVM SED NON VICTORI PHILIPPORVM.

To the Sacred Gordianus vanquisher of the Persians, Gothes, and Sarmates, extinguisher of the Romane Civil discords, and subduer of the Germans, but not of the Philippians.

(7) He was of condition most noble and lowely, of behauiour gentle, very studious and giuen much to learning; having in his Librarie no lesse then three-score and two thousand Bookes, as is reported. The truth is, that wicked people were not worthy long to enioy so vertuous, so clement, so pcerles an Emperour. He died in the month of March, in the yeere of our Redeemer two hundred forty five.

Hat man is there, who considering those forepast murders, of so many, and so mightie Monarchs, would not, by the spectacle of others calamities, be induced to preferre the securitie of a moderate estate, before the desire of Soueraignty; whose glorious content is onely in appearance, but the cares and hazards are both real and perpetuall. But of so attractive vertue is the Load-stone of Maiesty, through the imagined felicity thereof, that most mens desires are drawne to that one point of the Compass, and if a little faire winde of fortune shall blow on them; they will launch forth with their full sailes into that Mare incognitum, a Sea of unknowne calamities. And amongst others, such were the blinde desires, and such the vnhappy euent of this Iulius Philippus the Arabick Barbarian. Of parentage obscure and ignoble, as Victor and others affirme, who pluckt off the imperiall robes of his Liege-Lord, to inuest himselfe.

(2) Being now accepted as Emperour by the Souldiers in Parthia, he wrote to the Senate of the death of Gordianus, as though it naturally had happened, and with faire pretensions of his good purposes, but more through the feare of his Parthian Souldiers, obtained their consents; whereupon shuffling vp a most dishonourable peace in those parts, and declaring his sonne Philip for his Cæsar, (whose Coines with his, we haue set in the beginning of this Chap.) hee made all speede towards Rome: where, the yeere ensuing, his shewes and games were exceedingly magnificent, for the Celebration of the Birth-day, (as we may terme it) of Rome, that beeing, the thousand yeere from her foundation.

(3) It pleased God at length to touch this Emperours heart, both with such a sense of his owne forepast sinnes, and also with the light of heauenly truth, that he hath the honour of being the first Emperour baptised into the faith of Christ, together with his sonne Philip, and his wife Seuera: though the publicke like authorizing of the same Profession was refused for the blessed times of our British Constantine. The meanes of his conuerfion from Idolatry, were Fabianus and Origen, who by letters exhorted him therunto: and for the same Profession, were both himselfe and sonne murdered by Decius his Captaine, though others report, that Decius did rather hate Christianitie for their sakes, then them for their Professions sake. And howeouer Pomponius Latens acculeth him to bee a dissembling Prince, yet Eusebius declareth the effects of his Profession farre otherwise: for Philip (saith hee) seeking to communicate with the Saints, could not bee admitted, till such time as he had made open confession of his Faith; at which time he ioined himselfe with those, who for their sinnes were brought to examination, and was placed in the roome of the Penitents, because that in many things he had bene faulty: which willingly he obeyed, and declared by his workes his sincere and religious minde towards God. Which may the rather appeare by Sabellius and Bergomensis, who shew, that the hatred of Decius against Philip and his sonne was conceiued, for that they had committed the custodie of their Treasures vnto Fabianus the Christian Bishop of Rome, who baptized them, as some write; though others say, Pancius the Martyr did it.

(4) The Gothes againe descending from Scythia, infected Misia and Thracia with a mighty Armie, seeking their habitations in those Countries as formerly they had done: against whose irruptions, the Emperour sent one Marinus a most valiant Captaine, who no sooner came into those parts, but drew the Souldiers into a Rebellion, and proclaimed himselfe Empe- rouer, taking (as he said) his example from Philip, that had in like sort raised his title by his Seueraignes fall: But the Souldiers that had newly erected him, as suddenly againe threw him downe, and in their mutable affections slew him.

(5) Into whose Charge was sent Decius, a man of great experience, who also no sooner was in the Armie, but they forced the Imperiall Ensignes vpon him, and (as some report) against his will: hee therefore sent secretly to Philip, declaring this attempt of the Souldiers, and how hee meant to make escape from them with persisting in his dutifull allegiance. But the Emperour fearing this to be but policie in Decius, lest by delay he might giue him more strength, omitted no time to vphold his owne, and with a mightie Armie undertooke these affaires himselfe, not trusting any more to the disposall of his Captaines. And immediately departing Rome, with a sterne resolution, and ouer-hard hand, held the reine of that begun Expedition, whereby he presently lost the loue of the Armie, and Decius was accounted the more worthy of rule, whom in Verona they forthwith proclaimed Emperour, and cut off Philip head thorow the teech, before they had departed Italie. At neuers whereof, the Pretorians slew Philip his Cæsar and sonne, a man of so obseruable composednesse, as that he had bene neuer seene to laugh in all his life. And thus the two Philips ended their raignes.

(6) Iulius Philippus (saith Eusebius) reigned seuen yeeres: but Entropius and Victor giue him onely five; whose death happened in the yeere of Christ Iesus, two hundred and fiftie.

His ouerthrow of the Romans, and death of Decius, in outward semblance was so greuously taken by Trebonianus Gallus, that no man was so forward for reuenge as hee, and therefore the last in suspicion of Treason. The Armie hee strengthened, and daily encouraged, pretending great seruite against those barbarous Scythians, but all to gaine credit and liking of the Souldiers, whereby hee soone atchieued his desire, and with their applauses was proclaimed Emperour.

His parentage.

(2) By Birth, he was descended of an honourable Familie in Rome: but true honour cannot harbour where dwelleth treachery and falshood, as it was with him, when appointed by Decius to bee Gouernour of Myfia, and to keepe the passages from the inuading Gothes, the desire of Rule so corrupted his minde, that he plotted with them against the Armie, and betrayed the trust and life of his Soueraigne.

(3) Neither is he stained with the blot of Treasons only, but also with a careless and cruell government; for with the Gothes hee made a dishonourable peace, whereby the Romans (who were Lords of the World) became Tributarie by a yeerely pay to those vnciuill Scythians, who neuertheless in short time brake their Treue with him, sacking and spoiling the Prouinces of Thracia, Myfia, Thessalia, and Macedonia: the Persians then also by their example entering Mesopotamia and Syria, made spoile euen thorow Armenia.

(4) Gallus little regarding these troubles abroad, consumed his time idly in Rome, rather as a Bondman to his owne voluptuous desires, then as a Conquering Monarch; taking for his companion and Fellow-Emperour, his sonne Volusianus, as appeareth by inscription

(5) For the Gothes continuing their furies begunne, his General Æmilian. Maurus ouerthrew them with a wonderfull slaughter; whereby hee grew so famous, and Gallus so contemptible, that the Souldiers (euer affecting change) proclaimed him Emperour, the newes whereof soone roused Gallus from the Bed of his lasciuious pleasures; and with his sonne entred the quarrell against Æmilianus, whose fortune was to slay them both in fight; the yeere of Christis Incarnation, two hundred fifty three, after hee had reigned not fully two yeeres, and liued (as Victor testifieth) forty and seuen: whereupon the Armies ioining their forces together, conferred the Imperiall Title and Ensignes vpon the Conquerour.

An. Do. 253.

Æmilianus succeeding Gallus by the only election of the Myfian Armie, was by birth an African in the Prouince Mauritania, of Parentage base and obscure; who being risen by the Warres from meane places of seruice, and no better then a Common

Souldier, aspired to the charge and credit of a Captaine Generall.

(2) His Election at first was contradicted by the Italian Bands, in fauour of Valerianus their owne Leader, whom they fought to raise Emperour, the Senate also inclining thereto, the fame of the man among them was so renowned. The most voices therefore heard on his side. Some haue rather accounted Æmilianus an Vsurper, then ranked him in the catalogue of lawful Emperours.

(3) But seeing Entropius doth allow him the place, we are not to dispute his title or claime: only his short time of government admitteth no matters of large discourse, being cut off in the budde, before the graft had time to spring. For his Armie disliking what themselves had done, and hearing of the worth and election of Valerianus, laid down their weapons born in his defense, and tumultuously murdered him in the heat of their blouds, after hee had reigned in name, without action, the space almost of foure moneths.

(4) So vnconstant is the state of worldly felicitie, and may bee compared to a masslesse shippe, which without Tackle is left to the mercie of the raging Seas, that is one while caried with the faire winde of hope towards the hauen of wilhed desires, but straightwaies ouerwhelmed with the waues of despair: and most especially him that is borne vpon the opinions of the giddy multitude, now carried aloft vpon the flouds of their fawning fauours, and anon left in the sands of their retiring ebbs, with a sudden shipwracke of all their fore-gone fortunes. And these adventures too soone Æmilianus felt, who the same yeere that hee thus put forth to Sea, lost all his aduecture, and therewith his life, Anno 253.

Dionysius in Epist.
ad Nicomachum apud Eusebium.Valerianus taken prisoner by Sapor

L F euer the saying of the wife Athenian Solon (spoken to Craesus the rich king of Lydia) was true, That no man can be happy before the day of his death: then most truly may it be verified of this Valerianus the next succeeding Emperor: whose yeeres were multiplied with increase of honour, vntill they came to secenty and seuen, but then were clouded with such ignominious miseries, as the like had neuer hapned to any Romaine Emperor before him, and (I may well say) to no other Monarch in the world before liuing: Such is the Ordinance of our great God, sometimes from the Dunghil to raise men of low degree, and to place them with Princes in the Chaire of Majesty; then againe to bring down the Mighty from their Seate of Glory, & to leaue them chained with the poorest Captiues, & basest Vassals. For such was the State of that Great & Proud King of Babel, who from the height of Majesty fell into the conditions of an vnreasonable Beast. And so was it with Valerianus, though not vterly abandoned fro the Societe of men, as Babels King was: yet was he carried Captive vnto a Nation whose Society was scarce humane, and where his viage was more then barbarous.

(2) This man was both nobly defended, and of so great esteeme among the Romans, that being but a private, and then also absent, they chose him for their Censor, an Office of high dignitie, conferred euer vpon the Best, as Trebellius Pollio, who wrote the History of his Life, hath declared. Eusebius reporteth his beginning to haue bene gracious and milde towards the Christians, about any of his Ancestors whatsoever; yea euen those who were themselves openly accounted Christians: in somuch, that his Clemencie was their Protection, and his Court the Sanctuarie of their felicities. But Satan (whose hatred sleepeth not) stirred vp an Egyptian Sorcerer against them, who so enchanted the Emperors heart, that with great crueltie he began the Eighth Persecution, & so raged, that some haue appropriated the sayings of the Apocalyps in the thirteenth chapter vnto him, as to whom power was given for two and sortie monethes ouer the Saintes of God, and a month to utter great blasphemies: Of which opinion is the ancient Dionysius Alexandrinus. Many indeed were the Martyrs that he caused with horrible tortures to die, and more had done, if the iust reuenging hand of God had not cut him off.

(3) For Sapores the slaue King of Persia, making great spoile in Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, drew Valerian from Rome into Mesopotamia, to withstand his rage, where striking Battell with him was left (either by Treason or Chance) without sufficient Guard to secure his Person, and was there taken Prisoner by the Persians, hauing then reigned seuen yeeres (whereof two were spent in spilling of the blood of Saints) and thence forward, the rest of his life was enthralled to a most miserable and mercilesse seruitude: For the Tyrannizing Persian putt vp with this fortunate gale, to an excesiue swelling of pride; whensoever he was disposed to take Horse, made Valerianus his Foot-stoole, causing this Greatest Monarch of the World to whom all Nations did homage, to bow downe his necke and backe for himselfe thereon to tread, and mount into his Saddle: In which vnufferable slaucerie, his old body indured without release, to the end of his most wretched life, which by some Authours account was full seuen yeeres more; the very time of the Babylonian Kings abasement.

(4) But herein the misery of Valerianus is much greater then Nabuchadnezzars was, in that God both restored him to his former glory, and induced him with heavenly grace to confesse his finnes; whereas Valerianus perished in the desperate calamitie whereinto he was fallen; as Eusebius sheweth in these words: And thou Valerian, forasmuch as thou hast exercised the same cruelty in murdering the subiects of God, therefore hast proued vnto vs the righteous iudgement of God, in that thy selfe wast bound in Chaines, and carried away for a Captive Slave with thy Glorious Purple and thy Imperiall Attire, & at length also commanded by Sapors King of the Persians, to be laine, & powdered with salt, hast set vp vnto all men a perpetual Monument of thine own wretchednesse.

(5) How vnspokeable the cruelties were which this wretched Emperor endured by that Tyrant, may hence appeare, in that not only those which were Allies to the Romaine Empire, but also the Barbarous Kings, and friends of Sapores were moued with commiseration, and distaste, as Trebell. Pollio proueth by their own letters sent for his release, the copies whereof he there produceth. Other Princes also of the East, as of the Backians, Albanians, Aberians, and Scythians, inhabiting Mount Taurus, had such sense of these inominious vlags, that they disdained to receiue the letters from Sapor of his Victorious successe, and sent their Ambassadors to Rome, proffering their assistance for the redemption of their Emperor; yet all auailed not, and Sapor held fill his Prisoner, abating nothing either of his owne pride, or his Captiues miserie, but in the end (so hellish a fiend is reuenge) commanded his Eyes to be pulled out, and so for age and griefe he died, as Eusebius saith: being, as Agathus (a writer of credit) reporteth, slaine aloue by direction of this vn humane King. Thus did God punish one Tyrant by another, and thus himselfe felt those torments vnspied, which hee had without pittie inflicted on others. The race of whose Raigne is accounted to bee seuen yeeres before his Captiuitie, wherein he liued almost so long as Gallienus his sonne sat Emperor, and died in the yeere two hundred sixty one.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

An. Do. 261.

Valerian now Captiue in Persia (while Odenatus grasping the advantage, tooke vpon him the Empire of the East; & the now guidelesse Armie of Rome, occupied onely in spoile and mutinie, their leaders in faction, and the whole State affrighted in affrighted terror and amazement) Balsila (a gallant gentleman) first of the Romans moued with the instant miserie of the Common-wealth, resolved by electing anew an Emperor, to prevent the apparant ruine of his owne Country: yet neuer in this his worthe resolution, once dreamed of Gallienus, (though before chosen Augustus in the full fortune of his father) but the affection of the Armie forcibly seled the Garland vpon Macrian and his two sonnes, as the most worthe; who with his eldest not long after subdued by Aureolus vsurping Illyria (against Gallienus then receiued Soueraigne by the Roman Senate) and his youngest betrayed to murder by plot of Odenatus, left the distracted Empire to those three, of which the last did disdain much the indignitie offered to the State of Rome, by that base captiuitie of Valerian, whose calamity nothing touched the sense of his vn naturall sonne, entered a warre against the Persians, and tooke from them their Cities Nisabiz and Carrae. But such was the moderation of this man, that although hee had power of an independent Soueraignty, yet he held still a good correspondencie and intelligence in all his actions of Government, with Gallienus, to whom he sent (as monument of Victorie and Reuenge) such of the Persian Nobilitie as became his Prisoners: and thus Odenatus did conquer, and Gallienus triumph. But such was the basenesse of the other, that when he could not by any Princely vertue in himselfe, eclipse the true merit of Odenatus, he endeouored to deface by treachery what he could not suppress by valour. But in this failing, hee made him then (through feare) copartner of his Empire, killing him Augustus, and stamping his face and the Persian Triumph vpon the publike Coin of the State, by approbation of the Senate, leauing him alone to defend those Frontiers of the Empire, whilst himselfe, neither regarding his old fathers miseries, (most miserable that he had so vn naturall a sonne) the dishonour of the Romane State, nor the reuolts of the Provinces, whereof newes was daily brought him, spent his vnprincely thoughts vpon fruitlesse deuices, as in referring sundry Fruits and Flowers, that they might grow greene and flourish all seasons of the yeere; and (which was worse) vpon women and wanton dallian-

ces. Yet had hee a Ladie of excellent beauty and allurements, Cornelia Salonina Pipara, to his wife, the daughter of the King of the Marcomanni, whose feature wee finde often minted vpon her Monies. His sonne by her Saloninus hee adopted Cesar, of whom there is no more remembered in Storie, then that hee was borne noble, trained vp princely, and perished through the errors of his father, and not his owne. And to his brother Licinus Valerianus (to whom the father had giuen the title of Cesar) he added the honour of Augustus. And therefore we haue not held it improper, to adioine to his their monies in the front of his life.

(2) The calamities of this Emperors time were so many, as almost exceed credit: and Signes shewed both in the Heauens and the Earth, manifested his wrath, that late vpon the Throne of Isler, from whose presence issued Thunderings, Lightnings, and Voices. For (by Writers of best credit) the sunne was clouded as vnder sackcloth, and not seene for many daies together. Earth-quakes great, and fearfully refounding, ouerthrew Cities and other edifices, shaking the ground so terribly, that vast Caues, and hideous gaping bowels of the earth were thereby laid open, and whereout (no lesse strangely) flowed great streames of salt waters. The Earth roared, and seemed to thunder, when there was no voice heard in the aire. The Sea ouer-swelled her banks, and brake into many Continents, drowning Countries, Cities, and People: and (besides all these) so violent a Pestilence raged, that in Rome no lesse then 5. thousand persons died in a day.

(3) These miseries somewhat moued this Heathenish Emperor to remorse: and thinking thereby to pacifie the wrath of the Diuine Powers, hee staied the Persecutions of the Christians, sending out his Edicts in fauour of them. For not only the Heauens, Earth, and Seas declared the anger of their God, out of whose mouth went a two-edged sword, but the Provinces also seemed to be removed out of their places. The Souldiers of all parts electing their owne Generals, advanced no lesse then Thirty at once, who assumed the title of Emperours, but are recorded to Posterities by the name of vsurping Tyrants. And as they were all deadly opposites each to other, so were they iointly almost all bent against Gallienus; whereby the Romane Empire was more oppressed with her owne forces, then euer it had been by forraigne Powers. And since sixe of them assumed the Purple Robe in this Western Angle of the Empire, it will not be impertinent to the course of Storie, with a light touch to remember them, and to expresse their Monies, as we haue done the rest of those that held the reins of government in these parts of the Romane World.

Apoc. 1. 16.Thirty Emperors at once.

M. Cassius Labienus Posthumus after the death of Saloninus (who was committed to his education by Gallienus) assumed the Empire, by aide and encouragement of those of Gallia, over whom he had born the office of lieutenancy by favour of Valerian the Emperour. And these again, as all Populars greedie of Innovation from him and Iunius Cassius Posthumus his sonne, tooke both honour and life, after ten yeares gouernment. This opportunity either made by L. Elianus, or fitly taken, mounted him vp with ale into that Imperiall throne, in which he sat not with like fortune of continuance, though of conclusion. To this man succeeded together, M. Aurelius Victorinus, and Lucius his son; both in a Tumult neere Colap by their souldiors murdered. And had not the inordinate lust of the elder, blemished his other vertues, he had toall the most excellent Emperors bin nothing inferior, in the best of their other vertues.

(7) The restless humor now of the giddy Commons, next setleth it selfe vpon Aurelius Marius, a foueraigne future in his meane condition to their base affections (for he was no better then a Black-smith) yet to him a man of their own meanes & making, they were no lesse vnconstant and cruel, then to the rest: after three daies, setting an end of his gouernment, with a sword of his own forging. And therefore Pinxus Tetricus, the father and sonne, though ascending the throne of Maiestie, with the greatest applause of that people, and filling it vp with much merit and happy success of their own, when they considered the insufferable insolencies and desperate practises of that prophane tanke, chose rather to adorne Aurilians Triumph, in a voluntarie captiuitie, then to iue and rule at the deuotion of a lawlesse multitude. And these times seemed no lesse fatally bent to bloud, disorder, and tyranny in other parts as well as these: For the Pannians raised Ingenius: The Mysians, A. Regillianus: The Egyptians, Emilianus: In Africa Celsus was proclaimed: In Ilyricum, Aureolus: and in the East, Odenatus (a man the more famous for Zenobia, his glorious and magnanimous Wife; Whose valour was so feared of Gallienus, that to make him his, hee admitted him his Fellow-Emperor, with the Stile of Augustus as we haue remembered before.) The Germans inuade Italy: The Goths waite Greece, Pontus and Asia; The Samaritians (eizec Austriche and Hungary): The Persians robbe Syria: The Saxons breake into Gallia: The Franks into Spaine: In a word, all are in vproares, the second seale opened, and the Red-horse prepared for Battaille, whose Rider had receiued a great and sharpe Sword, with Commission giuen him to take Peace from the Earth: and these times of troubles are so famous in Storie, and the reuelations of Acts so agreeable to the words of the Prophecie, that they may seeme iustly a most exact accomplishment of that sacred vision.

(5) Finally, when Gallienus had reigned from his first Associating with his Father the terme of fifteene yeeres, Martian, Heraclianus, and Cerionus, three of his principall Captaines, (compounding together that one of them should bee Emperour) plotted his death, whiles hee besieged the Citie Milan, where they traiterously murdered him, the yeere of our Lord two hundred sixty nine, after that hee had suffered the Empire to be rent in peeces, and vsurped by many Foraine and barbarous Nations.

drop the Waller, those mounted Towers which so long had braued the Skie, had bene laid leuell with the Ground, and made the ruines of All-consuming Time.

(2) For whereas by the strange confusions vnder the late Emperour, the Eagles body was burdened with the waight of those thirty heads at once: of which number though many of them by their owne mutuall rauening were consumed before the death of Gallienus, yet the mightiest, as Aurelius Gouvernour of Dalmatia, Tetricus and Victorinus, who held Britaine and Gallia; and Zenobia (the Heroicke Queen and wife of Odenatus) all the East, to omit the Murderers of Gallienus, that darst not make their claime, (their deed so ill diggested) all these were still remaining and strong, at such time as Flavius Claudius by the Souldiers was elected before the Walles of Milan, and confirmed with much ioy by the Senate in Rome.

(3) This Flavius was descended of noble Parentage, out of Dalmatia, by some; or as others say, of Dardania, and sprung from the Troian Blond. But Aurelius Victor will haue him the sonne of Gordianus the Emperour before spoken of. Howsoever, a most worthy man he was, an excellent Captaine, of singular continence, a iust Iudge, a louer of strangers, severe to the wicked, but most benigne to the vertuous: so that we may well say, In Rome was a new world; or at least, In the World was a new Rome.

(4) His first Expedition was against Aurelius, that held Milan, whom he there slew, and iointed his Souldiers to his owne strength. But preferring the generall good before his particular quiet, he addressed his warres for the East, against the Goths, who (as Tornandes their Story-writer reporteth) had infested those parts of the Empire (for fifteene yeeres continuance) with continuall irruptions, and had now lately entred friendship with many other like barbarous Nations, inuading Thracia, and the Countries before them, euen vnto Macedonia: and thence taking their way thorow Hungarie, came downe the Riuer Danubie, with two thousand Saile of Ships, fraught with Munition and Men. To meet these, Claudius prepared: but before his Encounter, he wrote thus to the Senate:

(5) "Renowned Fathers and Reuerend Lords, vnderstand ye for certaine, that three hundred and twentie thousand men of warre are entred our Confinnes, whose waight doth seeme to burden the Earth it

selfe, and whose warre-like preparations make these parts of the Empire to tremble and quake; with whom I am now to strike Battle: wherein if the Conquest be mine, the ioy will be yours. But if I fall, yet I pray remember that I fight after Gallienus hath reigned, and rent the strength of the Romans in these remote Prouinces, and after the Rebellions of Lollianus, Posthumus, Eugenius, Regillianus, Celsus, and others, who haue so weakened the finewes of our Armes, and broken the Swords and Launces of our defence, that I may well say, wee want, if not strength, yet weapons wherewithall to fight. And to our shame be it spoken, Zenobia a Woman commands all our Crosse-bowes, and bends them against our vnarmed breists. How small focuer therefore our performance shall bee in this seruice, repute it (I pray) for great, and with our proceeding may be fort to the weale of the Empire.

(6) Which done, with no daunted spirit he entred Battle, and with more then wonted courage fought so valiantly, that he flew and tooke Prisoners, to the number of three hundred thousand fighting men, with two thousand Shippes laden with Munition, so that whole houses were filled to their toppes with Targets, Shields, Swords, and Launces, and other abillments for Warre, whereof he wrote againe to Rome: and following the Enemy with successe of Victorie, in Thracia neere Bizantium, in Macedonia neere Thessalonica, droue the Goths out of those parts which they had so long infested, and restored the wonted bounds of the Empire. Thence marching into Germanie, neere the Lake called Garda, gaue that reuolted Nation a great ouerthrow, where (as Eutropius and Victor doe report) hee vanquished two thousand of those stoupe Germans, and there established againe their subiection to the Romans power. And now minding to goe forward against Tetricus and the pusilliant Zenobia, a Feuey did first cut off his purpose, and shortly after his life: a thing very strange and rare in that age, as by the course of their raignes wee haue hitherto seene; not that so great a Monarch should die, (they being all of the same earthly mould that meanest men are) but that in those daies a Roman Emperour should die in his bed, as other men doe, of a natural death.

(7) Hee was of personage tall, his bodie well composed and strong, bright and cleere eyes, his face great and full; and of life most temperate and chaste. Hee reigned one yeere, tenne moneths, and fifteene daies, and died the fourth of Februarie, in the yeere of Christ, two hundred fuentie one. His Statue of Gold was set vp in the Capitall, and his Targer of the same metall hung vp in the Senate-house, himselfe (in honour of his admired worth) placed among the Romane Emperours that were deified for Gods: such an estimation and loue did his vertuous life procure vnto him euen after his death.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

A. Quintilius Emperor.

Emperius.

Quintilius brother to the last Emperour.

Quintilius, the Brother of Claudius, and Vice-Roy in his absence for the Guard of Italy, was by the Armie whereof hee had command, proclaimed Emperour immediately vpon the Newes of Claudius his death: The Senate as iofully confirming his Election, as they were sorrowfull for their losse of his most worthy Brother. Brethren indeed they were by nature, and in conditions not much vnlike; so that what seemed to bee past in the one, was in the other supplied and still remaining: For this M. Aurelius Quintilius, was both wise for Civil Government, and experienced for Warres, wanting no complements of an absolute Prince.

(2) But long his glasse stood not without a turne, nor his Fortunes fauning without a frowne. For the victorious Souldiours which in his expeditions had followed Claudius, and thought themselves worthy of the first voyce in Election, proclaimed Aurelianus for Emperour, a most valiant Captain; and of whose prowess there had been so sufficient experience, as that Quintilius knew hee could not stand against him.

And therefore mistrusting the strength of his Title, and affections of his Souldiours, reputed ignominious for a noble minde, to die with lesse honour then he attained vnto, and enioied by his life: and therefore resolving to die an Emperour, chose rather by a voluntary cutting of his own veines, to powre out his life with his bloud, then to hazard the chance of vncertaine warres, or to returne to his private estate.

And thus no longer reigning then seuenteen daies, (which short time could minister little matter of larger discourse) hee died with his brother the same moneth of February the twentieth day, and yere of Christ his incarnation, two hundred seuentie one.

him of the Senate in Rome continued still his riuall for Maiestie, and attained the top of that high set

Gole, whereof Quintilius failed, before his foot had well mounted the first step.

(2) This Valerius Aurelianus was of parentage neither honourable nor rich, and yet his fortunes carried him to the height of both. Some recount his birth was of Dacia; others of Mysia; both so doubtful that Flavius Vopiscus, (the copious Writer of his Life) leaves it vndecided, and to the censure of his Readers. His risings were by the Warres; wherunto from his child-hood hee had a naturall inclination: and for continuall carying of his weapons, was commonlie called Aurelianus the Sword-bearer.

(3) His seruice was sufficiently knowne to the Generals of diuers Provinces, who had forty sundry times imploied him in the charge of a Lieutenant, and vnder Claudius in Persia he was the Coronell of the Horse. In the warres of Sarmatia he is reported to haue slaine forty Enemies with his owne hands in one day; and at other severall times, to the number of nine hundred men, as both Vopiscus and Theodorus haue affirmed. And generally so famous were his deeds, both before he was Caesar, and after, as that he is by some compared with Julius and Alexander.

(4) Vpon the ratifying of his election by the Senate at Rome, hee hastned not thither to be saluted and enstalled Emperour, but forthwith marched against the Suetians and Sarmates, who fore infested the Empire with warres: and having soone subdued them, and quieted those parts, in great haste hee came into Italia against the Germans, who with Fire and Sword had gone as farre as Milan: and them likewise with great valour hee forced thence. Then entering Rome with great pompe, caused the Walles to bee repaired and enlarged, which was not lawfull but onely for Victorious Emperours. But long hee staid not, ere he returned into Syria, against the stout Queene Zenobia, whose braue resolutions, and warlike power for fight, her Letter in answer vnto him (when being sorely tired, hee profered her wealth, life, and liberty to yeeld) doth manifestly declare: the tenour thereof being as followeth.

(5) "Zenobia, the most mighty Eastern Queene, to Aurelianus, Romes Angulus, sendeth greeting.
Neuer Capitaine to this day, in vying Penne in stead of Speare, or filed Words for weapons points, hath more sufficiently discharged the parts of Warre, then thou to me in Writ hast done: wherein I well perceiue thy drift, and blame thee not, that seest me but a Woman: which Sex you men make subiects only by your smoothing tongues. But know, Augustus, thou dealest not with a Roman Dame, nor with her who vpon base conditions will subscribe her honour; but with Zenobia, the * Palmyrean Queene, in whose womanly brest the manly heart of great Odenatus doth still liue and lie. These courting termes doe ill become a Campe, and worser him who would be stiled a Mars. But yet thy Gal-den Showre hath rained befide our Lappe; nor wee a Venus to meete thee for thy sport, but with our Laurence in hand to trie our lawfull right, and with our Swords to answer thy demands in bloud. I am a Woman; so was * Tomyris; thou knowest the rest: in Armes against Augustus; so was Cleopatra, who rather chose to sting her selfe to death, then liue a subiect (though a Prince) vnder great Octavian. Art thou his better? thou art deceived: or I ther worse? nothing lesse: who from her person doe deriue my Pedigree, and from her courage will maintaine my cause. I am a Queene, and raigned beloued, was Romes Emperesse, obeyed and honoured; and the wife of Odenatus, whom all you Romans greatly feared. Are my powers weake? The Persians (whose strength you well haue tried) will supplie. Are my Souldiers few? The Saracens haue more that will assit: and the Armenians are wholly at my command. If then Thebes and Robbers in Syria were sufficient to ouerthrow thine Armie, what hope is left thee to escape our hands, when all these our strengths shall be thus conioined in one? Therefore the same offers that "to me thou hast sent, the same to thee I heere returne, and will performe, if thou in time embrace this truce.

(6) This haughtie answer of that vndaunted Queene, put more fire to the furie of Aurelianus, who tooke the Letter in such scorn, that hee threatened death to the Inditer, (whom he supposed to be Longinus the Philosopher, who was alwaies with her, and her Instructor) which afterwards hee did accomplish: for destroying her severall Aids before they could meete together, and besieging Palmyra her strong Citie, hee brought the same to such distresse, that in the end hee tooke her Captiue; and glad of such a prey, carried her himselfe to Rome, where following his Chariot of Triumph, attired in Tiffues and richest Robes of price, shee was lead his Prisoner in Chaines of Gold: vpon whose presence the Spectators with admirations so much gazed, that somewhat it dimmed the Maiestie of Aurelianus: for hee is said to be exceedingly faire, though not very white, but somewhat browne: her eyes blacke and bright, her teeth shining like pearles, her bodie tall, and of most stately proportion, her countenance modest, milde, and pleasing, her voice sweet, her conuersation honest, her minde chaste, and body continent, wife, temperate, and learned in the Greeke, Latine, and Egyptian tongues. Yea the achievement of this Conquest was held so notable, that hee reputed himselfe the Restorer of the East, as it appeareth by the reuerse of his money here prefixed in the entrance of his raigne.

(7) These Acts of Aurelianus made him so famous abroad, and feared at home, that Tetricus which had held out against Galienus, came in vnder his protection, holding it more safe to bee a Subiect in quiet, then a Commander against an Opposite of so invincible a minde: by whom thereupon hee was made Gouvernour of Campania, and of other Provinces in Italie.

(8) Hitherto this Emperours successes were very prosperous (we may well suppose) for his indulgence to the Christians, whose assemblies he permitted, and whose Bishops he so fauoured, that at their request hee banished Paulus Samosatenus the Heretike out of their Conncells, and published an Edict in the behalfe of their Synods. But afterward Satan minding to sift the Wheat, that the Chaffe might be his, stirred vp this Emperour to raise the Ninth Persecution, and to send forth his Edicts for the destruction of Gods Saints: which whilest he was in perusing, and about to set his hand and scale, a Thunderbolt from Heauen strake into his presence, and so neere vnto his person, that all accounted him to be therewith slaine, God warning him by this his Messenger to be wife, lest hee perished in his own waies; as shortly after hee did, being slaine by his Seruants, through the Treason of Mnesiphens his Secretarie, the nine and twentieth day of Februarie following, neere vnto the Citie Bizantium, when hee had late Emperour foure yeeres, eleuen moneths, and seuen daies, the yeere of our happinesse, two hundred twenty six.

(9) He was of stature tall, of body well shaped, a pleasing countenance, and of a seemly presence, a great feeder, and very seuer, whereby he was as much feared as beloued, and therefore reported to be a good Physitian, but that hee ministered too bitter Potions; and was Canonized after his death among the holy Emperours: in the second yere of whose raigne, the Great Constantine of Helena in Britaine was borne.

CHAPTER XL.

Claudius Tacitus Emp.

An. Do. 276.

Aurelianus being dead no man sought to be Emperour.

Senate and Souldiers brain courtiers who shall choose the Emperour.

Enthusiasm of the People.

Claudius Tacitus elected Emperour.

The former seditions ended by Aurelianus, and the state of the Empire remaining now in quiet, no man appeared to sue, much less tumultuouslie to strive for that Royal Diadem; but all the great Commanders (as though they made courtesie in giving way each vnto others) stood at the foot of Maieftie; no man attempting higher to mount. The souldiers sent to the Senate, to designe the man whom they best liked; the Senate requested the souldiers to elect him whom they held worthiest, in which respectiue complements, and most kinde correspondencie of all parts, eight moneths passed with a peaceable Interregnum, as writers report.

(2) It seemeth, the fresh sense and fearefull experiences of the former heady proceedings, made men more wise, then to seeke their owne deaths, and especially the Generals to be better aduised, then to runne desperately vpon their owne destructions. A change incredible, that Tiberius ere whiles would needs be fitted Emperours, among the tumultuous Souldiers (though they were sure to buy the use of that name with their dearest blood) and not one now in peace could bee found, either halty to seeke it, or verie willing to accept it.

(3) At last both Senate and Souldiers, having in their eye M. Claudius Tacitus, a man very Noble and of Consular degree, of great age, singular learning, & long experience in Magistracie; him by a ioint and conspiring suffrage, they all elected to their Empire: but he having before hand some inkling of this their purpose, got him out of the way, living very secretly two moneths at his Rurall Mannor, flying (saith Popiscus) that high dignity which he fore-saw would proue his overthrow. And when they did by Embassages often sollicite him to accept of their Election; sending him the Ensignes and Stile of Augustus; hee againe returned them, though with hartie thanks, yet absolute deniall, alledging by reason of his age and infirmities, that hee was euery way vnable to discharge their so great expectations.

(4) But after much inter-courfe, and many intertreaties passed, at length (the necessitie of the State so requiring) he accepted their offer, though not with much contentment to himself, who knew the waight of so great titles would proue heavy & alwaies dangerous for him to beare; but with vnspokeable ioy, was recciued by the whole State, which promised all blessed hopes to the state vnder so worthy, so wise, so vertuous, learned, and so iust an Emperour.

(5) For as before his aduancement, he was of Exemplary composednes and vertuous disposition, so in this high Estate, his life was temperate, and without al pride, & so desirous to be a Preceder of moderation, & singularity vnto others, as that he would not permit his Emperesse to weare any Tewels of high price, nor to vse other customable superfluitie, or excessie in his owne house. For learning and learned men, whom he euer embraced in his priuate Estate, he now by all meanes endeouored to honour and aduance, and publickly professed that what Imperiall vertues hee had, hee was to ascribe them to his study of good letters: For which cause, hee was wont to call Cornelius Tacitus (that worthiest Historian of the Romans State) his Father, and commanded his workes to be carefully preferred in euery Library throughout the Empire; and ten times euery yeare to be transcribed on publique cost. All which notwithstanding, many of that worthy Authors Bookes haue since miscaried.

(6) But his vertues were too great for the world long to enioy: and such his Raigne was but short, it is bootlesse to lengthen it with long discourses: For his Peace continued without any memory of Warres; and his short time (wherein hee did nothing without consent of the Senate) was spent rather reforming other mens vices, and abuses of the Lawes and State, then in displaying his owne vertues; which doubtlesse (if their faire streame had not bene vntimely stoppt) would haue proued incomparable to any his fore-goers, and vmatchable by any his followers. What death hee died is left vncertaine; Entropius thinketh him slaine, by his rebellious souldiers in Asia, vpon his voiage against the Persians; but Victor reporteth that hee died a naturall death, and that of a burning-feuer, in the citie of Tharsus: And Flautus Popiscus, (who wrote his life) saith his death came vpon a lurcharge of griefe, by reason of factions; whereby (the infirmities of his age thereto helping) his vnderstanding was crazed, and his heart broken, whereof hee died, when he had reigned six moneths, and twenty daies, the yeare of Christ Iesus, one hundred seuentie six.

CHAPTER XLI.

M. An. Florianus Emp.

An. Do. 277.

Florianus made himselfe Emperour.

Sooner was the death of Tacitus divulged, but his brother Florianus (much vnlike him in that point) tooke vpon him the Name and Authoritie Imperiall, without expecting any election either of Senate or Souldiers, and therefore not likely long to stand sure.

And although in all other princely parts hee was not much vnlike his brother, yet hauing so great an Opposite as Probus was, on whom the Easterne Armie had conferred the same Title, the blossomes of his conceited hope withered euen in the budde, and perished before they had any time of growth.

(2) For no sooner came to his eares the newes of Probus his election, but he found that heady and precipitate attempts were pleasing in their Beginnings, but full of difficulties in their Proceedings, and most disastrous in their Successes: and therefore despairing both of Men and Meanes to raise the Building, whose foundation he had so hastily (but too weakly) laid, hee caused his owne veins to be cut, as Quintillus before him in like case had done, whereby hee boldly bled to death, after hee had enioyed a Titular Soueraigntie only eight daies, saith Entropius: but Popiscus saith, not altogether two moneths, and thinkes him killed by the Souldiers, in the Citie Tharsus likewise, in the yeere of Christ two hundred seuentie and seuen.

CHAPTER XLII.

Val. Probus Emp.

An. Do. 277.

HE Easterne Armie most potent and famous at the death of Tacitus, from them was expected the new Emperours election, which accordinglie they did, but with much more wisdom and deliberate circumspection, then the Souldiers of those times were accustomed to doe. For euery Captainie of the Armie singled out his owne Companies, and in feuerall Assemblies exhorted, that all affections laid aside, they would applie their mindes to thinke of the worthiest man, on whom they might conferre their voices and fauours. At which time, the opinion of Probus his worth had so generally possessed the hearts of all men, that the shout and crie of all was vniforme, Let vs haue Probus for our Emperour. This being signified to Rome, the Senate with applause and thanks approoued and confirmed his Election, with additions to his Title, Augustus, The Father of his Countrey, and the highest Bishop. For in those times, euen amongst Heathens, the sacred Title of a Bishop was accounted an additament of honour euen to an Emperour.

(2) He was borne in Hungarie in the Citie Sirmia, of honourable Parentage, especially by his mothers side. His fathers name was Maximus, a man famous in Militarie Service, who died Tribune at the warres in Egypt: and himselfe very young, but very valorous, Probus called the father of his Countrey, and the highest Bishop.

by the Emperor Valerianus (who so loved him for his virtues, that he vied to say of him, that of all men he best deserved the name Probus, that is virtuous) was made a Tribune also. In which Office, with great praise he served vnder Gallienus, Aurelianus, & Claudius the Emperours; vnder whom besides other exploits he fought severall single-combats to the great honour of himselfe and Country, and received as marks of victories, many Civill Crownes, Collars, Bracelets, Launces, Banners, and other Ensignes of Martiall device and Priviledge. Preferred to be Generall in Africa, he subdued the Marmarides: In Egypt the Palmyrenes; vnder Aurelianus the Sarmates and Germans; vnder Claudius the Goths; and in all places so famous for his Acts, that hee was compared with Hannibal and Cesar.

(3) His first service after hee became Emperour was in Gallia, against the Germans, that had made themselves Lords thereof, where in one Battell, continuing two daies, he slew some hundred thousand of them, and recovered severall Cities from the Enemy, as himselfe signified by his own Letters to the Senate. After this warring in Sclavonia, he quieted the Provinces of Macedonia, Russia, and Polonia: And entering Thracia, did no lesse in Greece, Syria, Arabia, Palestina, and Iudea; whence passing into Persia, hee had honourable compositions of Narsus their mighty King. Whereupon issued so vniuersall Peace, that there were no warres heard of in all the Provinces of the Empire; inasmuch that it was a common Proverbe, The very mice durst not gnaw for feare of Probus. But long this lasted not, ere hee was disturbed: for the Egyptians erected one Saturninus, a Captaine both wife and valiant, for Emperour, and that so fore against his will, as he was like to be slaine by them for gaine-saying their desires; and by a speech deliuered to his Erectors, he made known to them his aduersities from so dangerous an ambition; to this effect.

"(4) Fellowes and Friends, by my whole endeavours I haue alwaies fought to prevent that, which now I see I cannot thinne, I meane the Throne of Maiesie; which howeouer to others, it may seeme full of glory and securitie, yet to my self, I fore-see it will proue, both base and dangerous. Base, for that I am no more the master of mine owne affections; which hitherto in my private estate were bestowed freely, & where I thought best, but must henceforth be caied at other mens dispose, and cast vpon those that deserve them least. That little time that I was wont to take, in retyring my selfe to my selfe, must now be straitened to serue others; and my thoughts wholly spent to prevent those weapons, which are borne (in shew) for my defence, but are (in truth) the keyes of mine Imprisonments. I cannot go without a Guard: I cannot sleepe, without a watch; I cannot cate without a Taster; these are but bondage to a free condition, and neuer neede in a private fortune. That it is dangerous, it is no lesse apparent: for besides the sharp-pointed & weighty sword, hanging onely by a twisted-therd ouer our heads, Probus is not a Gallienus to compound for the Diamond, but to touch his scepter, is to awake a sleeping Lion: What should moue you then, to stir vp his wrath, to seeke my death, and your owne destruction? For assure your selues when I die, I shal not die alone: So all our fame purchased in so many yeeres' imployments, shal be lost by this one daies worke: and my Conquests in Africa, of the Mores, and in Spain, branded lastly with the eternall feares and infamie of Rebellion.

(5) These speeches (as Flavius Vopiscus the Writer thereof receiued from the report of his Grand-father, who was there present and heard them) could nothing at all diuert the resolution of the Souldiers, but that they persisted and maintained their Election against Probus: who vpon notice thereof halting toward them with a mighty power, offered them pardon, as one vnwilling to shed Ciuill-bloud, or to lose so worthy a man as Saturninus was: but vpon refusal of his proffered Clemencie, hee gaue him a most sharpe battell, wherein most of the Recoulters were ouerthrowne, and Saturninus in the assault of a Castle besieged, was slaine, to the great griefe of Probus, who fought to haue saved his life.

(6) But with his death ended not all Ciuill Broiles: for Bonifus & Proculus two monsters of that age (though of different kinds of vices) opposing themselves against him, and assuming the Title and Robes Imperiall, vsurped the Provinces of Britaine, Spain and some part of Gallia, knowing that in these places Probus was not much beloved. Bonifus was borne in Britaine, but brought vp in Spain, without note of action, but onely in his cups, for hee was esteemed the greatest drinker of all men liuing: inasmuch as Aurel. said of him, he was born, not to ouerret, sed ut biberet; not to draw breath, but to draw in liquor: & yet (as it seemeth) hee was in good account vnder the said Aurelianus, hauing a charge of Ships vpon the Germane Seas, which either by treacherie or negligence were burned by the Enemy, in the mouth of Rhine, and (as Probus tooke it) not without the priuie of Bonifus: who therefore not daring to stand to the triall, made all his powers against the Emperour, but was in Battell ouercome, and despairing euer againe to make head, put his owne in a halter, whereupon it was said, that a Battell was hanged, and not a Man.

(7) Proculus was a Lygurian borne, as vsuatiated a vassall to Venus, as the other to Bacchus; and therewithall so impiouslie impudent, that as hee had a heart to commit any filthinesse, so a forehead to boast of it openly, as appeareth by his owne Letters, wherein hee vaunteth, how many scores of faire Virgins hee depeiuied of that faire name in one fortnight; but this Graund-General of Venus Camp was suddenly forsaken by his Souldiers, and came to his deserved end.

(8) Some stirs there were at that present in Britaine, by the incitements of their Gouernor, whose name though Histories doe not specifye, yet he may seeme to bee that Cl. Corn. Lullianus, whose ancient Coyne are found in this Iland, and not else-where: and his meane to the place, was Victorinus a Moore, in great fauour with Probus: who taking himselfe not cleare from suspicion got leaue of his Emperour to repaire vnto Britaine, where giuing it out that he was come thither for safetie of his Life, was courteously receiued by the Generall. Whom secretly in the Night, hee murdered, and then speedily returned to Rome; hauing by this Expedition, both appeased the tumults in the Province, and approoued his fidelitie to Probus. About this time (as is recorded) certaine Vandals and Burgundians that had invaded Gallia, were sent into Britaine by the Emperour to inhabite, who though they had troubled the Romans peace in Gallia, yet did them good service in Britaine to stay their subiection; and the Britaines themselves for some good seruices were now sufficed by these Emperours, to plant Vines, and make Wines, with other matters allwell for pleasure as profit.

(9) At length the Empire in these west parts standing vniuersally quiet, Probus determined a iourney into the East, to end at once all forraie wars; saying, he would shortly bring it to passe, that the state should need no more Souldiers: (which speech they tooke very indignely) & hauing passed Thyricum in Sclavonia, was by some of his own Army for curbing, as they conceiued, with an ouer-hard hand their dissolute & idle manners conspired against & treacherously murdered, in November the second, and yeere of Christ, two hundred eighty two, hauing reigned five yeeres and foure moneths: others say, six yeeres: where notwithstanding they erected for him a most honourable Sepulchre, wherein was engrauen this Epitaph: Here lieth the Emperor Probus, iustly for his goodnes called Probus, of all the Barbarous Nations and Tyrants a Conqueror.

ROBVS thus slaine in the midst of his Army, without any apparant cause ministred, the Souldiers were stricken into a great feare and mistrusted each other to be guilty of the Treason, no man therefore diligent to finde out the beginner, nor hallic to punish the bloody executors; but holding the right of Election to remain in themselves, they presently chose Carus for their Emperour, who had been the Pratorian Praefect valiant, sufficient, of worth and esteeme; whereunto the Senate likewise consented.

(2) From whence or what parents we should deriue his birth, is vncertaine, and of diuers writers diuerly reported. For Flavius Cassellianus, who wrote the storie of his time, as Vopiscus doth report, saith, that he was borne in Sclavonia, or as we call it Macedonia. Onesimus an ancient writer affirmeth his birth was in Rome, and that his father was a Sclavonian indeed, but held for a citizen, as he citeth by letters from Vopiscus: Aurelius Victor, Eusebius, and Paulus Orosius will haue him a French man, and borne at Narborne: but whence soeuer, his princely parts deserved these his princely preferments, and no waies for the short time of his raigne, carried he himselfe vnder expectation. Two sonnes hee had of vnequall conditions, Carinus and Numerianus, these both he made his Cesars, with the Name and Power of Augusti.

(3) His first proceedings was to finde out the murderers of Probus, whom hee severely punished, which tooke away all suspicion of treason in himselfe. Then marching against the Sarmates, whose furie had pierced so far into Pannonia, that they threatened Italy itselfe, hee ouerthrew with the slaughter of sixteen thousand, and tooke twenty thousand of them prisoners. And leauing Carinus (his elder sonne) to gouerne Britaine, Gallia, Thyricum, and Spain, himselfe with the younger, Numerianus, prepared for the East against the Persians, in which expedition hee tooke in his way Mesopotamia, Seleucia, and certaine cities whom the enemy had entred: and being surprized with sickness, and not able to trauel, pitched his Pavilion vpon the shore of Tigris, where in the midst of his armie (about the yeere of our saluation 283.) garded from all supposed dangers and assaults of man, felt the vnexpected stroke of death euen from the hand of God himselfe: for in his bed by a thunderbolt falling from heauen, he was slaine, with many others then present with him in his tent, and the same consumed altogether with lightning fire.

(4) The terrour thereof so daunted the courage of his whole army, that no further they proceeded in their enterprise: and his death was so grievous vnto Numerianus now elected Emperour, that with continual weeping (a fault in few Sonnes who are raised by their fathers fall) his eies were so weakened, that he could not indure any light. Vpon which accident, Arrius Aper, (his wiues father) tooke occasion to conspire his death, hoping thereby to attaine the Empire himselfe. For hauing at all times free access to his presence, at length in his closet hee secretly murdered him; pretending to the armie, that his infirmities only kept him from fight; and so leauing his body to putrefie and corrupt, in short space by the very fauor thereof the treason was decifed, and the Traitor slaine by the hands of Dioclesian, who was both his Iudge and executioner.

(5) His Empire thus ended before it was well begunne, the Armie proclaimed Dioclesian, a Principall man in the Campe for Emperour: who to vphold his election, made all his power for Gallia, against his Concurrant Carinus, a man of profuse sensuality, who there had caused himselfe to bee proclaimed, and in his fathers absence had so ruled there and in Britaine, that Porphyrio liuing at the same time, gaue out this testimony, that Britaine was a fertile Prouince of tyrants. Betwixt these two Captaines, many skirmishes were fought with variable successe, till lastly in a set battell, Carinus was slaine by a Tribune, whose Wife he had defiled; whereby the Imperiall Title was ioyntly conferred vpon Dioclesian.

(6) The time that these three, the father and two sonnes reigned, is reported to be two yeeres and somewhat more; and this last to die the yeere of Christ s nativitie, two hundred eighty foure.

The Empire thus deuolued to Dioclesian, with approbation of the Senate, hee euery way studied to bee accounted worthy of the same, as knowing well his birth was no way answerable to his present lot: and therefore chose for his Cesar, Maximianus, a man of better descent, very honourable, wise, and valiant, as was manifested in his first seruice against the Gaules, whom with an infinite number of peasants in that prouince, troubling the peace of the Romans, hee with much slaughter ouercame. For which exploit so fortunately accomplished, the Emperor made him his Consort in the Gouvernement.

(2) Dioclesians parentage is vncertainly reported by Writers, some making him the sonne of a Notary, and others of a meere Bondman; but all agreeing that his Country was Dalmatia, and his offspring very base. This man being but a Common Souldier, consulted with a Witch for his future successe; who told him (if you please to beleuee the reporters) that he should become an Emperour after he had killed a Bore: to which he gaue credit, and euer after was a great enemy to that beast, and in time grew vnder Probus to so great account for dexterity in expediting his affaires, that he was made Steward of his house, and now lastly elected to the Empire.

(3) The very first thing that he attempted, was the punishment of his predecessors death: for which Arrius Aper being convicted before his tribunall seat, himselfe rising suddenly from the Throne, ran him thorow with his sword, in outward shew for zeale of Iustice, as not able to endure so foule a fact: but in truth to fulfill the Prediction of his hostesse, the Druid, for that Aper signified a Bore. After which act, he held his Empire fully established.

(4) To let passe many imployments and troubles of the State, these two Emperours chose to themselves two Cæsars, whereby the One-bodied Eagle became againe four-headed, and each almost of an equall authority. Dioclesian chose Galerius Maximinus, and Maximianus, surnamed Hercules, chose Constantius Chlorus a Roman Senator, enforcing them to put away their former Wiues, & to take their Daughters, for an assurance of loue by the bonds of that Alliance; of whom the former was imployed for defence of Illyricum, and the other afterwards into Britaine against the Rebellions there raised by Carausius, whose coine is here set.

(5) This Carausius by birth a Menapien, but of low Parentage, as Beda and Eutropius saith; who being appointed Admirall by the Romans to guard the British Seas, from the Pyrates of the Saxons and Lower Germans, who with continuall robberies wasted the coasts, abused his authority both in suffering those Pirates to passe vnder Compositions, and in taking many shippes and much substance from the true Subiects to his owne vse: whereby in short time hee became very rich, and (like a cat set to keepe mice from the larder) did more mischief then the Robbers themselves. Sabellicus reports, one very politike custome whereby he enriched himselfe; and that was by suffering the Pirates to take as much spoiles as possibly they could before hee would surprize them; whereby they were his instruments to rob others, and nothing to better themselves.

(6) Maximianus then warring in Gallia, and fearing the greatness of his wealth and power, sent secretly to slay him by treacherie; and in the meane while surprisid many of his principall men at Gessoriacum.

(7) Carausius now rich & compassed with friends, seeing his destruction thus intended and sought, thought thought that death was but death as well to Prince as to Peasant: and therefore with a bold resolution, and aid of the Picts or Northern Brittaines, (who had been alwaies enemies to the Roman Subiession) put on the Purple Robe, and vsurped the Authoritie and Title of Emperour, which hee most valiantly maintained in sundry Battles, and so kept it for the terme of seuen yeeres.

(8) Against him Maximianus set forward with a puissant Armie, and marched to the British Ocean: but there vnderstanding the power of his Enemy, and finding himselfe in want of men for Sea-seruice, hee pitched downe his Tents: and knowing Carausius a man meet to command the Ilanders, and able to defend them against the other Warlike Nations, sent him offers of peace: the making of which is remembred vnto vs by the Coine of Carausius before expressed, whereon are stamped the Portraictures of two Emperours joining hands. So himselfe returning against the Batarians, left Carausius for Britaine, who gouerned the Prouince with an vpright and vnstained reputation, and with exceeding peaceableness, notwithstanding the incursions of the Barbarous. Hee rectified the wall (as Ninnius the disciple of Elnodungus writeth) between the moneths of Cluda and Carunus, fortifying the same with seuen Castles, and built a round house of polished stone vpon the bank of the Riuier Carun, which (some thinke) tooke name of him, erecting therewith a Triumphant Arch in remembrance of Victorie. Howbeit, Buchanan thinks the same to bee the Temple of Terminus, and not the foundation of Carausius.

But the date of his noble Government was brought now to a period, by the Treason of Allectus his Familiar friend, one whom he had imployed in managing of the State, who thirsting after the Supreme Authoritie, betrayed his trust, and treacherously murdered him by a wife, putting on himselfe the Purple Robe, stamping this his Image vpon the publique Coine as an absolute Soueraigne, and assuming the Title Imperiall, about the yeere of Christ 294.

(9) Constantius who had leuiued an Armie, and was come with great speed vnto Bulloigne in France, (a Towne that Carausius had sometime fortified and kept) hearing now of his death, determined the recovery of Britaine; and after great preparations, at length passing the Seas in a darke fogge or mist, landed his men without impeachment: which done, hee fired his owne Ships, thereby to frustrate all hopes of escape. Allectus, who had laien to intercept his coming, forooke also the Seas, and meeting at vnawares with Allectus, great Senechal of the Prætorium, as a desperate man, halsted vpon his owne death: for encountering with him, hee neither ordered his Battle, nor marshalled his men, but fought at randome very vnfortunately: for hauing put off his Purple Garment, he was among many other slaine, when hee had held his estate the terme of three yeeres.

Allectus slaine.

The Frankens and others of the Barbarous Souldiers escaping the Battle, sought to sacke London, and so to be gone: but as good happe was, the Souldiers of Constantius, which by reason of a miste and fogge were seuered from the rest, at vnawares came to London, where they rescued their Allies, and making great slaughter of the Enemy, flew Gallus their Leader, casting his body into a Brooke that then ran thorow the Citie, which thence after was called by the Brittaines Nant-gall, and by the English, Gallus his Brooke, where now a faire Street is built, called (vpon that occasion) to this day Walbrooke.

(10) The deaths of these two vsurpers, with the recouerie of the Brittaines vnto their wonted obedience, was accounted so great a benefit to the Romans, that it is most gloriously commended, and Rhetorically set downe in a Panegyricke Oration ascribed to Ammianus, in the praise of Dioclesian, Maximianus, and Constantius: where (after hee had extolled the fertilitie of the British Soile, and the Riches that the Empire reaped thence) he set forth the strength of the Enemy, growne to so dangerous a head: and concluded with this Acclamation; O what a manifold Victory was this, worthie vndoubtedly of innumerable Triumphs, by which Victorie Britaine is restored to the Empire, their Confederates brought to obedience, and the Seas secured to a perpetuall quietnesse! Glory you therefore (invincible Emperour) for that you have as it were gotten another World, and in restoring to the Romans the glory of the Conquest by Sea, have added to the Roman Empire an Element greater then all the compass of the Earth, that is, the mightie maine Ocean itselfe: and afterwards now by your Victories (Invincible Constantius Cesar) whatsoever did lie vacant about Amiens, Beauois, Trois, and Langres, beginneth to flourish with Inhabitants of sundry Nations. Tea and moreover, that your most obedient City Autum, for whose sake I haue a peculiar cause to reioice, by means of this Triumphant Victorie in Britaine, hath received many and sundry sorts of Artizans, of whom those Prouinces were full. And now by their workmanship the same Citie riseth up, by repairing of Ancient Houses, and restoring of Publike Buildings and Temples: so that now it accounteth that the old name of brotherly Incorporation to Rome is againe restored, when seee hath you est-foones for her Founder.

(11) But leauing Constantius to be further spoken of in his due place, let vs pursue the Raignes of these two Tyrants, who new began the Persecutions of Gods Saints in all the parts of the Empire, wherein the rage of Satan so preuailed, that seuentee thousand men and women were crowned with martyrdom, within the space of one moneth, besides infinite numbers of such as were otherwise punished.

As in other Countries, so here in Britaine the Christian Churches were demolished, their Bibles and other godly writings burned, and themselves tormented with a more cruell and longer continuance then formerly had bene vsed: for this endured the terme of ten whole yeeres together, leauing no time of intermission, nor place free from the staine of Martyrs blood.

And amongst others, it made Britaine to be honored with the glory of many holy Martyrs, which constantly stood and died in the Confession of the Faith; whereof the first is reported to bee Albane of the City Verolanum, who was beheaded at Holmhurst (since called Derbyfold) where now the Towne of S. Albans (bearing his name) is built, and in whose honour, Offa the great King of Mercia founded a most magnificent Monasterie. Of this Albans the ancient Fortunatus Priscus in his booke of the Praise of Virginitie, maketh mention thus:

Albanum egregium secunda Britannia profert: Britaine fertile of all good, washt with glorious Albans blood.

(12) His Instructor Amphibolus afterwards apprehended, was brought to the same place, and whipped about a stake, whereat his intralles were tied: so winning his bowels out of his body, was lastly stoned to death. Sundry others also in other places laid downe their liues for their Professors sake, as Iulius and Aaron at Leicester, saith Beda, or rather at Caer-leon in Monmouth-shire, as our Grand-Antiquarie iudgeth: and in Leichfield so many, that the place became another Golgotha, A Field of dead Corps. For which cause the Citie doth beare an Ekechoon or Field charged with many Martyrs, for their Seale of Armes euen vnto this day.

the Tenth Horne of the Imperiall Beast, who had received his Power from the Dragon (the diuel) and Forme from those foure Beasts deciphered by the Prophet Daniel, whose mouth was as the Lyons mouth of Asinus, his feete like the Beares feete of Persia, his spots as the Leopards of Greece; and these ten hornes taken from the Monster of the Grecians parted kingdomes, the Seleucies and the Ptolemies, called in Ezekiel, Gog and Magog, and here alluded vnto by S. Iohn, that thus made battell against the Saints. But as those foure Beasts perished and were crushed by the fall of The stone cut without hands, Emmanuel borne in our flesh: so this Beast compounded of them foure, fell in the destructions of these most wicked Emperors, whereof all almost died vtinimely and vnusuali deaths, as the like is not read of elsewhere.

(14) For some slew themselves, as Nero and Otho did; some were smothered to death, as was Tiberius; some poisoned by their wines, as Claudius and Commodus; some tugged and torne in pieces by their own Subiects and Souldiers, as Vitellius, Heliogabalus, Papienus, and Balbinus; some stabbed by them whom they most trusted, as Caligula, Domitian, Didius, Gallienus, and many others; some tumultuously murdered, as Pertinax; Senecus, Maximinus, Amilius, and Probus were; some flaine in battell and defence of their titles, as Macrinus and Gallus; some hanged themselves, as Gordianus and Maximianus did; some drowned and swallowed vp, as Decius and Maxentius were; some flaine by a thunder-bolt from heauen, as Carus was; some died in most miserable captiuitie, as Valerianus did, whose skinn was fleeced off, he yet aliue; some cut their owne veines and bled to death, as Quintillus and Florianus did; some dying mad, as did this our Dioclesian; some few, and them somewhat fauoring Christians, died in their beds, a thing most strange to see in these times, wherein the Wrath of God thus fought against them in his Iustice, and the power of his Gospel preached by his Apostles and Disciples, that as a Conqueror crowned, and riding vpon a white horse, bare a Bow in his hand, and shot the sharpe Arrows of death into the hearts of these the Kings enemies, as in the opening of the First Scale is scene; and in the Second is described and made manifest by a Red Horse prepared for Battell, whose Rider bare a Bright sword, and had commission To take peace from the earth; which most effectually wee haue scene performed in most of these preceding Emperours. And as Famine in great Warres is not greatly strange; so Scarfite exceeding Plentie, was scene vnder the opening of the Third Scale; whence a Blacke horse sent from God, paled through the earth, whose Rider bare a Balance to weigh Corne, as it were Spice, for dearth; and in the raigne of this last Tyrant Dioclesian, they that had Eagles eyes might see the threefold iudgements of God in the opening of the Fourth Scale, when Sword, Famine, & Death went all together as a pale-horse, sent from the presence of the Lamb, whose Rider was Death and Hell, following as his Page. These were the times of calamities, where as the Soules of the righteous in the opening of the Fifth Scale, cried for vengeance for the blood of the Martyrs, whom these ten hornes had goved to death; and vnder the Sixth Scale, both then, and for cuer the wicked are said to call for the Mountaines to fall vpon them, and for the rocks to hide them from the presence of Him that sat vpon the Throne, and from the wrath of the Lambe, before whom none could stand.

But why doe I (weake man) thus open the Curtaines of Gods most sacred Tabernacle, to behold the Mercy-seate of his diuine Mysteries in the accomplishments of these holy Oracles, when as they who haue worn the Ephod, and in whose hand Aarons Rod hath budded, with a religious reuerence haue feared to look into the same? Therefore with the charge of Iohnna I will not approach neere the Arke, and with Iobs heauers will Lay my hand on my mouth, and returne to the prosecution of my purpose.

(15) It was the nineteenth yeere of his raigne, in the month of March, when this Tyrant sent forth his wicked Edicts through all his Empire; That all churches should bee vtterly ouerthrowne; that the Scriptures should be burnt; that all Christians for honour should bee held infamous, and all Christian seruants should bee vncapeable of freedom; that all Pastors should be enforced to offer to Idols, &c.

(16) The fountaine & chiefe cause of these miseries lighting on the Church of Christ, did arise from the Christians themselves, as Eusebius in these words declareth: After that our conseruation through too much libertie and licentiousnesse was degenerated, and holy discipline corrupted, whiles every one of vs did enmie, bite, and backbite each other, waging intestine warres within our selues, and piercing one anothers hearts with the sharpe speeres of opprobrious words; so that bishops against bishops, and people against people were at bitter contention. Lastly, whiles nothing but hypocricie was in the face, deceit in the heart, and guile in the tongue, whereby mischiefe was euery full at the brimme, then began the heauy hand of God to visit vs, &c. Where he proceedeth and sheweth that the greuous finnes of the Christians, was the cause of drawing downe these iudgements on their heads.

(17) And so this wicked Tyrant accordingly was but as Gods Instrument and Iron-threshing-flaile, to bruise the precious wheat and feed of the Gospel, and to crush that outward glory of the Christian profession, which then was flourishing in most parts of the world.

(18) But long the Lord deferred not their releafe nor that Tyrants end. For after the First yeere of their persecutions, and twentieth of his Raigne, the thirteenth day of April, in the yeere of Christs Natuiuite three hundred and three, hee with his Fellow Emperor (both of them by the reuenging hand of God, stricken with a mad humor (saith Eusebius) renounced the Empire, and defending from the Tribunal put off their Purple and Imperiall robes, whereby they againe became Priuat men.

(19) Dioclesian retired into Dalmatia, where in the Citie Salonia, hee poisoned himselfe, as Aurelius Victor affirmeth: and Eusebius saith, that no small disaile ouertooke him, for that hee died mad. His consort Maximianus escaped not vnpunished, but died for attempting the Murder of Constantius, and as Eusebius auoucheth, hee hanged himselfe in the citie Masillis: such ignominious deaths followed these two persecuting Tyrants, whereof Dioclesian had formerly made himselfe a God, and by an Edict commanded his Foote to bee kissed: a practise pretly since imitated by his Successors, who haue reuiued the wounded Head of the Beast, and haue trod his steppes in wounding and persecuting the true members of Christ.

FLAV. VALER. CONSTANTIVS CHLORVS, & C. GALERIVS VALERIVS MAXIMIANVS.

CHAPTER XLV.

Constantius, Chlorus,
Emp.G. Val. Maximianus, Emp.

Dioclesian and Maximianus resigning vp their Souerainties (as is said) at the Citie Nicomedia in Bithynia, committed the charge thereof, and the defence of the Common-wealth vnto Galerius and Constantius, who had been their Cæsars: vpon which occasion, great peace followed in the Church of Christ, and most especially vnto these Westerne Prouinces. For those Emperors confirmed by the Senate, presently diuided the Empire betwixt them, as two Seuerall Estates, and not subiect to one Government, as formerly had been exercised; which (as Eusebius hath noted) was the fatal end of the Imperiall Glory.

(2) Vnto Galerius fell the gouernment of Sclauonia, Macedonia, Thracia, Egypt, and the Prouinces in Asia, who tooke for ease of that burden these two, whose Coines we haue here exprest.

(2) C. Galerius, Valer. Maximianus, and Aurel. Valer. Seuerus his sisters sonnes, whom in the yeere of Christ three hundred and six, hee elected Cæsars, and after Augustus which honours the last enioied not long, for he was slaine at Rome by the treachery of Maxentius, after one yeere. And the other, when he had foure yeeres gouerned as Cæsar, and threes Augustus in the East, died at Tbaris in Cilicia.

(3) And to the lot of Constantius, who much at one time with his Copartner, elected his sonne Constantine, (so famous in christian historie) Cæsar, fell Italy, France, Britannie, Spaine, Germany, and most of the Prouinces in Asie: (which seeming to him (who rather chose to gouerne well then much) too impatient, gaue vp to Galerius all that in Asie, as too remote from the Seat of his residence, and eie of his direction.

Constantius was a man of singular clemencie towards men, and pietie towards God. He did not partake with him in cruelty, whose partaker he was in Soueraintie: neither staining his Raigne with the blood of the Saints, nor destroying our Churches and places of Praier, as Maximianus furiously did; but rather hee reuerenced and highly honoured those who truly honoured God. For which God so blessed him, that this goodly Father left a more goodly Sonne Constantine, the Heire of his well-gotten Empire.

(5) To which his vertues, other Authors adde, that he was of great affabilitie, louing, and gentle, little regarding his Private Profit, but altogether rainging to enrich his Subiects, and to that end would often say, That it was more behoouefull for the Weale publike, that the wealth of the Land should bee disperfed into the common hands, then to be locked vp in Princes coffers. In which kind, so auerfe he was from all superfluities, that hee may be adiuudged faulty the other way: for vpon Feastall daies, and in his Entertainments of Strangers, he was faine to borrow Plate of his friends (for such many times are richer then their Soueraignes) to furnish his Table and Cupboards.

(6) But about all other vertues, was his louing countenance countenance and protection to the late persecuted Christians, making his court their sanctuary, and his Chapel their oratory. And to winnow the chaffe from the wheat, he vied the like police as Iehu King of Israel sometime had done against the Priests of Baal. For he commanded all his Officers to offer sacrifice to the Idoll-Gods, pretending to dis-courte all such as refused: but contrariwise those that obeyed he put from him, with this reproofe, that hee who is disloyall to his God, will neuer be true nor trustie to his Prince.

(7) When he was first made Caesar, he was forced to forsake his first wife Helena, by whom hee had his vertuous sonne Constantine, and to take Theodora daughter in Law to Maximianus, for a further confirmation of friendship.

(8) Helena by birth was a Britaine, the daughter of Calpurnius a British Prince, as faith Eutropius, though Nicephorus make her of Bithynia, and Beda tearmes her his Concubine, some an Imme-holder, and others for her person and parentage stand very doubtfull: to meet with whom, let vs heare the censure of Times Chiefe Secretaries, the learned Cambden in his Britannia: Constantius (saith hee) what time hee serued in Britaine under Aurelian, tooke to wife Helena daughter of Coelius or Coelius a British Prince, on whom hee begat that noble Constantine the Great in Britaine; for so (together with that great Historiographer Baronius) the common opinion of all other Writers with one consent beare witness, unlesse it be one or two petty Greeke Authors of late time, and those dissenting one from the others, and a very learned man, grounding vpon a corrupt place of Iul. Firmicus. Howbeit, compelled he was by Maximianus to put her away, for to marry Theodora his daughter. This is that Helena which in Antioque Descriptions is called VENERABILIS and PISSIMA AVGVSTA, and for Christian Pietie, for cleansing Ierusalem of Idols, for building a goodly Church in the place where our Lord suffered, and for finding the sauing Crosse, is so highly commended of Ecclesiasticall Writers.

And yet both Jewes and Gentiles termed her by way of ignominie and reproch, Stabularia, because shee (a most godly Princesse) sought out the Cribbe or Manger where Christ was borne: and in that place where stood that Hofelie, founded a Church; for which cause she was by the Enemies of Christian Religion called an Hofelie, and (because shee are commonly kind to their Guests) a Concubine also. For whose defense, let the Euerall Oration of Ambrose, made vpon the death of Theodosius, answer, wherein hee doth rather commend her humilitie, then affirme any such base Offices in contempt of her person.

They say that this Lady was at first an Imme-holder or Hofelie, &c. Well (saith he) this good Hofelie Helena hastid to Ierusalem, and sought out the place of our Lords Passion, and made diligent search for the Lords Cribbe. This good Hofelie was not ignorant of that Guest which cured the way-saying mans hurts, that was wounded by Theeues. This good Hofelie chose to be reputed a Stable-sweeper, that she might thereby gaine Christ.

And verily she was the moouer and onely worker of her husbands conuersion, who casting off all superstitious worshipps, willingly acknowledged the onely all-ruling God, suffering the Christians that had bene hidde in Caves and Dennes, now to exercise their Devotions publicly, and both to reedifie the old ruinate Churches, and to erect new.

(9) Of the like Pietie wee read in a Queene of the like name, Helena, Queene of Adiabena (commended by Iosephus) that was a Conuert to the Iewish Religion, who coming to Ierusalem to visit the Temple in time of a greuous Famine, which happened in the daies of Claudius, sent to Alexandria for great quantity of Corne, and for Dried Figges from Cyprus, which hee very charitably bestowed vpon the poore. And about three fadoms or furlongs off from Ierusalem, built a Sepulcher with three Pyramides, wherein her selfe and her two sonnes (both Kings) were afterwards interred. But to proceed.

(10) Constantius being heere in Britaine, and lately returned from his Expedition made against the Caledonians and Picts, fell sicke in the City of Torke, where the Imperiall Throne of his residence was set. At which very time, Constantine his sonne escaping the hands of Galerius, (with whom hee had bene left hostage) hastid from Rome, hauing belaid all the way with Post-horses for the purpose, and left them houghed for feare of pursuit, came with all speed to Torke, and to his fathers presence; who so much ioied at his sight, that he sate himselfe vpright vpon his Bed, and in the presence of his Counsellors spake as followeth:

(11) "It now sufficeth, and death is not fearefull, seeing I shall leaue my vnaccomplished actions to be performed in thee my sonne, in whose person I doubt not but that my Memoriall shall be retained, as in a Monument of succeeding fame. What I had intended, but by this my fatal period left vndone, see thou performe: let those fruits bee ripened in thee the Branch, that I thy stocke from a vertuous intent haue had ingrafted alwaies in me: that is, gouerne thy Empire with an vpright Justice; protect the Innocent from the Tyrannie of Oppressours; and wipe away all teares from the eies of the Christians; for therein, aboue all other things, I haue accounted my selfe the most happy. To thee therefore I leaue my Diademe, and their Defense, taking my Faults with mee to my Grave, there to be buried in euermlasting obliuion: but leauing my Vertues (if euer I had any) to reuiue and liue in thee. With conclusion of which vertuous counsell, hee tooke his last farewell of his sonne, his friends, and his life, after hee had sate Caesar sixteen yeeres, and Emperour two, as Eusebius accounteth, and died the five and twentieth day of Iuly, the yeere of our Saviour three hundred and six, and of his owne age fifty six.

lib. 8. c. 14.

HE Father thus departing both gloriously and peaceably, in the presence of his Son and sage counsellors, the griefe in the losse of the Sire was no greater then was the ioy conceived that they had gained the sonne for his Successour, all men reioicing at the good fortune of that tourney, wherein hee came to close the eies of his dying father, and to comfort the sorrow of his mournfull Countreymen. For forthwith heere in Britaine by acclamation of the people, assistance of the Souldiers, and aduice of Ereus King of the Albans (who by the way had accompanied him hither in his flight from Rome) they proclaimed him at all hands Emperour, and Successour to all that part of the world which his father held.

This election was ioyfully ratified by the Senate, and of all other Prouinces so gladly accepted, that they accounted this land most happye of all other, whose chance was first to see him their Caesar, as in these words of the Panegyrist is seene: O fortunate Britaine, and more happye then all other Lands, that hast the first sight of Constantine Caesar.

(2) His birth (as is said) was in Britaine, and honourably defended, his father a Roman Senatour, Caesar, and Emperour; his mother a Britaine, (daughter to Celcus) a Princesse vertuous, wiſe, chaste, and religious: himselfe in true Pietie degenerating from neither. At his first entrance he pursued the reliques of the warre which his father had begonne against the Caledonians, and other Picts, subduing the Britains that were more remote, and Inhabitants of those lands that are witness (saith one) of the Sunnes set or going downe

(3) Maxentius the sonne of Maximianus Herculinus, who at the death of Constantius was proclaimed Augustus by the tumultuous Prætorian Souldiers at

Rome, and Romulus his sonne (whose face wee haue heere with his fathers from both their monies expressed) was created his Caesar (the way to that Seat of Maieſtie wherunto hee had too hastily and most vnduly climed) for now this Vrsurper by his Necromancies, Adulteries, Persecutions, and Murders, was growne so vntolerable and odious, that the Senate sent to Constantine, craving his aid and redresse, who sore lamenting the fores of the Empire, and the case of the Christians, first wrote: but that taking no effect, prepared his forces against Maxentius.

Maximianus the father, either in true zeale or fained pretence, (which by the sequell is more probable) tooke great offense at his sonne Maxentius vnſufferable outragiousnesse; and vnder colour of dislikes and redresse, repaired to his sonne in Law Constantine, whose daughter Fausla hee had married, and notwithstanding his faire pretences before the face of Constantine, yet secretly hee tampered with Fausla to make away her husband. But the good Lady well knowing that the bond of a childe is great, but greater the loue of a wife, reuealed his treacherie to Constantine, who caused him therupon to be put to death, a fit end for so bloody a Tyrant. And ripe was the like destiny for his no-way-degenerating sonne, against whom hee prepared his forces: and drawing Licinianus Gouernour of Selaunia, who was made Caesar, to his aide, by giuing him his sister Constantia to wife, (a man but of an ordinarie descent, though Gallienus Maximinus had made him in Illyrica his Copartner in the East) halted towards Rome with an Host of ninety thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; leuiued out of Britaine, France, and Germanie.

(4) But knowing well that successe in warre dependeth more in diuine assistance then humane strength, yet doubtfull what God hee should in this blessed enterprise inuocate for aid, (for as yet he was not fully settled in the Christian Faith, though the Gods of the Gentiles hee obserued altogether deceitfull) cast vp in this holy meditation his eies Eastward to heauen, and had by diuine ordinance presented to him in obiect the figure of a Crosse, wherein were Starres (as letters) so placed, that visible might be read this sentence in Greeke, IN HOC VINCE, as diuers Authors report.

Yet are there some fro the testimony of Eusebius himselfe, vnto whom this blessed man did declare his Vision, that affirme this forme being the first Greeke Characters of the name of Christ, (to which the reuerſe of Decentius hereafter expressed, as of many others, may adde much probability) rather then either of these, + T although Tertullian and S. Ierome affirme, that the latter was the very figure of the Crosse whereon our Saviour died: but this as a question beyond my iudgement or intention, I leaue to those learned Diuines and others, who haue laboured in that subiect with curious search.

(5) This miraculous signe promising Victory, and that (saith Eusebius) not in an Inscription only, but by voice of Angels, was so comfortable to Constantine, that with great courage he went forward, bearing before him and his victorious Army, in place of the Imperiall Standard, the forme of this vision imbrodered with gold and stoncs of greatest price. And as one armed from heauen, proceeded against his hellish aduerfary.

Maxentius as much depending vpon his Sorcerers, was no lesse assured of the victory. In furtherance whereof, as a stratagem of warre, hee framed a deceitfull Bridge ouer the riuer Tyber, neere to Pons Miluius, to intrap Constantine: but ioyning battell, and ouerlaid with strokes, retired and fled, and (whether for halfe, or through forgetfulness) tooke ouer the same Bridge, which suddenly falling vnder him, hee was with many more drowned, and Constantine remained Victor. In memory whereof, hee caused a triumphall Arch to be erected in the midst of Rome, wherein in his Statue was imbossed, holding in his Right hand a Croffe, according to the fashion of that which hee had scene in the heauens: and vpon ancient inscription in memory of this Victory, this we finde engrauen: IN SINGULIS DIVINITATIS, MENTIS MAGNITUDINE CVM EXERCITV SVO, TAM DE TYRANNO QVAM DE OMNIBVS FATIONIBVS, VNO TEMPORIS IVSTIS REPVLTVS EST ARMIS. Thus: By insinuation of the diuine power, with great magnanimity and helpe of his arme in a lawfull warre, hee reuenged the cause of the common wealth, as well on the Tyrant himselfe, as on his whole faction all at once. With the like successe had hee fought against the Franks in Batavia, whose Victory was likewise stamped in gold, wherein is a Woman sitting vnder a Trophey, and leaning her head vpon a Croffe-bow, with this inscription, FRANCIA.

(6) But as his fame increased in the mindes of most, so was it as much maligne by Licinius his fellow Emperour and Brother in Law, who in his heart neuer fauoured the Christians, howeouer for a time outwardly hee suffered their Religion: but at last, seeking occasions against Constantine, hee raised a cruell Persecution in the East, where hee reigned with Martinianus, whom at Byzantium, and Julius Licinius Licinianus at Arlas, hee had before made Cæsars: permitting the to stamp the monies as marks of Soueraignty.

(7) By this affliction of Gods Church, he informed this Champion of God for their defence to prepare his forces, which with hee met Licinius in Hungarie, where hee gaue him a great overthrow. But hee cleaping to Byzantium in Asia, the lesse ioynd againe battell, and was there taken Prisoner: yet by the mediation of his wife Constantia, had his life spared, and was confined within the citie Nicomedia; where for his treasons afterwards, he and his sonne Licinianus, that somewhat suruived him, were put to death. And now the peace of Gods Saints manifested appeared, and the progresse of the Gospell manifested vntroubled.

(8) For now (saith our Cyclus) no sooner was the blasting tempest and storme of Persecution blowne ouer, but the faithfull Christians, who in time of trouble and danger, had hidden themselves in woods and deserts, and in secret caues, being come abroad to open sight, reedified the Churches ruinated to the very ground. The Temples of holie Martyrs they founded, and erected (as it were) the Banners of victory in every place, celebrating festiuall holy daies, and with pure hearts and mouths performing the sacred ceremonies: for the which blessednesse, hee euer after had the Attributes ascribed vnto him of most blessed Emperour, most pious, happy Redeemer of Rones Citie, Founder of Peace, Restorer of Rome, and of the whole World, most great inuincible Augustus, Sacred, Diuine, and of sacred memory, &c. Howbeit, for admitting these praises, as it should seeme, hee is taxed by Eutropius and Victor of pride; as also cruelty for putting to death Crispus his sonne (by Minervina his concubine, whom hee had made Cæsar, and permitted to stamp the monies here vnder inserted) as likewise his wife Fausta, sister to Maxentius: but others affirme that the causes of their deaths were iust, though (as Paulus Orosius saith) the reason thereof was kept secret, and Zosimus doth therein excuse him as Castidore relateth, and so doth Rufinus and Eusebius.

(9) Touching Constantius affaires in this Island, it appeareth by the last Author, that after his Fathers death, and his owne departure out of this Country, some aspiring mind taking aduantage of his absence, in other warres, perswaded the people here to withdraw their obedience. Whereupon once againe hee addressed himselfe with his Armie to the reestablishing of the Islands subiection: and passing (saith Eusebius) ouer into Britaine, inclosed on euery side by the banks of the Ocean, hee conquered the same. The ioyfull memory of this expedition is registred to posterity vpon his Coin set in the entrance of this Chapter, inscribed Aduentus Augusti, and by these Letters, P. L. N. the place of the Mint to be at London.

(10) After this (saith the same Author) he began to compasse in his mind other parts of the World, to the end hee might come in time to succour those that wanted helpe: and when hee had furnished his Armie with milde and modest instructions of Pietie, hee invaded Britaine, that hee might likewise instruct those that dwell inuained round about with the waues of the Ocean: bounding the Sunnes setting as it were with those coasts. And of the Politicall government therein by him altered, let it not seeme offensive that I, who know and professe mine owne weakie sight in most of these matters, doe light my dimme candle, at the Bright-shining Lampe of that Illustrious Antiquarie, who saith:

(11) About this time (saith he) as euidently appeareth by the Code of Theodosius, Pacatianus was the Vicegerent of Britaine: for by this time the Prouince had no more Proprietors, nor Lieutenant, but in stead thereof was a Vicegerent substituted. And againe, Seeing that Constantine altered the forme of the Roman Government, it shall not be impertinent to note summarily in what sort Britaine was ruled vnder him; and in the next succeeding ages. Hee ordained foure Prefects of the Pretorian, to wit, of the East, of Illyricum, of Italy, and of Gaule: two Leaders or Commanders of the forces, the one of footemen, the other of horsemen in the West, whom they termed Praefectales. For ciuill government there ruled Britaine, the Prefect of the Pretorium or Grand Seneschall in Gaule, and vnder him the Picar General of Britaine, who was his Vicegerent, and honoured with the title, Spectabilis; that is notable or remarkable: hee obeyed respectfully to the number of the Prouinces two Consular deputies, and three Presidents, who had the hearing of ciuill and criminall causes.

For military affaires, there ruled the Leader or Commander mander of the footemen in the West, at whose disposition were the Earles or Lieutenants of Britaine, the Earle, Count, or Lieutenant of the Saxon coast along Britaine; and the Duke of Britaine, stiled euery one Spectabilis.

The Earle Lieutenant of Britaine seemeth to haue ruled the Island parts of the Land, who had with him seuen companies of footmen, and nine cornets or troopes of horse.

The Earle Lieutenant of the Saxon coast, who defended the Maritime parts against the Saxons, and is named by Amianus Lieutenant of the Maritime tract, for defence of the Sea coast, had euen companies of footmen, two Guidons of horsemen, the second legion, and one cohort.

The Duke or General of Britaine, who defended the Marches against the Barbarians, had the command of thirty and eight garriisons, wherein their Stations kept, consisting of fourteen thousand foot, & nine hundred horse.

So that in those daies (by Pancirolos account) Britaine maintained nineteene thousand, two hundred footmen, and seuentee hundred horsemen, or thereabouts in ordinary.

Besides all these, the receiver of the Emperours Finances or publicke reuenues: the Protost of the Emperours Treasures in Britaine, and the Procurator of the Draperie in Britaine; in the which the clothes of the Prince and Souldiers were woven: and the Count also of priuate reuenues had his Rational or Auditor of priuate State in Britaine: to say nothing of the sword-fence-schoole Procurator in Britaine (whereof an old inscription maketh mention) and of other officers of inferior degrees.

(12) After the settling of these affaires, to the end that he might with the more facilitate bridle the vntamed Persians that seldome were in quiet, hee removed the Imperiall seat of his Residence into the East, for now Gallienus and Licinius both dead, hee rent and diuided state of the Roman Empire was in him vnto: and purposing to build there a Citie, as an eternall Monument of his name, hee chose the plot at Chalcedon in Asia: but whiles they were measuring out the circuit, an Eagle leaping at the Line, fled with it ouer the Sea towards Byzantium in Thracia, to which place (the thing seeming ominous) he transferred his new foundation, and there built a most Magnificent Citie, naming it New Rome, as appeareth by an inscription of his Statue. In imitation whereof, hee circuled Seneca hills with a Wall for Height, Thickness, and Beauty, the fairest in the world: and not only erected Temples, Towers, and most stately Palaces himselfe, but by his publicke Edicts, commanded all the Princes of the Empire to raise therein some Monuments & memorable Edifices, becomming the Maiesty of so glorious foundatio.

(13) Hither also from Rome hee caused to bee brought many renowned Monuments of Antiquities, as the famous Goddesses Pallas of old Troy, the Image of Apollo in braffe of an vnumcalurable bignesse, the Statues of Iuno, Minerva, Venus, and the like: whereupon Hierome saith: That Constantine to enrich this one Citie, impouerished all others in the Empire: and other Writers which saw it in the perfectio of beauty, report it to be rather an habitation for the Gods, than the dwelling place for Earthly men. Herein also (so Rustidius was he of good Arts) was built the Proud Palace of that Publicke Library, wherein were contained one hundred twenty thousand of the chiefeft Written Bookes, and in the midst thereof were the Guts of a Dragon, in length one hundred twenty foot, on which was admirably written in Letters of Gold, the Iliads of Homer. The New Name of this new Citie lasted not long; for the affection of all men to the Founder, afforded it rather the name of Constantinople. As a trophy then of this Emperours renowne, though now a brand of infamie to another of that name, who lost it in the yeere 1452. to Mahomet the Turke: and as New Rome was reared and ruined in one name, so had Old Rome in Augustus her pitch of height, and in Augustulus her period.

(14) Hee drew likewise hither those Legions that lay for defence of the Prouinces, as well in Germany and Gallia, as in Britaine: from whence hee brought (saith Malmsbury) a great power of British Souldiers, through whose industry and forward service, hauing obtained Triumphant Victories to his hearts desire, and attained to the Empire: such of them as were past service, and had performed the painefull parts of Souldiers their fulltime, hee planted in a certain part of Gaule Westward, vpon the very shore of the Ocean: where at this day their posterity remaining, are wonderfully grown euen to a mightie people: in manners & language somewhat degenerate from our Britains. In which his doings, hee laid open the Prouinces to the irruptions of their Enemies; and is therefore by Zosimus hardly censured, as being the only man that by this means first subuerted the flourishing estate of the Empire. And indeed, by withdrawing his Forces out of Britaine, the Picts and other their wonted Enemies had the bolder and easier entrance into the more ciuill parts of this Island; whereby ere long, being altogether abandoned of the Romans, it became a pray of Conquest to the Saxons, as shall be shewed in due place.

(15) But howeouer his policie failed (carried (as it seemeth) by a Diuine inspiration to leaue Rome) yet is this good Emperour much commended by all Writers for his many vertues, especially for that hee laid the foundation of the Christians securitie, that the same hath stood vnder the protection of Princes euer since, euen vnto this day. And albeit that many Cæsars his successors, haue often attempted to shake it by their authorities, and the sharpe instruments of hereticks dangerously haue vndermined it, yet hath it borne out the Stormes of all their boisterous affaires, and stood in the strength that this Emperour first laid it.

(16) And vpon this foundation, that a glorious building might be raised, hee congregated three hundred and eighteen Christian Bishops in the Citie Nice in Thracia, where hee himself was present, and also President of the same Council (though now his Beadsmen (the Popes) put him & his Successors from that right) and as another Moses, hee then pacified the contentions of the brethren, and reestablished the authorities of the Bishops for the godly government of the Church in that Primitive age.

(17) But as the clearest Sunne hath his set, and the fairest day his night, so Constantines glorious life drew to an end, though his liuing glory shall be endless: for intending a voyage against the Persians, hee fell grievously sicke, and counselled by his Physicians to be carried vnto Nicomedia, a Citie in Bythinia, to the Hot Bathes that naturally there sprang (which caused some erroneously to write that he became a Leaper) he died on the way neere to the place, and in great deuotion commended his departing Soule to his Crucified Redeemer, May 22. the yeere of Christ Iesus three hundred thirty seuen, and of his happy victorious raigne thirty one, and of his age sixty five; whose body was interred at Constantinople, in the Church of the Apostles that him selfe had therein founded.

(18) Eusebius writing this good Emperours life, saith, that hee deferred his Baptisme vntill his old age, in desire that he might receiue it in Iordanye, where our Saviour himselfe was baptized. Yet others thinke that he was baptized with his Son Crispus, what time he created him his Cæsar: for the Celebration whereof, hee caused a most sumptuous Feast to be made in Rome, which Platina & Sabbellius affirme to haue continued to their times. And the ingenuity of the same Sabbellius is much to be approved, in that speaking of Constantines Donation, which some so much vaunt of (though the vanity of that forgery is now laid open to the view of all by sundry learned men) hee acknowledged (himselfe being a Romanist) that he findeth no mention of any such matter, in any of the ancient Records which hee followed, and so leaue it to the Patronage of those Craft-men, out of whose forges it first was formed. He left to succeed him in the Empire as Augustus, (with distaste of the eldest) his three Sonnes, Constantine, Constantius, and Constans, whom before hee had made Cæsars, & designed by Testament, Delmatius, the son of Annibalinus, (his brother) Cæsar: and therefore hee haue inherited his money in ranke of those that succeeded this great & glorious Emperour.

A Councellor against the Arians called by Constantins.

OR the Empire being divided among these Brethren, Constantinus the eldest, whole portion was Britaine, France, Spaine, and part of Germanie, tooke himselfe wronged in this partition; whereas Constantius his second brother had Italie, Africa, Selaue-nia, Dalmatia, and Greece; and Constantius the youngest possessed Thracia, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt, Provinces much greater in his light, then his owne seemed to bee; and therefore at last ambitiously hee attempted to enlarge his vpon the Frontiers of his brother Constantius, at that time in Dacia, and in warres against the Gothes, who there also invaded his territories, but was met with and slaine by a Captaine of his brothers, neere to the Citie Aquileia in Italie, when he had held his Seigniories the terme of three yeeres.

(2) Hereupon Constantius grew exceedingly proud, and seeing his deceased brothers Provinces, ioined them vnto his owne Possessions, and with his brother Constantinus came into this Island. This Battle, and their arrival heere, by the words of Iulius Firmius, chanced in the winter season: for (saith hee, speaking to these Emperours) you have subdued vnder your Oares the swelling and raging waves of the Britishe Ocean, even in the deepe of Winter; a thing hitherto neuer seene before.
And the Britaines were soe afraid to behold the vnexpected face of their Emperour. This Constantius was he that called a Councell to Sardica against the Arians, which were assembled three hundred Bishops, and among them, some of the Britishe, as formerly we haue mentioned. But this Prince being youthfull, cast away all care of the Empire; and drowned in his owne pleasures, followed ill counsell, (the vsuall way to Princes ruines.) Thus growne greuous to the Provinces, and nothing acceptable to the Souldiers, was by Magnentius a Captaine of his owne flaine, as hee was hunting neere the Castle of S. Helens, situate amongst the Taporis, a Spanishe people vnder the Pyren Moun-taines. And as hence this Murderer of his Soueraigne, Lord and Master, was branded with the name of Taporis, so in this Emperour there murdered was fulfilled a Prophecie that hee should die in his Grandmothers Lappe.

Olympias the Widow of this Constantius was giuen to Aspaes King of Armenia, by Constantius his brother, to be a bond and purchase of his surer friendship, of which his need was much, as the times required: for after the death of Constantine, Vetricano was proclaimed Emperour by the Pannonian Armie, though shortly disrobed, and sent to end his decrepit age in a priuate fortune. Nepobanus the nephew of Constantius by his sister Eutropia, was at Rome by the abiect Rout saluted Augustus, which he enioied not much aboute twentie daies, being suppressed by Magnentius, who had now made the truncke of Maiclie, his Soueraignes bodie, the Basse, whereby he meant with Decentius and Dederius, his two brethren, to ascend the Throne.

(3) Simon Dunelmensis saith, that Great Constantine at his departure from Britaine, left one Octavianus to gouerne the Land, who shortly rebelled, and after duers conflicts was slaine by Traherne, Commander of a Roman Legion. Galfridus makes the said Octavianus a Britaine, and will haue him to raigne with great Victories ouer this Island the space of fifty foure yeeres, which (as Fabian hath accounted) doth extend to the time of Valentinians Rule in Rome: so farre doe our Britishe Historians differ from the Romans. But from them most certaine it is, that Magnentius before mentioned, a Britaine by his father, though borne among the Latins in France, iuncted himselfe into the Imperiall Dignitie, vsurping France, Spaine, and Britaine, thus stamping the face of himselfe and his brother Decentius, by him made Caesar at Milan, vpon the currant Monies of such reuolted Provinces as he vsurped.

And did for three yeeres bandy against Constantius, though with some vnequall successe: but lastly despairing to vphold his owne greatnesse, murdered himselfe at Lyons in Gallia, as his brother vpon newes ther-of, did with a halter in the same Countrey. For this euent (no other occasion moouing) Constantius both thut the Temple of Janus in Rome, as a token of an vniuersall Peace; and gloriously triumphed with more then a vsuall aspect.

(4) At this time the Generall of the Armie in Bri-taine was one Gracianus, the father of Valentinian the Emperour, by birth an Hungarian, and so strong of limbe, that no five men could pull a rope out of his hand with all their force; whereof hee was furnished Funarius, the Roper. This man giuing entertainment to Magnentius, was condemned in confiscation of all his goods by Constantius that now ruled sole Emperour, vnto whom also the Britaines submitted themselves, and whose Deputie after Gracianus was aged Martin, a man (no doubt) vertuous and vpright, as he witnessed by his death: for Constantius, whose base and distrustfull heart feared the wagging of euery leafe, by the slaughter of many guiltlesse, sought to make himselfe secure: and egged on by his Flatterers, (to secure their purposes) sent one Paulus a Notarie into Britaine, to apprehend them that had aided Magnentius.

(5) The said Notarie was a Spaniard of a pestilent wind and subtiltie, especially in finding out all quirks and deuices to endanger mens estates: whose businesse being now to apprehend and bring away such Martiall men as had entred action in the foresaid conspiracies, he vnder that pretence drew into danger many that were guiltlesse, and the Emperours true Subiects: some of which hee imprisoned, others he tormented, and many with Manacles and Chaines so bruited, that therefore hee was called Catena. Old Martine the Deputie, much lamenting their miseries, besought the Spaniard to surcease, and not with the Offenders thus to punish the Innocent; wherat the proud Catch-pole so much disdaind, that hee threat-ned and sought to bring Martin before the Councell, and that in bands in manner of a Traitor; which so much incensed the aged man, that with his dagger he assailed him; but perceiving the wound hee gaue was not deadly, hee stabd the same into his owne side, and thereof presently died: vnfortunate in this fact, but otherwise a most righteous man (saith Amianus) that thus attempted to ease the wrongs of these oppressed Brittaines.

(6) But besides these their distresses, the outrages of the Scots and Picts breaking into the Marches of the Brittaines, sore molested their peace: for redresse whereof, Iulian the Caesar wintering at Paris, and distraited into sundry thoughts, was afraid in person to passe those Seas himselfe, and to leaue Gaule without a Ruler, especially at such a time, when the Germans had stirred vp a most cruell warre: wherefore hee sent Lupicianus at that time Colonell of the Infanterie, and Master of the Armie, to withstand their furie; a warlike man certes, and skilfull in feats of Armes, but with-all proud of heart and countenance, looking high, and speaking bigge, and in gesture demauncing himselfe in his charge as an Asse vpon a Stage, and otherwise so qualified, that men doubted a long time whether hee were more Couetous or Cruell. Hee from * Bonomia embarked all his men, and with a good gale arri-ued in the Haueu * Rutupi, marching in all haste to * Lundinium, that from thence, after aduice taken, according to the qualitie of the businesse, hee might make more haste to come into the field, and giue battle. But with what successe his affaires afterwards proceeded, I finde not recorded: and therefore I returne againe to the Emperour Constantius.

Constantia. But he, designed to gouerne the East, and make good those Frontiers against the Persians, forgot the duty of his charge, and gaue himselfe vp at Antioch to all licentious lusts and cruelties: of which when Constantius (infected afore with some ialousie of his ambition) was informed, hee so plotted, that this lost man, drowned in his owne vicious securitie, was surprised, and with his hands bound backward (like a Felon) giuen vp to the common Headfiner for execution. His brother Iulianus was then made Caesar, and this Emperours other siller Helena bestowed vpon him, whose Victories against the Germans and Gaules gained him such applause, that hee was against his will by the Souldiers elected Augustus, and made Confort with Constantius in Power Imperiall.

(8) Whose fortunes thus sticking in a tumultuous State (for, with others, Nigriuanus (whose con-
attempted the disquiet of this Emperour, by an ambitious affection of rule, that was both short and fa-tall to him) did plainly forehew, that neither his Raigne nor life would last long.

For besides the affections of the time that then followed that new risen Starre Iulian, his nightly visions and imagined apparitions did both terrifie and appal his mind; for as he thought, his fathers Ghost presented vnto him, a Babe of an ingenious countenance, which brooke the Ball (that the Romans call Tusa, a Globe borne only by a Monarch) out of his right hand, betokening nought else but a change of State. Which howeuer his diuiners interpreted for pleasing things, yet himselfe thought his owne Genius still followed him, in a forlorne, poore, and mournfull habite.

Constantius apparition.

(9) These dumps notwithstanding, this new

is said hee dissembled his Religion) but that he opened the Temples of the Pagans Gods, repaired their Altars; declaring to future ages, the memorie of this his detestable act, by minting a Bull prepared for sacrifice, vpon the Currant money of the State, with this inscription, Securitas reipublice; as if Romes Empire should lose her securitie, and the fatal destinie of Command, when the Genius of that Citie and the Gods of her foundation should bee forsaken. And where there remained any antique Monument of the Infant Christian Church, or any new erected badge of Religious deuotion, those hee caused to bee defaced. Thus did he in Caesarea Philippi, with that Brazen figure of our Sauour arraigned in a short vesture, and the Woman cured of her bloud issue, kneeling and elevating her hands to him; and at whose feet in the said Pillar grew a certaine Hearb, in height vnto the Hem of his Garment, which cured all kind of maladies; placing his owne figure, to the intent that it should bee worshipped: but suddenly it was with Lightning from Heauen defroide, breaking with violent force the Brest thereof asunder, and striking the Head fast into the earth, whose Reliques, as Zosimus saith, remained there to bee seene a long time after, a witness of mans presumptuous error and Gods iust displeasure. Manie lawes hee made against them, and manie rights of Subjects hee took from them. By Edict he forbad the Christians the publick Schooles & study of the Arts and Tongues; leaving away the reason of this iniustice with scoffes, as hee did the rest; saying, that Aristotle, Isocrates, and Plato, who must be their guides in such liberrall learnings, adoring Mercurie and the other Gods, hee held it absurd that they should read and learne of their Bookes, that loath and raile at their Religion.

The equitie of this extended power may appeare by Marcellinus censure, a man of his owne Religion, who of it saith, Inclemens obsequium perenni silentio; Let the Edict be dumb to eternall silence. When hee seized vpon the goods of the Christians, which was often, and vpon weake pretences, hee vsed to inuere the Letter of their owne Doctrine, in warrant of his foule act, saying that hee did it, ut facilius in Regnum Caelorum veniant. When hee had disabled the Christians of all command, either in the Field or Common-wealth, (as hee did Iovinian, Valentinian & Valens, after Emperours) hee would say, hee did it because their Gospell taketh from them Potestatem Gladii. And wherefoever any poore Christian implored the hand of Iustice against wrong and violence, they returned with no better redresse, then that it was the rule of their Religion, perferre iniurias, it was the dutie of their Profession to beare all iniuries. And although most Authors agree that hee stained not his gouernment with the bloud of any Catholikes, well knowing that gore of Perfection is the seed of the Gospell; yet some affirme that when Apollos Oracle, neere Antioch, had lost his power of answer by the holy presence of Babillaes bodie (there martyred and intombd) and that the Christians in remouing it away, sung solemnly the Psalm, Let all them be confounded which worship grauen Images: this Emperour (although the Act was his direction, though not the order) grew so enraged, that hee put then many Christians to the sword.

Of the prudence and learning of this man there be many notable monuments remaining: for in all the courses of his life hee did rather labour to content the parts of his vnderstanding, then of his sensuality, often being heard to say, Turpe est sapienti, cum habeat animum, captare laudes ex corpore; and therefore writing to Ecdicius, Prefect of Egypt, to helpe him to the Bookes of George Bishop of Alexandria, hee saith, Where others delighted in Horse and Hawkes, I haue bene from my insancie inflamed with the lone of Books. Many works there were of his owne pen, though now raked vp in the ruines of the time.

As his Oration to Tamblicus, and other Volumes of various learning, remembered by Suidas: yet is there extant that witty Satyre of his, of all the Casars.

The Register of his Epistle, full of worthy obseruations.

His discourse De Regno, wherein hee deciphereth much of his Persian Actions.

His Hymne to the Sunne, a song of a high strain, and of a matchlesse delicacie, if the subject had not bene too prophane.

As for his Misopogon, (where playing with his own person and beard, hee sharply reprehendeth the Antiochians of their intemperance in frequenting Stage-Plates of their impietie, in changing Iupiter and Apollo (Gods of their Forefathers) into the Christ of the Galileans; and of countenances in their Magistrates, in selling Iustice) it is one of the wittiest Inuectiues extant of those middle times.

In the course of his Religion hee is by the Writers of his owne affection and time rather reported superstitious then deuout; and his fancies therein rather to them accounted ridiculous then religious. Such was the excess and waste of Oxen in his sacrifices, that it is beleueed if his returne had bene from the Perficke Expedition, there would haue bene want of them to supply his Rites, and therefore they might happily say as the white Oxen did of the Emperour Marcus, Si tu viceris, nos perimus. Yet were his rules of order to the Priests of his superstitious zeale, such as may well become the most religious Church-man of our age to imitate: for hee prohibited those Priests from gaze of Stage-Plays, frequenting Tavernes, or exercising any foule or illiberrall profession, perfwading them to imitate the Christians, whose bounty to strangers in distresse, charity in burying the dead, and whose humble manners and fanctitie of life (though but dissembled) had so much increased their Profession.

(6) His fortitude appeareth in the proceesse of his Martiall Actions. At three and twenty yeeres hee was made by Constantine his nephew Cesar, matched to his sister Helena, and sent in person to restrain those barbarous Nations that had forced in vpon the Roman Limits. But whether this imploiment was grounded vpon the Emperours owne feare to aduerture his person against these Samages, a desire to nurture this poore Scholar his brother in law in more princely manners, who then was rude; or to expose him (in respect of some ieaously in State) to an assured perill: it remaineth doubtful. Only himselfe saith, that hee bestowed his Title of Cesar, libenter dabat; & qui accepit, omnino recusabat: for in it hee gained nothing but ut occupatio interiret, taking this his Expedition against those Intrades, as a banishment into the Hercinian Desert, ut tanquam venator cum feris bellaret: and beleeuing himselfe rather thereby called out to an expected death, then intended honour. But this man then neither of opinion or hope, and who should haue seemed to haue effected a point of excellent seruice, if hee had no more but defended the frontiers, and repelled the Enemies, did by his valour performe no lesse then deeds of admiration.

Hee recovered the reuolted Cities of Gallia, overthrowing seven of the mightiest German Princes in one set Battle.

Hee sent to Rome Chonodomaricus and Badonacarius, two of their greatest Kings, as spoiles to adorne the Trophy, and attend the triumph of Constantinus. Hee forced on euery side those to feare his power, that had so long bene fearefull to the Roman Empire. And had he returned home, borne vp only with the merit of this his seruice, and opinion of the world, and not bene blowne beyond the bounds of his old moderation by a new desire, hee had escaped the imputation of ambition and treacherie, and bene esteemed a iust successour, against whom hee is deemed now an vniust vsurper. But it may be said that it was a diuine power that inspired it, and a strong hand that informed him to it: for from about the Porch of his entrance, into one of the regained Cities, the Wreath of Laurell (referred an ornament of that place) fell in wonder vpon his head. The Genius of Rome in many apparitions chiding & reprehending his slow desire to to affect the Empire, and restore the State. As touching his election, he calleth the Gods to witnesse his unwillingnesse, and the publike protestation hee made against it at Paris, when he was there by the tumultuous Armie saluted Augustus. And although by the great prouision made by him of Corne from Britannie, to hold a foot the Armie against the plots of Constantinus (that grew now enuious of his fortune, hee may seeme to haue intended the ruine of his Soueraigntie) yet doth hee by the Gods of his greatest confidence, Iupiter and the Sunne, protest, Quod Constantinus occidere nunquam optauit, imò ne id accideret exceptauit.

(7) But Constantinus ending this quarrell and competition by his death, Iulian, whom a Pithonist had deluded with the hope of Perfit, telling him that his fortunes should bee as his feature, like Great Alexander, bred in him a thirstie desire after the surname Perfitus: whereupon hee prepared an Armie for this expedition, and seeking the fauor of his Gods the Moone, Fortune, and Mars, embred their Altars with the Blood of an hundred Bulls at once; though manie ominous signes, as they were interpreted by his Philosophers and Southsayers, forbad the same. Such was the great Earthquake happening in Bithynie, that swallowed vp the Citie of Nicomedia. Riuers likewise are saide to stand drie, even in the heart of winter; and Springs forgetting their vsuall boillings, yeelded not forth their wonted waters: yea and it wee will beleuee the reporters; his successe was forethrewed by the departure of an Angell, and by a Meteor gliding in the Aire. All which hee fought to preuent, by pacifying his Heathenish Gods with multitudes of Sacrifices: and with an Armie extended ten miles in length, entred Perfit, cutting asunder the Bridges by which hee passed ouer his men, to adde to them more of resolution, as their meanes were lesse of returne, refusing all humble submission and composition offered him by their King; and at the place then called Phrygia, ioined Battle against Suena, a great Commander among the Persians, and Merenes, Generall of their Horse, accompanied with two of the Kings Sonnes, whose powers notable to resist the Romans, gaue backe and fledde.

Iulian either vpon a vaine confidence, or sudden Alarm, had forgot to arme himselfe with his Corset or Brigandine; and in following the disfarraied flight of the Persians, lift vp his hands in signe of victorie: at which very instant a Tauelin strucke thorow his left Arme into the short Ribbes, and stucke in the nether lappet of his Liner; which whilst hee endeuoured to plucke out, did cutt the finewes of his fingers: wherat al together distracted, hee fell forwards vpon his horses maine, and thence was carried vnto his Paulion. From whose hand this Tauelin came (saith Amianus) God only knoweth. Some report the Cafter to haue bene a fugitiue Persian: others lay that from the hand of one of his owne Souldiers it proceeded: and Calistus one of his owne Guard; that wrote this Battle in Heroicall Verse, affirmeth, that by some wicked Fiend or Dinell, this Tauelin run him thorow. Howfoeuer, there are that report that in pulling out this Lance, and casting it into the aire with his bloud, hee should vtter this blasphemous speech, and say Thou hast ouercome me, O Galilean. At his setting forth hee vowed to his Gods a Sacrifice of Christians bloud, if hee returned Conquerour, but hee performed it with his owne. His slaine Corpses was carried to Tarsus a City in Cilicia, where with small pompe of Funerall Obsequies it was interred neere to the Cities side; which place himselfe to that purpose had formerly assigned: although Nazianzen affirmeth the earth to haue opened, and in a flame of Sulphur to haue sucked vp his body into her Wombe.

(8) Thus ended this Emperour, the twenty sixth of Iune, in the two and thirtieth yeere of his age, and three hundred sixty and three of Christis Natinitie, when hee had reigned Augustus neere three, and Cesar full seuen yeeres. Whole wit and eloquence needs no further testimony then the Monuments of his owne Pen; nor his religious zeale more then the Function his youth so worthily performed in the Christian Church. His Imperiall Vertues we see match him in storie with Titus, in moderation with Aurelius, and for successe in warre, with Traian; three of the most excellent Princes: and his fortune was to see bounded within his sole greatnesse, what the hand of right and sword of tyrannie had so late dispersed. But now one Error, his Apostasie, disrobbing him of all his Morall Vertues, leaues him an obiect naked to the vulgar eye, but as a Monster of men, and marke of infamie. I hold it therefore fitting no lesse the vsf, then the iustice of a Storie, to doe him (as I haue done) all his right: since in him we learne that all those admirable endowments of Nature, embelished with all the morall and internall graces that Aur could adde, are not the bafe of holinesse, without diuine grace; nor dalliance of Fortune, and fulnesse of Empire (that made this man wanton and forgetfull) is the center of securitie and happinesse, without heauenly protection: since from the sense of Sacred Pietie hee fell to Pagan Superstition: for many are called, but few are chosen; and in the seat of Presumptuous Maiesie hee felt the rod of Diuine Renegae.

An. Do. 364.

He mindes of the whole Army being much distracted by the death of Iulian; the next day, being Iune twenty seuen, they met, and consulted vpon a new Emperour: where for a while two factions were maintained, & with equall deserts argued, till

lastly in one accord they both agree vpon * Salustius, a man very honourable and wise, but withall aged and weake, and therefore hee absolutely refused the election. Iovinian by them then was nominated, in regard of his fathers deserts indifferently commended, saith Amianus: but Rufinus, Theodoret, and Socrates attribute great worths vnto himselfe, and confidently affirme his unwillingnesse to accept of that dignitie, for that the whole Armie had yeelded to Iulians Idolatrous Edicts, openly professing himselfe to be

(2) His Father was Varronianus, by birth an Hungarian, a Captaine of good note, who not long before had laid downe his charge of warre, and retired into his Country, to a more quiet course of life. Himselfe serued Julian the Apostata in his Campe, from whence he departed by vertue of his Edict, commanding all Christians out of his pay, among who^t Iouianus (as wee haue said) chose rather to cast from him his Sword and Girdle, (marks of honour to Military Professors) then to forsake the Ensigne of his Heauenlie Chieftaine, and the Badge of his Christian Profession.

(3) No sooner was he clad in the Purple Robe, but one Iouianus (a Roman Ensigne-bearer, lately at variance with this new Elected Emperor, then a priuate man) fearing the danger of so powerfull an Enemie stepped now aboute the degree of the common fort, reuolted to the Persians; and hauing good access, informed King Sapor of the death of Julian, (to them till then vnknowne) and disabbling Iouianus for an Vnskilfull and Effeminate Captaine, both encouraged the Enemie; and gaue directions how to take the advantage. The Persian as ready to execute as ioyous to heare, set forward his forces, his Elephants leading the way, whose terrible brayings and fearefull approach much affrighted the Roman Souldiers. A fore battell was fought, and fountains of blood drawne from the sides of both parts: wherein, with an infinite number of Persians, Julianus, Macrobis, and Maximus, three Roman Tribunes, of those Legions that then were the Principall of the whole Army, were slaine: in regard whereof, and especially for want of Virtuall, (whose scarcitie then was such, that for one Pecke of Meale, ten peeces of Gold were giuen) Iouianus made Peace with the Persians for thirty yeeres, giuing them five Provinces beyond Tigris, some Cities and Forts in Mesopotamia, whereof Nisibis is named for one that had been the very sinewes and strength of the Confines, euer since the Warres of Antioch: for which his doings, he is taxed by Eutropius and Amianus (who both liued in his daies) and of most the deed is held very dishonourable to the greatnesse of the Roman Empire: howbeit diuers others excuse him very iustly, considering the extreame misery and famine wherein Iulianus left the Army, which was in apparant hazard to be giuen ouer for a pray to the Enemy, to the endangering of the whole Empire, had it not been thus prevented: and therefore they highly commend him heerein, as the onely Preferuer of the Roman Army.

(4) Howsoever, he is highly commended by Socrates, (the continuor of Eusebius his History) who flourished aboute Twelue hundred yeeres since; for his constant faith grounded vpon the Nicen Creed, and for his Lowing Reuerence to the Christian Bishops, recalling from banishment those that Constantius and Julian had exiled; among whom, Athanasius of Alexandria was one: putting downe the Idolatrours Temples of the Gentiles, and restoring to their offices both in Court and Campe, those who for their Conscience had beene expelled.

(5) At his departure from Persia, hee visited the Citie Tarsus, where he caused the Sepulchre of Julian (though otherwise he had found him auerfe both in Affection and Religion, yet for that hee was his preceding Emperor) to be richly adorned: and taking Antioch in his way for many daies together was troubled with some accidents, which that age did take for Ominous signes. For the Statue of Maximianus Cæsar, standing at the entrance into the Kings Palace, let fall the Ball or Globe out of his hand, no force mouing it: horrible sounds and noises were heard within the Conflitory: and Blazing-starrs appeared at Noone-day.

Thence therefore in great haste he marched, and at Ancyra, declared his sonne Varronianus his Cæsar, a verie Infant, whose Wrappings and vnwillingnesse to ride in the Imperiall Chariot, portended (saith Amianus) that which after happened. For halting still towards Constantinople, he came to Dadastana, a place that diuideth Bithynia and Galatia asunder, and there died suddenly of the obstructions and stopping of the Lungs, caused by the dampe of a new mortered Chamber wherein he lay; or (as others write) by coales there set to dry the new seeling, whose vapors hauing no issue, stifled him to death, the seuenteenth day of February, the yeere of the worlds redemption, three hundred sixtie foure; after hee had reigned seuen moneths, and twenty two daies, aged thirty three yeeres.

(6) For his personage, he was of goodly presence, both tall and big, his gesture graue, his eyes gray, and countenance pleasant: an affectionate louer & professor he was of the Christian religion, of indifferēt learning himselfe, but a most honorable imbracer thereof in others; very precise and considerate in choosing of Judges and Magistrates; facile and familiar to his seruitors about him. His Blemishes were these, that hee was a great feeder, and giuen to wine; and somewhat to that other Vice which vsually accompanieth such intemperancies.

Recently vpon the death of Iouianus, by a secret whispering and running rumor, Equitius, Tribune of the Scutarij was nominated Emperor, a man naturally rigorous, and rude; and therefore disliked of the better aduised, and no further followed. But first him, their voices turned to Iamarius, a kinsman to the last deceased Iouianus, at that present Gouernor of Illyricum. But he also reiected, Valentinianus, then absent, was Elected at Nice, as a fit and meet person for the managing of their Warres, and good of the Republike.

(2) His birth was of Pannonia, in the Citie Cibalas, of meane and poore parentage; the sonne of Gracian (spoken of before, who by trade was a Rope-seller, but of great strength; and therefore by seruice preferred to places of account, and had been made Ruler of Britaine. His owne life likewise was spent in seruice of Warre, and was ere-while a Captaine ouer the Targatiers; but Julian requiring him either to Sacrifice to his Gods, or to leaue his place; he chose rather to lay aside his Belt then his Faith and Christianitie, as likewise Iouianus had done; and so for neglecting a little honour then, he had now a farre greater bestowed on him by the disposer of all Earthly Kingdomes. The Estare to vrging it, he made Valens (his Brother) Partner in the Empire, the trumpets eury where sounding Warres throughout the Roman World. For the Albans invaded Gaul and Rhetia, the Sarmatians and Quadi made spoile of Pannonia: the Picts, Saxons, Scots, and Attacots infested the Britaines: the Austorians made roades into Africa: the Goths ranfacked Thracia, and the Persians centred Armenia. (3) But in Britaine things prospered not so well: for by the generall Bandings of the foresaid Nations, their old Enemies, the Provinces was sore distressed and brought to extreame misery. For Neftaridius, Admiral of the British Fleet they flew, and Balthobandes Lord Warden of the Marches, by a traine of these barbarous people, was forelaide & assailed on euery side. The intelligence of which occurrences, when it was brought to Rome with great horror, the Emperor first sent hither Seuerus, Steward of his House, if fortune would happily speed his hand, to redresse whatsoeuer had happened amisse; But he in short time being called away, had not the hap to see the wished successe. Then Iouinus, famous for his Warres in Germany, came into the same parts; and seeing the puiffance of the Enemy, meant to craue aid of the Auxiliarie Forces, the vrgent necessitie requiring so much: at last, in regard of many (and those fearefull) accidents, which rumor continually reported, touching the state of this Iland, hither was designed T. headesius, a man esteemed most happy, and approued for his Martiall prowess, who with a bold resolution and select power both of Horse and Foot, set forward for Britaine.

(4) The Picts at that time were diuided into two Nations, to wit, Deucalidones and Vesporiones. The Attacots likewise a warlike kinde of people, and the Scots ranging in diuers parts, wasted all where they went.

But he in short time being called away, had not the hap to see the wished successe. Then Iouianus, famous for his Warres in Germany, came into the same parts; and seeing the puilliance of the Enemy, meant to craue aid of the Auxiliary Forces, the vrgent necessitie requiring so much: at last, in regard of many (and those fearefull) accidents, which rumor continually reported, touching the state of this Iland, hither was deligned Theodosius, a man esteemed most happy, and approved for his Martiall prowess, who with a bold resolution and select power both of Horse and Foot, set forward for Britaine.

(4) The Picts at that time were diuided into two Nations, to wit, Deucalidones and Vesuriones. The Attacots likewise a warlike kinde of people, and the Scots ranging in diuers parts, wasted all where they went.

went. As for the Traicts of Gaul, the Frankners and Saxons their neere confined neighbours, whereof they could breake forth, and make Roades by Sea or Land, made haucke here by seizing of Bootes, firing of Townes, in killing of men and women, and leading away Captives. To stay these wofull miseries, if the Heavens had beene so benigne, this valiant Captaine intended a voyage to this our end of the World: and comming to Romynia, which lieth diuided from the opposite tract of Land by a narrow Channell ebbing and flowing with terrible Tides, where the waters are scene sometimes to match the highest Mountain, and againe to kittle with the leuell of the Plaines, without any harme of Sailers or Passage: this Slene with a gentle course hee crossed, and arrived at Rutupie, a quiet Road and Harbour ouer against it: from whence after that the Bactrians, the Herni, Ioni, and Vittores (Companies bold and confident in their strengths) were come, he marched towards Lundinium, an ancient Citie, which posterities afterwards named Augusta: and hauing leuered his Troopes into sundry parts, he charged vpon those companies of rousing and robbing enemies, even when they were heauie laden with booties and spoiles, and were driving away before them both Men and Women bound for their Captives, besides much Cattle, and a great Prey. These hee soone discomited, and restored to the poore distressed Tributaries their Liberties and Losses, bestowing some small parcels thereof among his weary and well-deseruing Souldiers: and entred the City with exceeding great ioy, in manner of a Petty triumph, which ere while was ouerwhelmed with Calamities, but now on the sudden refreshed and set in perfect safety.

(5) Vpon this prosperous successe encouraged to greater attempts, hee abode yet doubtfull of the future, casting with himselfe many proiects, which poised Fortunes Scales alike: but lastly by certain Captaines and Fugitives hee learned that those Companies of sundry fierce Nations, spread so farre and diffusely vpon the face of the Province, could not be vanquished, vlesse it were by sleights and stratagemes. By Edicts therefore he first proclaimed impunitie to such as had forsaken their Colours, if they would returne; whereby many which had run to the Enemie, or at their owne pleasures had beene dispersed into diuers parts, came in, and by their countenance declared their resolutions in his behalfe. Notwithstanding, mistrusting the euent, and pensiue still with cares, hee thought good to call to his assistance Cicilius, a man of great vnderstanding, quicke spirit, and withall an vpright Iusticer, who was to rule Britaine as Deputie, and likewise Dulcinius a Captaine, renowned for his skill and deedes of Armes.

(6) After Consultation with them, hauing gotten courage, and departing from Augusta with a power of Souldiers, which in his politike industrie he had leuiued and trained to his hand, hee brought exceeding great succour euerly where vnto the troubled and confused state of the Britaines, gaining before hand such places in each part, as might giue advantage to annoy the barbarous Enemie; and enioined the Common Souldiers no seruice, whereof himselfe tooke not the Assay with a cheerefull heart: in this sort performing as well the Offices of an Attieue and hardy Souldier, as the careful charge of a right-noble Generall, he discomited & put to flight diuers Nations, whom insolent Pride (fed with security) had incited and set on fire, to invade the Romans Territories; and so restored wholly vnto their former state the Cities and Castles which had sustained many losses, and established a sure peace for a long time following.

(7) Now there happened whiles hee achieued these exploits, a dangerous matter likely to haue broken out into great mischief, had it not beene quenched in the very beginning of the enterprise: for one Valentinus of Taleria Pannonia, a man of a proud spirit, first Deputy Leutenannt and after president, for some notable offense banished into Britaine, as Frontinus immediately before had beene, as one impatient of rest, like some noisome wilde Beast, vpon a certaine swelling pride, rose vp in commotion against Theodosius, whom hee perceived to be the only man able to withstand his wicked designs. Howbeit, casting about many waies, both closely and apparently, as the gale of his vnmeasurable desire rose higher, he solicited as well the banished persons as Souldiers, promising (as the time would afford) rewards to allure and draw them on to some actual attempt. Yet when the day came wherein it should haue beene effected, Theodosius hauing intelligence thereof, surprized Valentinus with some few of inward complices, and deliuered them vnto Dulcinius, to be put to death accordingly. But in his militarie skill and policie, (wherein hee was reputed to haue exceeded all men liuing in those daies) gelsing at future dangers, hee inhibited all Inquisition to be made touching the rest of the Conspirators, lest so generall a feare surprising at once, and spread abroad among many those tempestuous troubles of the Provinces, which were now well allaiad, should reuiue againe.

(8) Therefore turning himselfe from this businesse to the reforming of such enormities as were of most consequence, now that all dangers were quite ouer-blowne, hee reedified the Cities, repaired the Garrison Castles, and fortified the Frontiers with standing Watches, and strong Fore-senses. And thus hauing recovered the Province againe which had yielded subiection to the Enemies, hee reduced it vnto the pristine Estate, so as by his meanes and motion it had againe a lawfull Gouernour appointed, and also named it VALENTIA, in honour of Valentinianus the Emperor.

(9) The Areens, a kinde of men (as witnesseth Amianus) instituted by those of ancient times for politike imployments, who by little and little were fallen into disorders and vices, hee remooued from their Stations, as being manifestly conuicted, for that (induced with the great neede of officers receiued or promised) they had diuers times discovered vnto the Barbarous whatsoever was done or debated betwixt the President and his Counsell: for indeed their charge was to runne to and fro by long iournies, to intimate and make knowne vnto the Romans Captaines vpon the Marches, what doings and stirres were among the Neighbour-Nations; whereby they had great opportunities both to know and reueale the secrets of the State.

(10) And thus Theodosius hauing managed most excellently these affaires, was sent for to the Emperours Court: who leauing the Province ouer-ioied for their Peace, was no lesse famous for his many important Vittories, then was either Furius Camillus, or Papinius Cursor. And being honourably accompanied and attended vnto the Narrow Seas, with the heartie loue and fauour of all men, departed, and with a gentle gale of winde passed ouer, and came to the Princes Campe, where (being receiued with ioy and praise) hee succeeded in the roomes of Valens Iouinus, who had the conduct of the Horsemen. For these his Martiall deeds so happily atchieued, in honour of him there was a Statue erected, resembling a Man of Armes on Horsebacke, as by Symmachus may be vnderstood, thus speaking to his sonne Theodosius: The Author of your kindred and stocke, Captaine Generall both in Africke and Britaine, was (among other ancient Titles) consecrated by the most honourable Order with Statues of Knighthood. And in his commendations, Claudian with full note thus poetically sing:

*Ille Caledonijs posuit qui Castra pruinis, Qui medijs Libys sub Caside pertulit aestu.

And Ireland did huge heapes of Scots deplore?*

(11) Strange and dreadfull were the signes that in the third yeere of this Emperour chanced; as Earthquakes, Inundations, and the like; whereof Marcellinus thus reporteth: A little after the Summe-rising (saith he) the weighty and steddly masse of the whole Earthly Globe, shooke, flashes of lightning very thicke and fierce going before: the Sea also driuen aside, and the waues and billowes so preposterously tumbling and retiring back, that the deepe Gulfs being discovered and laid empty, a man might haue scene sundry sorts of swimming creatures sticking in the mudde: Also the vast Valleys and Rockes, which Nature had set farre away vnder the huge Waters, did now behold the Beames of the Sunne; inasmuch that many Ships were bedded fast in the drie ground, and flocks of people stragled at their pleasure in the small remains of water, to take up Fishes as the Sea-spoile; when on the sudden the waues disdaining to be thus dispossessed, returned with such violent beating vpon the Ilands and Promontories, which lay farre into the Sea, as that they ouer-flowed, and laid leuell an infinite number of buildings and Cities. And therefore in this furious discord of the Elements, the surface of the world being couered, represented strange, and wonderfull sights: Among which S. Ierome reporteth, that there rained Wooll from Heauen so perfect and good, that no better grew vpon the Sheepe, the naturall Producer. But to returne.

(12) Fraumarius, whom Valentinianus had ordained to be King of the Bucinobantes in Germanie, was made Tribune and Colonell ouer a Regiment of Almans in Britaine, which for number and valour in those daies were renowned; where (no doubt) matter enough was ministered for him to worke vpon. But the death of the Emperour presently following, admits no mention of further discourse which happened in this manner: The Quadi after many molestations done to the Roman Legions and their Confederates, sent their Ambsassadors vnto him, desiring pardon for their former faults committed, and an abolishment of all remembrances thereof: with whom being in earnest conference, suddenly the blood gushed out of his mouth; and being laid vpon his bed, shortly after died of an Apoplexie, or rather of the Plague, as the blew Markes appearing vpon his dead body gaue coniecture: November the seuenth, of his age fiftie liue yeeres, hauing reigned eleuen yeeres, eight moneths, and two daies, in the yeere of our Christ three hundred seventy liue.

(13) For preface, he was Maiesticall, of bodie fat, his complexion faire, his eyes gray, and hauing therewith somwhat a scue cast, his haire shining bright, his ioints strong and well knit: he was a Prince mercifull and louing, and mitigated many Tributes formerly imposed on the Provinces: a wife Warriour, sterne in countenance, hastic of speech, and chaffe of body, a good Iusticer, and impatient of all delays. But these his Virtues with some Vices were accompanied: for he is taxed with enuie and partialitie, in punishing seuerely the poore Souldier for small offences, but remissiuely to the faults of their Captaines and Leaders, and that was the cause (by Amianus his report) of the troubles in Britaine, the losses in Africke, and the waiting in Illyricum.

(14) His Arian brother Valens suruiuing him, raised Emperour in the East; by whose sufferance the Barbarous Gothes entred Thracia, which presently produced to be the bane of the Roman World, for that these Gothes (a strange and unknowne People till then) being forced out of a secret Nooke in Scythia, by the Hog-Backt Hunnes, rushing as an vnresistible Whirlwinde from those High Mountains, infested the Coasts about Danubius, and obtained licence from Valens to passe the Riuer Donay into Thracia, where long in quiet they staid not, but like a violent Flood running with a full current, they ouerwhelmed all before them, ouercomming the Romans in many Battles, and in one slew the Emperour Valens, with most of his approved Captaines, and twenty liue Tribunes that had charge of Regiments, the third part of his Armie hardly escaping vnslaine. Some report that Valens flying the Field, took into a house neere Adrianople, whither being pursued by the Enemie, and his Hold fired vpon his head, was therein burned to ashes, after he had reigned Emperour fourteen yeeres.

Gracianus, the Eldest Sonne of Valentinianus, by his Emperre Severa, was made his fathers Colleague in the Empire in the fourth yeere of his Raigne: notwithstanding fix daies after his death, his second Sonne Valentinian, a Child of Foure yeeres old, by the ad- uice of the Counsell and generall consent of the Camp, was also stiled and proclaimed Emperour. These Brethren lived in much loue, and ruled in the West, as their vncle Valens did in the East, of whom wee last spake. And albeit Gracian had cause of displeasure, that this his Younger Brother was thus advanced without his allowance; yet he as a Prince kind and naturall, regarded his Brother exceedingly, and brought him vp in all tender affection, forgetting the wrong offered vnto himselfe and his owne Mother for Valentinians mothers sake.

(2) The Mother of this Valentinian was Iustina, a damsell of an admirable feature and exceeding beautie, surpassing all other women so farre, that the Emperre her selfe fell in loue with her, and vually conuered with her familiarly as her equall, imparting her most private secrets vnto her as her trustie Counsellor, and often bathing together in the same Bath. Neither was her ardent affection contained within the measure of womanish modestie, in so much as she restrained not in the hearing of the Emperour (her Husband) to extoll her incomparable beautie, preferring her far above any creature in the World. Whereupon Valentinianus so farre affected this Lady, as that heooke her to his Wife, by whom he had this young Valentinian, and also three Daughters, notwithstanding Seuerus was yet liuing.

(3) The stormes of the Gothes as a violent tempest beating still against the Shores of the Roman Provinces, caused Gracian to beare Saile toward the safest Harbour, and to commit the guidance of his shippe to the most assured Pilot: their forces being so great, and their outrages so terrible, that hee thought it best not to adventure his owne person, but to imploy some other approoued Captaine. For which exploit, none was held more sufficient then Theodosius, the Sonne of that Theodosius who was so famous for his British Warres, and whose life was taken away by Valens the Easterne Emperour. Him he made first Captaine Generall of the Roman Empire, and immediately vpon his first seruice against the Gothes, his Fellow Emperour and Augustus, allotting him those parts in the East, that his vncle Valens lately had enjoyed.

(4) In many Battels, fought to the last drop of blood, this worthy Generall ouercame the Gothes, so that their King Athanarius was lastly enforced to sue for his Peace, which vpon honourable compositions was graunted, and himselfe in most princely manner entertained by Theodosius in the Imperiall Citie Constantinople; where falling sicke after three moneths, he died, and was both much lamented, and sumptuously buried by the Emperour. These reports caused Sapor, the most puissant King of Persia, to submit himselfe vnto Theodosius, and by his Ambassadors, attending his Court, obtained his Amicitie. Thus gloriously reigning and perfect peace established, he ordained his young sonne Arcadius his Fellow Emperour in the East.

(5) But the affaires in the Westerne Empire proceeded nothing so fortunately: for Gracian a meeke and soft spirited man, ballanced with Theodosius, was held without regard; and Valentinian by his Prefect Probus, held both Rome and Italy at his deuotion; onely Gallia obeyed Gracian. For Clemens Maximus borne in Spaine, but descended lineally from Constantine the Great, by his affability and liberal carriage, had wonne the affections of the Brittaines to side with him; a man, no doubt, both Valiant and Wise, had he held his allegiance to his Soueraigne Lord. But the time fitting his purposes, when the Scots and Picts with their wonted inroads, fore indamaged the Province, he set himselfe for their deliuerance, and therein sped so well, that the Souldiers by constraint (as Orosius saith) forced him to assume the Imperiall Stile and Purple Robe. so halting into Gallia, with all the flower and strength well neer of the Brittaines forces, arrived in the mouth of Rhene, vnto whom also the German Army ioyned, and now accounting himselfe an absolute Monarch, admitted Victor his sonne, then Caesar, to be partner of his Empire, whose Stampe therefore with his father we haue here annexed.

(6) Thus Maximus establishing his throne at Truers, Spread his wings (saith Ovid) the one into Spaine, the other into Italy, and with the terror of his Name, leuied Tributes and Pensions for Souldiers pay, of the most fell and savage Germans.

Against him Gracianus made his power, but after five daies skirmishings was forsaken of his own Souldiers, and so put to flight. And now dejected and destitute of meanes to maintaine his quarrell, hee sent Ambrose (a great Doctor of the Church) his Ambassador vnto Maximus, to intreat for Peace, which in outward shew was graunted, but was farre otherwise intended, as the sequell proved. For seeking his death, he did shortly after effect it in this wise: He caused Letters, and reports to be given vnto Gracian, that his Emperre was in iourney to visit him, and withall sent forth a Carroche stuffed with Souldiers, and with them a desperate Captaine named Andragathius. Gracian greatly reioicing for his Wifes approach, prepared himselfe to meet her accordingly, and opening the Litter, thinking to embrace his Emperre, was by these Ruffians treacherously murdered nere vnto Lyons, when he had reigned fiftene yeeres, and liued twentienine. Valentinian with his Mother Iustina, fearing the like conspiracies, became supplicants vnto Theodosius in the East against Maximus.

(7) He therefore preparing his forces, marched as farre as Aquileia in Lombardie, where Maximus remained both confident and secure. For hauing fortified the straits of the Mountaines with sufficient Garrisons, and dammed the Hauens with strength of Ships, himselfe and asisturs with great boldnesse proceeded against Theodosius, and gaue him a battell before the Citie Syesia in Pannonia, and againe most valiantly receiued him in another, vnder the leading of his brother Marcellus; but in both of them was ouercome. From this last, he secretly retired vnto Aquileia, where of his owne Souldiers he was betrayed, and deliuered to Theodosius his pursuers; and by him to the Ex-ceptioner to be beheaded: of which his vnforgotten, but deferred end, the famous Bishop Martinus Turonensis being in Britaine, did foretell him long before. Andragathius also, the Murderer of Gracian, whose state was now desperate, cast himselfe headlong into the Sea, and made an end of his wicked life. Victor the sonne of Maximus, made his Caesar in France, as we haue said, was defeated, taken Prisoner & slaine. This Victory was held so worthy and memorable, that the Romans from thence forward solemnized that day euery yeere as festiuall, saith Protolus.

(8) But these Brittaines that had assisted Maximus, as by Writers is recorded, did forcibly invade Armorica, and there planted themselves: From whence (saith Bede, the Brittaines first arrived into this Island. But surely himselfe is either greatly mistaken, or else we must take him altogether, and that rather, for that by Caesar those Coasts that lie vpon the Sea shores, are called Armorica, and there the Celtes seated, being the Originall of our Inhabitants, as is holden, and so from thence they might spread themselves further into these British Islands, long before it recetued the name of Little Britaine. The like troubles fell to other Provinces at the same time, by the intestine warres of the Empire: for the Gaules were molested by the Frankes; Spaine by the Suenians; and Africa by the Vandals: the East parts by the Heruli, Ostrogoes, and Hunnes; Italy by the Lombards, and shortly after by the Gothes.

(9) These troubles in the Provinces, caused the Emperours to call home their Armies, with Aides of their Allies, & all too little to support their own declining Estates, which now beganne to end of it selfe, and these Emperours raigues to be cut off by their vntimely deaths.

But to returne into the path of our History, from whence (by the intangled occasions of these foure Emperours raiguing together) we haue wandred; let vs remember what occurrences happened vpon the death of Maximus the Tyrant, and haften to end the greatnesse of the Empire, which in most Provinces began to end of it selfe. For Valentinian being rid of his feares, vnto which he had beene subiect; and Theodosius of his Colleague, vnto whom hee was enforced; great hope was conceiued of a flourishing Estate, but it brought forth onely the remains of their downefall: for the one returning to Constantinople in great Triumph, liued not long after, and the other left peaceably in the Westerne World, was (as you shall heare) soone made away by Conspiracie.

(10) Valentinian remaining at Vienna in France, free from Hostile Enemies, retained in his Court those that fought his life, wherof Arbogastes, a Captaine of a haughty stomacke, politick, aduenturous, and of great power, but withall of a base Parentage, a stranger and an Infidell, was one; Eugenius a Grammarian, but now bearing Armes, and of great account, was another. These corrupting his Chamberlaines, compounded for his death, which they as wickedly performed, by strangling him in his bedde, giuing it forth that the Emperour had hanged himselfe; which was so confidently aouched, that Prospers in his Addition to Eugenius writing his death, saith, that it was acted by himselfe, after hee had liued twenty six, and reigned fiftene yeeres, being strangled in the yeere of Grace three hundred eighty foure.

FLAVIUS THEODOSIUS.

CHAPTER LII.

Flau. Theodosius Emp.

An. Do. 392.

He haue declared in the life of the last preceding Emperour, the Birth and Fortunes, Warres and Victories of this most worthie Theodosius, vntill the death of Maximus the Britaine, (for so most writers terme him) and now onely remaine his latter Acts in Warre and Peace to bee further related.

Theodosius goeth against Arbogastes and Eugenius.

(2) This Emperour returning from Aquileia in Lombardie vnto Constantinople in the East, long time there staid not, but was drawne againe into the West both to reuenge the death of Valentinian his Fellow Emperour so treacherously strangled, and also to oppose the proceedings of Eugenius, whose Coine wee haue here expresse, being one of the Murderers then vsurping that portion of the Empire, sided by Arbogastes the other.

Eugenius vsurper.

(3) Theodosius marching with his forces towards the Confines of Italie found the passages stopped at the foot of the Alps, and his Enemies powers farre surmounting him: Therefore a while to deliberate on these busineses, hee pitched his Tents, and there staid. In the meane time Eugenius and Arbogastes his associate had forleide the Countrey, and hemmed him about in such a strait, that no victuals could bee brought vnto his Campe.

Theodosius prayeth to God for victorie.

(4) No meanes being now left, but either to cleere the passages, or bee ouerthrowne, hee first became supplicant with Fastings and Teares vnto his God, whom he knew to be the God of Hosts, and whom euer he had serued, and whose aid had hitherto neuer failed him: whereupon boldly encouraging his men, he accepted of the Field. But the Battle furiously begunne, fell so fore against him, that ten thousand of his Souldiers were presently slaine, and the rest despairing ready to flee, himselfe at that instant had bene surprized, had not God turned the heart of Arbogastes, a Captaine of his Enemies, suddenly to come to his side, and to rescue him. Theodosius much daunted by these unfortunate beginnings, yet conceiued better hopes of the following successe, trusting to the vprightnesse of his Cause, and the helpe of his God, which still he implored, till the Heauens were propitious to his earnest desires.

(5) For suddenly a violent tempest arose, and a raging winde rushed so extreemly on the faces of his Enemies, that they were in no wise able to withstand it, the power thereof beating backe againe their darts into their owne sides; whereas the arrows shot from the Emperours part, were thereby forced with double strength to pierce through the Rebels Iron plates, whereby a most glorious victory was obtained; and Eugenius taken, who lay grouelling at the Emperours feet, deploring his estate, and craving his pardon; but euen as hee kneeled with cries and teares, the Souldiers standing by stricke off his Head. And Arbogastes the Author of these euils by flight escaping, two daies after ran himselfe vpon his sword, and so reuenged on himselfe his owne wicked actions. This victory was atchieued the sixth of September, in the yeere of grace three hundred ninety six, by Socrates account: and was so famous, that besides the Records of Christian Historians, Claudius a Heathen Poet thus eternizeth the fame in his Heroick Poeme.

Gods darling deare, the heauens thy souldiers were in arms,
And windes conpired to aid and follow thy allarms.

(6) Theodosius thus deliuered, repaired vnto Milan, where worne with yeeres and trauels, shortly after he sickened vnto death. And sending for his Son Honorius, made him Emperour of the West, and to Arcadius gaue the East, wherein hee had before made him his Cesar. The Province of Africa he assigned to the government by one Gildus in his Sonnes behalfe, and in the Non-age of Arcadius appointed Rufinus for Constantinople, and Stilicho Tutor to young Honorius in Italie, three most worthy men vndoubtedly, had the greatnesse of their spirits bene contained within the lists of their trust and places.

(7) This last named Flavius Stilicho, famous for a long time, and an inward companion with Theodosius, had bene imployed in the Britaines warres against the inroades of the Scots, Vandals, and Picts, and therein had borne himselfe with fortunate successe, as the Poet Claudian implieth, where he bringeth in Britaine thus speaking:

Me quoq, vicinis pereuntem Gentibus, inquit,
Muniuit Stilicho, totam quum Scotus Eibernem
Mouit, & infestis pumauit remige T betis.
Illius effectum curis, ne bella timerem

When Scots did cause the Irish stirres, then Stilicho did me cherishe.

sith Saxons conquer'd are,
And I securely rest,
now Picts are queld in warre.

But this her ioy through the Treasons of these three Gouvernours, was loone turned into laments and teares, and the whole Empires glory brought to a fatal period, as presently it will appeare.

(8) This Theodosius for his Princely parts by all writers is ranked among the very best of all the Emperours: And as he is likened to Traian for his feature and personage, so may he be compared in wisdome to Marcus Aurelius: In temperance with Antoninus Pius: For his Christian profession and deuotion, with Constantine the Great: and for his meeknes, cquall to any: Whereof among many other, we haue one example very remarkable, vpon an offence committed by the Inhabitants of Theffalonica, hee commanded most severe punishment to bee inflicted, which was so vnadvisedly executed, that as well the innocent, as the offenders were inuolued therein. He then coming to Millan, would haue entred the Church to haue communicated with other Christians in their sacred deuotions, which Ambrose, the great Doctor, and Bishop of that Sea (though otherwise a man of admirable mildnesse) resisted and forbade, in which estate the Emperour stood for eight moneths continuance: and then with great humility & submission, acknowledging his offense was absolved, and againe receiued into the congregation: For preventing of the like rash offences by him committed, he then enacted a Lawe, that thirty daies should passe betwixt the sentence of death, and the execution of the Malefactor: And to suppress his hasty choller (whereunto he was much subiect) his vltim manner was to recite the Greeke Alphabet, before hee vttered any speech suauering of that humour.

(9) He died Ianuary the fteuenteenth, the yeere of the worlds happines three hundred ninety five: when he had reigned fteuentee yeares, and liued fixty, as Aurelius Victor writeth, with whom he ends his History. His first wife was Flaccilla, a religious Lady, the Mother of Arcadius and Honorius, by his second wife hee had a daughter named Placidia Galla, first married vnto Athaulphus King of the Gothes, and after his death vnto Constantine, whom Honorius her brother made Augustus and his fellow Emperour.

CHAPTER LIII.

Arcadius Emp. East.

Honorius Emp. West.

Attall was the Act of Theodosius, in his Election of the three foresaid Protectors, whose greatnes carried with a glutted prosperity, grew to a surter after his death in their ambitious thoughts, and was the downefall of the now aged and drooping Emperour: first Gildus in Africa, not contented with the title of Comes or Earle, cast off all subiection, and as an absolute Lord, acknowledged neither Arcadius, nor Honorius for his Soueraigne.

with which, though much too weake, he marched against the Emperours Enemy, and as Paulus Orosius writeth more by force of praier to God, then power of men, in his encounter preuailed, and beheaded Gildus for his Treason: But himselfe becoming mightie, and forgetting that which in others hee remembered, himselfe vsurped the command of Africa against Honorius, casting off all subiectiue obedience, and as a free Prince ruled the Province: The Souldiours that had lately assisted the Emperours cause, now well perceiving his aime, leuelled at the Crowne, thought best to cut the string before hee looked the shaft, and made him shorter by the head.

trapped, or else himselfe in those dangers, set vp as the more sufficient. But these things thus dangerously plotted by Ruffinus, were as politically preuented by the Emperour, although a Child: for before the Seed of this Treason could bring forth either Bud or Blade it was discovered, and the Author slaine by an Italian Band, his Head (which as some affirme, first tooke breath in Britaine) was aduanced ouer a Gate in Constantinople.

(4) Thus Peace obtained by the Deaths of these two Tyrants, the Third stood vp with more danger in the west. For Stilicho, Tutor to young Honorius, thought it not sufficient honour for him to haue his Daughter an Empresse by the Marriage of his Ward; but set at hazard (for himselfe and sonne) his own Conscience, both their Lives, and the fatal ruine of the Now-declining Empire. For first, sowing seditions amongst the Lieutenants of the Provinces, picked also quarrels in the Emperours Court, Cashiering with disgraces those Gothes that had serued with good proofe of their fidelitie a-boue twenty yeeres, since their entertainment by Theodosius. These to reuenge their Wrongs, chose for their Chieftaine a valiant Goth named Alaricus, which shortly found the Seourge of Rome: with whom ioyned the Fandals, Alanes, and Suenians, who ioyntly with great fury beganne to warre in Austria and Hungary, increasing their Powers with such Multitudes, that as Paulus Orosius, an Author of that time saith, The World was amazed and stood in feare. For vnto these Colonies resorted two hundred thousand Gothes, more, vnder the leading of Radagastus their King, who together with vnited forces, subdued all Thracia, Hungary, Austria, Scythia, and Dalmatia, and spoiled all in such manner, that it seemed Dinels and not Men had passed that way, as Saint Ierome (who liued at that time) expresseth: These brute Beasts (saith he) suffered by the wrath of God in this warre, haue laid Cities waste, slaine the People, and left the very Fields bare and desolate, whereof the Provinces of Thracia, and Scythia, with the Country wherein my selfe was borne, beare too true, but lamentable Records.

(5) The Roman Empire thus daily declining, and these fierce Nations making hauock where they came, the Armies in Britaine were put in great feare, lest the Flames of their Neighbours fire might Flash out, and take hold of them also. Therefore proudly to preuent that danger, they elected one Marcus their Lieutenant for Emperour, yeclding him their obedience some shorter time, and then finding his defects, immediately murdered him.

In whose stead they Inthroned one Gracian a Britaine: whose carriage not answering their expectations, they Murdered also, within Four Moneths after his Royall solemnity.

The features and Imperiall Titles stamped on the Romish Mony of these two Usurpers, (according to the vusual manner of the like in Estlate) we finde not, neither stands it with credit of our History to faigne them at pleasure: therefore till time bring them forth, from the Cauces of obscurity we haue allowed them place onlie by these Circles inferred, that others may supply what presentlie wee want, and accomplish by pencile what we cannot by Presse.

(6) Yet time to Constantine hath bin more fauorable in preserving his remembrance by his minted Monies, which here with his Story we present to fight. At the fall of these former, no better at all then a Common Souldier, but vpon confidence onely conceiued of his Name, was made Emperour, who with more respect of honour, and liking of his aduancers, bare himselfe better then the others had done. For putting to Sea, and landing at Bologne, he easily indued the Romans forces as farre as the Alps to side with him: Valentia in France hee manfully defended: the Rhine, which long had been neglected, hee fortified with Garrisons: vpon the Alpas well as vpon the Maritime Coast, where passages were frequented, hee built Fortresses: Spaine likewise hee held vnder the hand of Constantians his Sonne, whom of a Monke hee had made Augustus, & by whose valour subdued all from the Pyrenean Mountaines to the Ocean, whose Monies wanting to expresse his Image and Stile, we haue also supplied with another Blanke.

(7) Constantine prospering as wee haue said, sent Letters of excuse vnto Honorius, affirming constantly that he was compelled by the Souldiers to doe what hee did: whereby hee so pleased the Emperour, that commending his Valor, & holding him fit, hee sent him of free gift a Purple Robe. Whereupon this new-grown blade began to bud faire, and at Arles planted his Imperiall Seat, Commanding the Citie to be called Constantina from him, and ordained that the Assemblies of the affairs of Seuen Provinces should bee therein held. But his his sunshine of prosperitie was soone ouercast with the Clouds of aduerser fortunes, and his Crowne & Life laid together in the dust. For in Spaine against him was arreared Maximus a Vassall, whose Generall Gerontius intercepting Constantians, (his Sonne and Cesar) at Vienna in France slew him: and Constantine himselfe within the Wall of Arles, besieged for Four Moneths, after the Raigne of Four Yeeres, laid aside his Purple Robe, and entered the Church in Order of Priesthood, surrendering the Citie with his Stile Imperiall, was lastly led into Italy, and there beheaded.

(8) From that time Britaine renewed her obedience to Honorius, and the Province a while was refreshed by the Wisdom and Prowesse of Victorinus her Lieutenant, who often repressed the incursions of the Scots.

Scots and Picts: whereupon in his praise Rutilius Claudianus thus wrote:

Conscius Oceanus virtutum conscia T hule,
Et quacunque ferox arua Britannus arat.

The Ocean wide and T hule, his vertues wine-se wills
And all the Champion Fields,
w. ch Brittaines fierce doe till.

(9) But Rome at this time being fore afflicted, and by Alaricus with his Goths and Vandals presently lacked, Honorius sent for Victorinus with his Army out of Britaine, to the rescue of the Citie, as Claudian signifieth, when he reckoneth vp among other Aides, the British Legion sent thither: whereof the Scots and Picts had soone notice, and (according to their wonted manner) with fire and sword molested their neighbours.

(10) The Britains therefore resolutely engaging themselves into dangers, took Armes, and freed their Cities and States from those Barbarous People: by whose example, the rest of their Nation in Armorica, with the Provinces of Gaulois, deliuered themselves also from their oppressions, and all of them cast out the Roman Presidents, setting a forme of Common-wealth to their owne liking. But these our Britains growing too weak to withstand the continuall inroads of their Northerne Enemies, humbly besought Honorius for succour; whose returne of comforts consisted only in words, exhorting them by Letters, to stand vpon their owne Guard. But they knowing it was not words which must helpe them, againe deplored their miseries, & so obtained of him the assistance of one Legion, which in their aid droue backe those Assailants into their owne Marches, and fortified againe the wall betwixt the Frith of Edenburgh vnto Cluid: so then departing, left the Britains to defend themselves; who now, besides the Common Enemies so often mentioned, were much molested, and their Faith corrupted by one Pelagius, by birth a Britaine, by profession a Monke, by leaud doctrine an Heretike, who was brought vp in the famous Monastery of Bangor in Wales, had also travelled Italie, Sicilia, & Egypt, for the studie of learning, and grew into great fauour with Paulinus Bishop of Nola, and with S. Augustine also, till his Heretickall Assertions, which had beene by him and his disciple Caelestus (a Scot secretly taught, and by Saint Ierome discovered) were afterwards condemned by Innocentius the first, Bishop of Rome. But the Ach-heretike returning into Britaine, began againe obstinately to maintaine the same, together with Agricola, one who spread the venome of that Heretie into Forraine parts: whose doctrines were, 1. That Man, without the grace of God, was able to fulfill all the Commandements. 2. That Man in himselfe had Freewill. 3. That the Grace of God was giuen vnto vs according to our merits. 4. That the Iust haue no sinne. 5. That Children are free from Originall sinne. 6. That Adam should haue died, though hee had not sinned. And therein also one Timothie most impiouslie disputed against the Diuine and Humane Natures of Christ. Notwithstanding, at the same time flourished Fastidius, a most learned British Bishop, and Chrysanthus also the Deputie or Vicegerent of Britaine, who with great honour gouerned the affairs of the Church and Common-wealth, and was afterwards (as elsiwhere we haue shewed) made Bishop at Constantinople of the Novatians against his will.

(11) Thus were the affaires of this Land managed vnder these Brethren Emperours; the elder of which, Arcadius, died in peace at Constantinople, leaving his sonne Theodosius, a child of eight yeeres, to the succession of the Empire, and to the tuition of Hisdalgerdus King of Persia; a matter which seemed at first very dangerous, but proued at the last very profitable. Hee reigned thirteene yeeres, and died the first of May, the one and thirtieth of his age, the yeere of Christs birth four hundred and ten. At which time one Iovinus, of an obscure beginning, had raised some Tumults in Gallia, stiled himselfe Emperour, vsurped the Purple Robe, and stamped his Coines with the Title of Victorie, as is seene in one which we heere present.

(12) Against him Honorius made his power, and with his little losse slew the Pyrrh in the Field: whereby his fame was more spread in the West, though not so fortunate as his brothers was in the East, after whom hee liued fiftene yeeres, and with whom hee had reigned other thirteene; and hee died, saith Paulus Diaconus, of an infirmity at Rome, in the yeere of grace foure hundred twenty foure, leaving no issue of his body to succeed him in the Empire.

Theodosius 2. & Valentinian 3. the last Roman Monarchs in Brittain.

Great have been the Wars and strange the Alterations which both here at home, and through the World abroad have chanced vnto States since the first attempts of Julius Caesar vnto these present Emperors, Theodosius the second, and Valentinian the third, his Associates, whose Lines and Reigns did conclude the Successions of the Romish Monarchs within this Island of Great Brittain, and threw down their Triumphall Arches in many other Provinces, which for long time had been obsequious to Romes Soueraigne Command. So vncertaine is the Glory of this World, and her Seeming Strength so liable to Instabilitie, that the Powers and Periods thereof held in His hand that holdeth the vniuersall Ball, are suddenly turned from their high-mountained fire and beauty of the Sun vnto the Downe-fall and darke fide of the Globe, and either fall againe into the small Circuit of their first compass, after they have expired their Number, Waigh, and Measure: or else with Daniels Image are vnterly extinct and blowne away, as the chaffe from the Summer flower.

I. King. 6. 1. The time betweene the departing out of Egypt, and the building of the Temple of Salomon.

(2) The continuance of whose Estates, seeme they neuer so Great and Durable in Power, Circuit, Defence, and Multitude, hath seldom extended much the limit of Five hundred yeeres, but that their high and mounted Flames, fall in the ashes of their owne consuming decays, or else hath receiued some other alteration of Empires encrease, as many learned Writers have obserued in most Common-wealths. So was it in the State established by God himselfe among his Peculiar People. As from the Promise to Abraham, made of Christ the blessed Seed and Life of Man (where ceased the worlds formerly-used computation from the Ages of Men) vnto the Law deliuered vpon Mount Sinai, declaring condemnation and death, were foure hundred thirty yeeres: from Israels departure out of Egypt, when their Common-wealth beganne to be ruled by Judges, and Gods seruice celebrated in the Tabernacle vnder Curtaines vnto the Building of their Glorious Temple erect by King Salomon, were yeeres foure hundred and eighty. From the Anointing of David, the first King, set vpon Iudahs Throne, vnto the death of Zedechiah the last King thereof, slaine by Nebuchadnezzar, and that Holy Temple consumed by fire, were yeeres foure hundred & seuentie. And other Politike Estates haue stood much vpon the like space of time. For the Kingdome of Athens set vp by Cecrops the first

King thereof, vnto Codrus the last, when they changed their Monarchie to a Democracie, is said to haue continued foure hundred and ninetie yeeres. The Lacedemonians State from Lysurgus their Law-giuer, vnto Alexander the Great, that ouerthrew it, flourished the space of foure hundred ninety one yeeres. From the expulsion of Romes Kings vnder Tarquinus, vnto the affected Empire in Julius Caesar, were foure hundred ninety and nine yeeres. And omitting many others, to come to our felices; from Caesars first Inuasion of Brittain, vnto the daies of this Valentinian the third, wherein the Romans did quite abandon it, were five hundred yeeres. From the Saxons intrusions and diuision of this Realme into an Heptarchie vnder their Governement, vntill the vniited Monarchie made by King Egbert in the yeere eight hundred and ninetene, were yeeres foure hundred sixty nine. But from thence, vntill their issue failed in King Edward Confessor, were yeeres only two hundred forty seuen. And from the Normans Conquest, vnto the death of that most sacred Soueraigne of eternall memorie, Quene Elizabeth, when began againe the name of GREAT BRITAIN, and the vniion of the whole Island to be brought into one inuie Monarchie, by the rightfull Succession and thrice-happie entrance of our most gracious King IAMES, are yeeres five hundred thirtie six. But of these three last, we are to speake hereafter; and now returne to finish vp the falling Estate of the Romans Greatnesse.

(3) Theodosius the sonne of Arcadius beganne his Empire in the yeere of the worlds saluation foure hundred and eight, and was gouerned with a speciall protection by the Persian King during his Minortie, vnder the charge of Antigonus an excellent man. But now growne to yeeres, and some variance happening betwixt him and his Tutor, he was left to the disposal of himselfe: and his vncke Honorius leauing at his death great troubles vnnquenced in the West, the mightiest Potentates assailed to make themselves Emperours ouer seuerall Dominions, and from the richesse of the Imperiall Diademe, each one sought to plucke a Twell to beautifie his owne Crowne. So the Barbarous Nations out of this one Monarchie began the foundations of many succeeding Kingdomes. For in Spaine the Vandals, Sueuians, and Alanes, not contented with their portion therein assigned, betooke themselves to Armes. The Franks and Burgundians, which had been driven out of France, resolved againe to returne. The Gothes, that were Lords of Barcelona, Narbona, and Tolosa, did as the rest. The Hunnes entred Hungarie. John the Tyrant held Rome: and in Africa, Boniface became a Neuter. These stirres moued Theodosius to nominate nominate Valentinian his kinsman Emperour in the west; whose raigne and affaires (so farre as they touch Brittain) we will follow, being the last of the Romane Emperours that held out the succession of our Britissh Monarkes.

(4) This Valentinian was the sonne of Constantine, made Augustus, as is said, and of Placidia Galla daughter to the first Theodosius Emperour: which Lady in the sacking of Rome by Alaricus the Gothe, was taken Prisoner, and by him giuen in marriage to his neere kinsman Athaulphus, who afterwards was King of that Nation; and by her sweet demeanour, and prudent meanes, a Peace was concluded betwixt her Husband and her Brother, but with such dislikes to the Gothes, that they presently killed him, and raised one Vallia for their King; who likewise comming to composition with Honorius, deliuered Placidia according to Couenants, whom the Emperour her Brother bestowed in Marriage vpon Constantine his Generall, in regard of his good seruice and Victories by him achieved.

(5) Shee, with young Valentinian New-made Emperour, being sent into Italie, selected the best appointed Captaines to secure her sonnes Estate; whereof Alar was one, that in Rome slew John the Tyrant, who had there made himselfe Emperour, stamping this his face and stile vpon the currant Money of the State; and by his Tyrannies held his fortunes for five yeeres continuance.

John Vsurper.

Etius likewise, that had bene Gouvernour of spaine, was imploied into Gallia, where the Franks and Burgundians (vnder the conduct of Clodius their second King) fought to establish (as shortly they did) their Kingdome in that Countrey, giuing it the name of France, according to their owne, by which name they were neuer knowne to Caesar, Strabo, Pliny, Tacitus, Mela, nor Ptoleme; whereby the great blasp of their Antiquitie is shewed to be but a puffe of winde.

(6) At this time the Brittaines were againe sore oppressed by the Scots and Picts, who hauing notice that the Aides sent by Honorius were returned, passed over the Water in their Boats at both the ends of the Wall, and inuaded the Province with such force, that they bare downe all before them. The Brittaines in this lamentable plight, sent their Ambassadors to Rome; with their Garments rent, and dust vpon their heads, vnto Valentinian the Third, bewailing their most miserable Estates, and crauing his helpe. The Emperour moued to remorse, sent a Regiment of Souldiers into Brittain, vnder the Command of Gallio of Ravenna, a most valiant man, who hauing put backe the Enemy with the assistance of the Islanders, gaue some small comforts to the distressed Brittaines. But the Burgundians passing the Rhene, and threatening to waite Italy, Etius was compelled to recall Gallio with his Legion, to secure the Countrey about Paris, whilest himselfe with his, followed the dangerous Enemy.

(7) He now ready to depart for France, told the Brittaines that it was not for the Romans to take so long and painefull Iournies, neither at that time especially when their own Empire was in danger to be ouer-run. Therefore he willed them thenceforth to stand vpon their Guard, and to prouide for their owne safeties: and to that end, in regard of their good seruices done to the Romans, he taught them the vse of their Armour and Weapons, as also to strengthen their Fortification, and Wall of Turfe, which now they began to build with firme Stone, laid eight foot in thickeesse, and twelue foot in height. This Wall (saith Gildas) they drew in a straight line (at the publike charges of the State) from East to West, and from Sea to Sea, planting Bulwarkes, and raising Turrets with convenient spaces distant one from another; which gaue a faire and faire prospect into the Sea. And so the Romans gaue a small Farewell, meaning neuer to returne againe; and burying part of their Treasures heere in the Earth, whereof much hath bene found, and more is still sought, left Brittain about the yeere of Christ fise hundred, after the first Inuasion thereof made vnder the conduct of Julius Caesar.

(8) This vnfortunate Emperour Valentinian lost not only Brittain, but stifled also Africa, France, and Spaine to be plucked from his Empire: and the weaknesse of the Romans power (whose strength consisted most in Forraigne Aides, (as Tacitus saith) was left vnto him to defend it selfe; when they had bereft this Province of all the Flower and Choice of Men, as Gildas in that age complained, saying, Brittain is despoiled of all her armed men, with her militarie forces: her Rulers (scarcely though they were) are wasted, her Garisons withdravvn, and defenseles open, and an exceeding great number of her stout couragious Souldiers taken from her, to serue the Romans in their warres. With which his sayings the Roman Writers themselves agree, and record the Mutters and great multitudes of Brittaines that haue bene transported by them out of this Island: as when Trebellius Maximus with his Britissh Forces made strong the Faction against Otho in Germanie: and then also Honorius Flaccus brought thence eight thousand chosen Souldiers to uphold Vitellius in his cause.

Clodius Albinus.

Clodius Albinus banding against Severus the Emperour, assuming the Title, and stamping the Moneyes of the Imperiall Estate (as by this here inserted is to be seene, which comming to our hands since his storie was written, we hold it more acceptable to set heere, though out of place, then to give it no place at all in this Worke, being so worthy an Antiquitie, and so much concerning the Brittaines) vnder whose Banner the Flower of their Cheuallrie perished in Battle, when in the Fields of France; and nere vnto Lyons, they spent their blood in his cause; whereby the finewes of their owne Countreys defense was fore weakened, and laid open to Forraigne Inuaders. Constantine the Great also as Malmsbury noweth carried hence a great power of Britissh Souldiers with him in his warres; by whose puissance (as he saith) he obtained Triumphant Victories, and the Empire of the whole World: and after assigned them that part of Gallia to inhabit, which was called Armorica, lying tweward vpon the Sea Coasts, where they seating themselves, their posteritie was increased, and continueth a Mightie People euen vnto this day.

(9) This Countrey afterwards (being conquered by Maximus, and his reconciled Enemy Conan Meriadoc, Lord of Denbigh-land, by the prowess of those Britissh Souldiers whom hence hee carried in his quarrell against Valentinian the Emperour) was receiued in free gift of Conan, after the slaughter of Iubates the King, and the name thereof changed to Little Brittain, as being a Colonie or Daughter of this our Island. The Province is large, pleasant, and fruitful, and containeth in her Circuit nine Bishops Sees, whereof three are called Cornouaille vnto this day, which are Leones, St. Paul, and Tregniers: the other fix are Dole, Rhemes, Eec 2 S. I omit to speak of those other Numbers of men sent out of this Kingdom by the said Conan, whereof our British Historians make mention; besides the sending of Vrsula with Eleuen thousand Virgins to be matched in marriage with these their Country-men, all of them perishing by Sea or by Sword, but none of them returning hither againe; whereby the bane of the Land presently followed, her hopes being cut off, and deprived of wanted Poet-rites.

(10) This Conquest and Plantation in Armo-rica, Matthew of Westminster accounteth to have happened in the year of Christ three hundred ninety two. And these Souldiers thus withdrawn, are so recorded by Henry of Huntingdon his ancient, and Ninius also long before both, reporteth that Maximus gave manie Counties to these his Britanes, even the Poole which is on the Top of Impiter Hill, to a Citie called Cantguic, and vnto the Western Mountaines. These (sayeth he) are the Britanes in Armerica, who neuer returned to this day, in regard whereof Britaine was Conquered by Strange Nations. With whom agreeeth Gerardus a Monke of Canturburie, John Angliens, Rampolus of Chester, and others. Thither also in the downefall and desperat Estate of the Britanes, many of them fled from the rage of their Enemies, as hee that was borne in Armerica, and liued here to that age, euen the Writer of the Life of s. Wingham of the Confessor, doth sufficiently proue. An offspring (saith he) of the Britanes embarked in Flotes, arrived in this Land, on this side the British Sea: what time as the Barbarous Nation of the Saxons, fierce in Armes, and unciuill in manners, possessed their Native and Mother Soyle, &c.

(11) And lastly, in the cause of that other Constantine, who was elected only for his Name, most of the Flower and Strength of the Britanes were transported into Gallia and Spaine, where in his variable fortunes many of them perished. And Malmesbury writing of these Times, saith, that the Romans had emptied Britaine of all her Flower and Chivalry of Warre, leauing now in her Countries but Halfe-barbarous men, and in her Cities only Epitewes, vnfit for seruice. In confirmation whereof, the most learned Camden out of Antike Inscriptions, and the Booke named Noctitia Provinciarum, hath obserued, that these Companies vnder written serued the Romans in their Warres, and were dispersed here and there in their Provinces, which also were from time to time euermore supplied out of Britaine.

(12) No maruell is it then if Britaine lay weake, being thus continually exhausted of her strengths, which these approued Records made so apparant, as we need not allege the doubtfull Story of Irpas of Norway, for the depopulation of the Island, who is said by subtilty vnder pretence of Kindred, and Honour to be attieched, to haue gotten an infinite number of Britanes to follow him in his enterpriss, which neuer returned againe: or the Booke Triades mentioned by the Author of the Reformed History of Great Britaine, that bringeth an Army hence, consisting in number of one and twenty thousand men, into Aquitaine and Gaul: which, as he saith, was the Aid mentioned by Cesar, that out of Britaine assisted the Gauls against him. Which may partly seeme to be gathered from Cesar himselfe, as hath been said: where he affirmeth, that the Britanes and Gauls were governed vnder the same King: and is further confirmed by the fashion and Inscriptions of Antike Coines, which wee haue seene stamped in Gold, the Forme round, and Shield-like: Imbossed outward in the Face, and Hollow in the Reuerse; a Forme vnfallible to be of the Britanes Coines, and yet the word Comes is inscribed vpon the Imbossed side, whom we imagine to be the same Governor of Artoye in Gallia, whom Cesar mentioneth.

(13) Thus then was Britaine first made Weake by the Romans exhaustings, and then quite abandoned of their helpe, and left as a tree in the wilderness, to lose her faire leaues by the continual blasts of these sharp Northerne winds, whose beauty before had bin as the Cedars of Libanon, or like vnto those in the Garden of God. And whose Riches had drawne the Worlds then-Monarchs to such liking and loue, that no means was omitted to attaine the same, nor care neglected to keepe it in their Subiection: which, while it stood a Province in their obedience, was held and accounted to be the fairest flower in their Triumphant Garlands, and of some of their Emperors thought worthy the Residence of their Imperiall Throne.

But first of the Downe-fall of BRITAINE.

BOOKE VII. CHAPTER I.

BRITAINE thus abandoned of all the Romanes, Garrisoned, and emptied of strength, that should haue supported her now down-falling-estate, lay prostrate to confusion and miserable calamities; no lesse burdened with the tumultuous uproares of her owne great men, who stroue for the supreme Government, then of the Barbarous Nations which with continual incursions made spoile where they came. These times (saith Ninius) were full of feares, and were prolonged with forty yeeres afflictions: wherein Vortigern then King was troubled with the violence of the Romans, the dreads of the Picts and Scots, and the oppositions of Aurelius Ambrosius, who furnishing his flaine Parents, that had worn the Imperiall Purple Robe, fought their rvenge vpon their wicked Murderer: besides the Intrusions of the Germane Saxons, called in for Friends, but prooued indeed the greatest Enemies. During the conflict of these tempestuous stormes, some small comforts were ministred vnto the Britanes by Bishop German his presence, who from France assisted them against the Pelagian Heresies, and the perillous assaults of the Scots and Picts, who in diuers skirmishes ouercame them.

(2) These dolorous times of Britanes destruction, Gildas the mournfull Historian, who liued not long after, doth declare. As soone as the Romans (saith hee) had left Britaine, and were returning vnto their home, forthwith hideous multitudes of Scots and Picts came swarming out of their Carraghies, (where with they passed the Sea like whole Armies of dusky vermine), which at high noone, when the Sunne is in his greatest heat, began to crawle forth of their narrow holes an infinite number of hideous Scots and Picts; which two kindes of People, though in conditions somewhat different, yet they co-sorted too well in greedie desire of blood-shed: and hauing intelligence, the associates of Britaine were now returned with utter disclaime of further assistance, with more confident bold. Then enen before, they seize all the Northerne and vntermost part of the Island, as if it had beene their own inheritance, as if it were as the Wall. Against these attempts there were ranged in the high Forts along the Wall, Garrisons of Souldiers, but such as were both slothfull, and also vnseruicable for Martiall Affaires: which white-linced Lozels with quaking hearts late still warding day and night, till their ioints were as benumbed and stupid as the stones whereon they sat: in so much, as the naked Enemies did with long hooked Engines plucke from off the wall these miserable Warders, dashing their bodies against the ground. This good yet they got by this their untimely deaths, that being thus suddenly dispatched out of the world, they escaped the imminent lamentable calamities that their brethren and children shortly felt. To bee short, hauing abandoned their Cities and this high defensive Wall, once more they betooke themselues to flight, and were dispersed in a more desperate manner then enen before. For the enemy was more hot in pursuit, and more cruell in the slaughter, the wofull Inhabitants being by their Enemies massacred, and rent in peeces like Lambes in the hands of bloody Butchers, or in the iawes of cruell and sauage Beasts. In these most miserable times, (necessitie so compelling the poore distressed people forbare not to rob each other of that sustenance, which could helpe them but for a very small season: and so their hostile oppressions were increased by their domestike vexations, for that the whole Countrey by these continuall dreptions, was utterly deprived of the flasse of foode, hauing nothing left to prolong their life, but that only what they got in hunting. Whereupon, about the thirtie nine yeere of Theodosius, and of Christ foure hundred fortie six, the distressed Remaines of the down-cast Britanes addressed their misliue Letters to Actius, whom Gildas calleth Agitus, President of Gallia, in most lamentable manner, and thus inscribed.

To Actius Thrice Consul, the groanes of the BRITANES.

"The Barbarians drine vs backe to the Sea; the Sea againe putteth vs backe vpon the Barbarians: thus betwene two kindes of deaths, we are either slaughtered or drowned. And the more to intinate their mielicies, and to moue his assistance, thus they further vrge: Wee (say they) are the Remnant that suruiue of the Britanes, and are your Subiects, who besides the Enemy, are afflicted

lib. 1. cap. 13.

afflicted by famine and mortallitie, which at this present extreamly rageth in our Land. And putting him in mind that it much importeth the Maiefty of the Roman Empire to protect and succour their Province, seeing it had now stood upon the point of five hundred years vnder their obedience, whose strength of Souldiers taken from thence to ferue their Emperors in their Wars else-where, was now decayed, and their wealths wasted by maintaining their many Legions in their own Land and abroad: All this notwithstanding the Romans either would not, or could not relieue, hauing enough to doe to uphold their owne; but returned them againe with heauy hearts into the hands of their most cruell Enemies, who now knowing themselves free from the Romans interceptions, as a violent flood brake thorow the Prouince, and bare downe all before them, the Inhabitants flying like chafed Deere, some taking our Seas into Britany in France, some to South-wales, North-wales, Cornwall, and parts of Denonshire, leauing the best of the Land to the will of their Persecutors, and much of their Treasures hid in the ground, which neuer after they inioyed.

(4) But the greuous Famine still increasing, though it had this wofull issue with some, that it made them yeeld themselves into the Enemies bloody hands (onely in hope to gaine a little sustenance of food for the present) and for many yeeres after left lamentable tokens (saith Beda) of great defolations wrought by that dearth: yet with those other which were of more noble and resolute spirits it produced a better effect; inasmuch as fied out of the Mountains, Caves, and thicke woods, they assailed their enemies, repoling their trust not in Man, but in God, whose help is then most at hand, when mans helpe faileth. These in many skirmishes gaue them the ouerthrow with much slaughter, and that for many yeeres together, when they made their incursions for booties and spoile; which caused these Raucening Tribes to returne home and the Pits: a while rested from further molestation. Notwithstanding the Britaines returned not from their owne wickednesse, growing strong now daily in repressing the Enemy, but stronger in their owne finnes and euill dispositions. By means whereof, though a surfeate of Hostile Warres was imbraced, and the skarres of famine clearly skinned vp, yet another fore as dangerous as either, secretly bred, and shortly brake forth. For the Land being free from the Enemies wailes, yielded forth plenty and abundance of all things, as the like before no age had seene, and therewithall such riot and excess, that the peoples sins grew to a plentiful harvest, as by the words of Gildas is apparant.

(5) Certainly it is heard (saith he) that there is such fornication, as the like is not among the Gentiles. Truth with the maintainers thereof is hated: Lies with the Forgers thereof highly esteemed. Euill is entertained for good, leandnesse respected more then uprightnesse, darknesse desired before the bright Summe, and Satan accepted for an Angell of light: Kings then were anointed, not according to Gods liking, but such as excelled others in cruelty; and as cruelly againe by their anointed were they murdered, not for any demerit, but that they might advance others more sauaage then the former. If hee were milde, or inclining to truth, the darts of hatred were an euery side lenelled against him, as the only Subuerter of the Britaines Estate. What was pleasing or displeasing to God, was all one with them, sauing that the better things commonly wrought most discontent: so that rightly the saying of the Prophet, which was denounced vnto the people in old time, might bee applied to our Country: Yee lawlesse and corrupt children haue forsaken the Lord, and provoked vnto wrath the holy one of Israel. Why should hee be smitten any more, still multiplying iniquitie? Euery head is sicke, and euery heart is heavy: from the sole of the foot vnto the crowne of the head, there is nothing sound therein. Thus did they all things that were contrary to their sestetie, as if that medicine which was bestowed by that trust Physitian of all, was needlesse for the world. And not only the prophane sort did this, but also the selected stocke of the Lord, and the Shepherds thereof, who ought to haue giuen example to the whole people. To speake of drunkennesse, numbers of them lay senselesse and weltering in wine, swelling with pride, contention, and gripping enuie, putting no difference in iudgement betwene good and euill: inasmuch that it seemeth contempt was poured forth both vpon Princes and people: and all of them seduced by vanities, wandred in errors and by-paths, not leadin the right way. When God therefore was minded to purge his Familie, and to recure them thus infected with the corruptions of finnes, by heare-say only of Tribulation, the winged flight of an often-tried rumour pierced the attentive eares of all men, giuing notice of their ancient Enemies, ready to arrive, and fully minded to destroy them utterly, and to inhabit (as earst they did) the whole Country from one end to another. Yet all this could not reclaim them, but like vnto mad horses, which taking the bit fast betwixt their teeth, runne away with their Riders, so these leauing the way which leadeth (narrow thought bee) vnto saluation, ranne at random in the wide way of all wickednesse, which leadeth directly to death. Whiles therefore (as Salomon saith) the stubborne seruant will not bee amended with words, he is scourged for a foole, and feeleth not the whip: for loe, a pestilent contagion fell heauily vpon this foolish people, which (though the enemies sword was gone) in short space destroyed such multitudes of them, that the liuing were not able to bury the dead. Neither yet also were they thereby bettered, that the saying of the Prophet Esay in them might be fulfilled: God called them to mourning, to baldnesse, and sacke-cloth: but behold, they fell to killing of calves, and to slaying of Rammes; loe, they went to eating and drinking, and said withall, Let vs eat and drinke, for to morrow wee shall die. And indeed the time now drew neere, wherein their iniquities (like as those in times past of the Amorites) should come to the fullnesse. And euen at that instant the like measure beganne to bee heaped vpon the Britaines.

(6) For the common enemy now inuading the Southerne parts, was entred as farre as Stamford vpon the Riuer Welland; to whom to resist, the Britaines assembled together, and hauing experience what ciuill iarres had formerly done, they jointly vnite their meanes and powers, and with one consent elect a King to manage these affaires, which was Vortigern, by birth extracted from the British Line, nobly descended, had not his many vices blemished the fame. The British Historie saith, that hee was Earle of Cornwall, and of great command in the daies of Constantine their King, whose simplicitie hee much abused, and whom lastly hee caused to be murdered by the Guard of his Person, the Scots and Pits by him so placed, and to that end intigatid: whom neuertheless with death hee severely punished, to auoid further suspicion. In whose reuenge, these fierce Nations so assaulted his Dominions with rape and spoile, that hee was forced for further assistance to fend for these Saxons to his aid. Whether thus, or otherwise, most true it is, the Saxons were sent for, and of hoped Friends, became the tried Enemies to the Britaines and their Estates, as out of Gildas their Historian wee shall anon declare.

(7) The occasion and manner of this their inuiting and comming is set downe by a Countryman of their owne Witichindus, a Writer of good antiquity, who thus relateth the circumstance thereof. Britaine (saith he) by Vespasian the Emperour, long since being reduced among the Roman Prouinces, and held in their subiection, stood them in no small stead: but their Legions abandoned, and destitute (as it seemeth) determining the downfall, became soone assaulted by their neighbour Nations the Northerne Borderers. For the people of Rome after that the Emperour Martiall was slaine by his Souldiers, being tired out with forraigne wars, were not able to asist their friends with supply of accustomed aides. And yet had they built a mighty peece of worke for the defence of the Country, reaching betwene the confines from Sea to Sea, where it was thought that the Enemies would assaile the Inhabitants left in the Land. But no difficulty it was for them so fiercely bent, and euer ready to make war (especially where they dealt with a Nation feeble and left vnable to make resistance) to destroy the said worke. Therefore hearing of the worthy and fortunate exploits atchieved by the Saxons, they sent an humble Embassage to require their aid; and these hauing audience, spake as followeth.

"Most noble Saxons, the poore and distressed Brites, outworne and tired by the many incursions of their enemies, hearing the fame of thole victories of which you haue most valiantly obtained, haue sent vs Suppliants vnto you, craving that you would not deny them your helpe and succour. A large and spacious Land they haue, plentiful and abundant in all things, which wee yeeld wholly to be at your deuotion and command. Hitherto wee haue liued freely vnder the patronage and protection of the Romans, next vnto whom wee know not any more powerfull then your selues; and therefore wee seeke for refuge vnder the wings of your valour. So that we may by your puilliance be superiour of our enemies, whatsoeuer seruice you shall impose vpon vs, that will we willingly abide.

To this petition the Peeres and Nobles of the Saxons briefly made answer in this wise.

"Know yee that the Saxons will bee fast friends vnto the Brites, and ready at all times both to asist them in their necessitie, and also to procure their wealth: with ioy therefore retorne yee Ambassadors, and with this witheld-for tidings make your Country-men glad. Heereupon (according to promise) an Armie sent into Britaine, and ioyfully received, which in short time freed the Land from the spoiling enemies, & recovered the country vnto the behoof of the Inhabitants.

(8) But how true this last clause is, may appeare out of the ancient Gildas, who thus recordeth it: To repress (saith hee) many Inuasions of those their ancient enemies, which with cruell slaughters and booties continually afflicted them, the Britaines fell to consult vpon some convenient course therein to be taken. Lastly, all the Counsellors, together with the proud Tyrant, being blinded in iudgement, deuised such a protection, as in the end proued their Countries destruction; namely, that those fierce Saxons, a people sauaage and of hatefull name, odious both to God and man, should be let into this Land, as it were wolues into sheepe-folds, to repulse (forsooth) the Northerne Nations; then which proiect doublet nothing was euer more pernicious and vnhappie vnto this Land. O senselesse and plunged into deepest mists of error! O desperate dulnesse, and blinde blacknesse of minde! Those whom in absence were feared more then death, now of their owne accord are inuited by these Princes of Egypt (if I may so say, thus sottishly counselling their Pharaos) to come and rest with them vnder one roofe. Presently out of the Denne of that barbarous Lionsse rushed forth a kennell of her whelpes, in three long Vessels, called in their Language Cynule, carried vnder full saile, and with ominous presages fore-prophecying that for 300. yeeres they should possess that Land vnto which they then directed their course, and for halfe of that space, (viz. one hundred and fiftie yeeres) they should waste and depopulate the same. These being put on shore first in the East part of the Island, and that by Commandement of this unfortunate Tyrant, there set fast their terrible paves, pretending to the Landers, defense of their Country, but more truly intending the destruction of them. The foresaid Lionsse finding that her first troupe of whelpes did so well, sends againe a greater Rabble of the same Litter, which beere arrived in Flotes, bringing with them some other Associates of baslardy and vnnoble brood. And these beginnings, the slips of iniquitie, and the roots of bitternesse, (an accursed plantation well besetting our demerits) haue sprung up, and put forthin our Ioyle their haughtie boughes and spreading branches. This barbarous Nation thus admitted, professing themselves our Souldiers, and such as would endure all hazards (so they fained) in defense for their good Hoists, first they craned supple of victuals onely; which being giuen them, for some time stopped (as we may say) the Dogs mouth: howbeit, after ward they complaine that their wages was not bountifully enough paid, deuising of purpose colourable occasions of quarrell, and threatening that vntill they might haue more munificent entertainment, they would with the breach of conuenant spoile and waste the whole Land. And without further delay, they second these threats with deeds (for our Sinnes, the cause of deferred reuenge, were full nourished) and the fire kindled Eastward, was set a flaming by these sacrilegious men from Sea to Sea, ceasing not to consume all the Cities and Countries bordering thereabout, vntill such time, as burning wheree all the Inland Soile of the Land, itlicked (as it were) with the red tongue of the flame the very Westerne Ocean it selfe. In this violent inuasion, comparable to that of the Assyrians against the Land of Israel in old times, is historically fulfilled also in vs that which the Prophet by way of sorrowfull lamentation uttereth: They haue set fire vpon thy holy places, and haue burned thy dwelling place of thy name, euen vnto the ground. And againe: O God the Heathen are come into thine heritage, thy holy Temple haue they defiled: for all the Fortifications demolished with their Engines, and the Inhabitants together with the Bishops of the Church, and also the Priests and people, with glittering swords and crackling flames, were all at once laid along vpon the ground, yea and (which was a most lamentable spectacle) the stately Towers, high mounted Walls, and the sacred Altars, lay all tumbling together (all purpled with the broken and bloody Quarters and gored Carcasses mixed as in a horrible wine-press). Neither were there any other Sepulchers abroad, save the ruines of buildings, and the bowels of wilde beasts and birds.

(9) During this most wofull, desperate, and tempestuous season (saith the mournfull Historian) some poore Remaines of Britaines being found in the Mountains, were slaine by whole heapes: others pined by famine, came and yeelded themselves vnto their enemies, vpon composition to serue them as Bond-slaves for euer, so they might not bee slaughtered out of hand: which granted, was reputed a most high and especiall grace. Others went ouer Seas into Strange Lands, singing vnder their spread Sailes with a lamentable and mourning note, that of the Psalmist: Thou hast giuen vs, O Lord, as Sheepe to bee deuoured, and hast scattered vs among the Heathen. Yet others remained still in their owne Country (albeit in fearefull estate, and continually suspecting hazard) committing their lines and safetie to the high steepe Hilles, to cragie Mountaines naturally intrenched, to thicke growne Woods and Forrests, yea and to the Rocks of the Sea.

(10) Thus was Britaine brought to the period of her glory, and the people miserably subiect to a forraigne Nation, about the yere from Christs Nativity 473. and after the Romans last farewell 28. In which time you see they were most cruelly purged with all calamities of warre, and lastly betrayed by them in whom so much trust was reposed, as mournfull Gildas hath ruefully declared.

CHAPTER II.

S times decayed Ruines have topped the Passage of those small Springs issued from the first fountaine of Nations beginnings, and haue diuerted their streames far from any sure Course, or certaine known Heads; so the originall parent, place, and name of our English-Saxons, haue bin writtē with a pen of slight touch vpon the leaues of obliuion, or else recorded in those obscure Routes, that as yet lie bound vp in the Office of Times forgetfulness: whereby it rests doubtfull from what root these branches first sprang; some bringing them from Asia, some from Africa, some from Maecdon, some from Denmarke, and some without all likelihood from Britaine it selfe.

these of ours. Of these Saxa, Strabo writeth that they made inuasions into Countries lying farre off, as namely Armenia, where they left the memory of their successe in a part of that Country, by calling it Saccena, after their owne name.

(4) From these parts of Asia, as Scythia and the rest, one Band of them, consisting chiefly of their Youth, proceeded by degrees into Europe, and possessed the Nesse, or Forland, which the Romans called Cimbria Cherfonesus, being at this day the continent part of the kingdom of Denmarke. In which place they were first knowne by the name of the Saxons. And here also they among themselves beganne first to be distinguished into other Tribes, as Holt-Saxons (for so Verflegan, out of their old Chronicle, faith they were called) for their keeping in the Woods: but more properly (wee may say) into Saxons, Angles, and Iutes. From hence afterwards they departed, and passing ouer the Riuer Elbe, diuided themselves into two Companies; whereof the one taking into the vpper parts of Germany, by little and little intruded themselves into the ancient Seat of the Sueuians, which now of them is called Westphalia and Saxony; and the other inroched vpon Friseland and Holland (then called Batania) with the rest of those Countries that lie along the German Seas.

(5) The time wherein these Saxons should thus inleat Germany, by Occa Scarleus veridit, is as ancient as great Alexander: others account it long after, in the raigne of Tiberius. But before Ptolomie we finde them not mentioned by any Author, who flourished in the daies of Antoninus Pius, about the yeere from Christis Natiuitie 140. And most certaine it is by Eutropius and Beda, that before the yeere three hundred, when Droeflan (swaied the Roman Scepter, the Saxons out of Cimbria Cherfonesus fore offended the coasts of Britaine and France, with their many piracies, and were fearfull enen to the Romans themselves. These multiplying in number and strength, seated in the Maritime tract of Intland, Sleswick, Holsatia, Ditmarse, Breme, Oldenburgh, all Frisland and Holland: and indeed, according to the Testimonie of Fabius Quesitor, wholly all the Sea coasts from the riuer Rhene vnto the Citie Donia, which now is commonly called the Denmarc; and with him Henry of Erford affirmeth Saxon-Land to stretch from the Riuer Albis vnto the Rhene; the bounds of no one people of all the German extending any way so far, faith he.

(6) But these spreading Boughes, are brought by others from a neerer Roote, planted not in Asia or Scythia, but rather in Europe and in Germanie it selfe; grounding their opinion from Cornelius Tacitus, who maketh them to be bred in the same Country, though distinguished by Name from the rest, as others more beside then were. Which Saxons (say they) though they were not mentioned by Tacitus in his Description of Germanie, yet in Ptolemy, that wrote not much about fortie yeeres after him, they are named; as also the Guta, and the Angli, Copartners of their Conquest, Tacitus placeth among these Germanes that worhipped Herthum the Mother-earth for their Auourie Goddess; at first but one People, but afterwards diuided into three severall Tribes; that is, the Saxons, Angles and Iutes, who left the remembrance of their Names stamped (as it were) in the soile from whence

(7) Ptolemy, among the Sueuians in Germanie placeth the Saxons, neere to the mouth of the Riuer Albis, in the continent of Cimbria Cherfonesus. And in this Iland of Britaine, Beda telles vs, that the Kingdomes of the East and West Saxons were of them peopled: Whole originall Name, besides the Indian Saxo or the Scythian Saxa, some will haue Etymologed from Saxuma Stone, because forthwith these people were hard or Stone-hearted; and some againe from the Axones in Gallia, of whom Lucan maketh mention in this his verse:

Longis piceis Axones in armis,
And nimble Axones in their Armour light.

(8) Iustus Lipsius coniectureth, and Engelhusius affirmeth (as Verflegan faith) that the name Saxon, tooke the appellation from the Fashion of the weapon that vsuallie they wore; which was a Crooked Bowing Sword, somewhat like vnto a Sithe, with the edge on the contrary side, called by the Netherlanders, a Sai-fa, and by themselves Saxen, and the shorter of like fashion for hand-weapons, Seaxes; such as were those that were hid vnder their Garments in the Massiere of the British Nobilitie vpon Salisbury Plaine, when Henric gaue the watch-word, Nem eour Seaxes, that is, Take you Swords: three of which Knies Argent, in a Field Gules, were borne by Erkenwyne King of the East-Saxons, vpon his shield of Armes, as some of our Heralds haue imblazed. And that their Name was so giuen them from their Weapons, some allege their accustomed manner in wearing thereof, which vsuall was to trusse the same ouerthwart their backs when they went forth to battle; whereby notice was taken, and that name attributed vnto them, as the like hath been vpon like occasion vnto others: for so in Asia the Scythians were named for their skill in shooting; in France the Picards for their long Pikes vsed in fight; and in Ireland the Galloglaifes, which bare the Pollax as their principall weapon: and of latter times, vpon lesse occasions haue Surnames growne both to particular men, as also to whole Societies; which may appeare in such as haue vowed their voyage and seruice for Ierusalem, were continually vpon their backs a red Croffe, whereby the name Croffe-backe, or in old English, Cronch-backe, was to them attributed: in which ranke, Edmund Earle of Lancaster (second sonne to King Henry the third) was a principall, and thereby got that name, which he could not claw off from his backe euer since. So likewise those men who entred that Religion of Monasticall life, were vsuall vpon the outside of their Garments the signe of a Croffe, whereby that Order was distinguished and noted from others by the name of Cronched or Croffed-Friers. But whence or howsoeuer the name arose, among all the Germanes there were none in reputation for militarie deeds comparable vnto these Saxons: neither had any aduentured by Sea and Land so farre to purchase renowne and praise, or perhaps (and that more likely) to supply their owne wants; ranging often from place to place, as men alwaies ready to enter any action: and in Germanie to this day a great Dukedome retaineth from them the name of Saxony.

(9) The Gute (no doubt the Iute) Ptolomie likewise placeth in the Iland Scandia, lying very neere the Coasts of Germanie, vpon whose vttermost Promontorie (as faith an ancient Manuscript) the Iutes did for certaine inhabit, which vnto this day of the Danes is called Intland. These Iutes, Gutes, Getes, or Goths (or as Beda calles them) Vites, gaue names to those parts of Britaine which they inhabited, as to this day the Ile of Wight beareth their impression. This variety of names we will no further inforce, then that these Gotes were not the same that had passed Ither by Pontus Euxinus, and ouer-ran Europe, who were also called the Getae by Iohn Maior. Their name, as Verflegan will haue it, was taken from their agility, or swiftnesse of foot: and some of them (as Sebastianus Munster declareth) went

(10) The Angles (by Fabius Quesitor Ethelwardus, an ancient Writer, and a Noble Perion of the Saxons Royall Bloud) are brought from Ould-Anglia, a Portion lying betwixt the Countries of the Saxons and the Gjots, as he writteth them, whose chiefe Towne was by them called Sleswic, and of the Danes, Haithby: but (more particularly) it lay betwixt the Citie Flemburge and the Riuer Sth, which Country by Albertus Crantzius is called Anglia. From hence (saith Henricus Rantzoni) the Saxons, who were also called the Longobards and Sueuians, went to aid the Britaines. And at this day there is a little Prouince in the Kingdom of Dania, named Angell, beneath the Citie Flemburge, which Lindebergus calleth Little Anglia. Their site notwithstanding is placed by most Authours in Westphalia, where the Citie Engern standeth, and where Tacitus and Ptolemy rangeth them among the Tuantes; which in their times might very well be. Others would haue them in Pomerania, where the Towne Engelen doth somewhat found their name: so doe Engelheim, Engleburg, and Engelente, places in Germanie, beare witness, and are prints of their footing among the Longobards and Sueuians. But the most glorious remembrance of that their name hath bene for these many ages in this Kingdom of England: though Saxo Grammaticus (as erit we touched, lib. 3. cap. 2) will needs haue Anglia named from Angul the sonne of Humbius, and Giant-like brother of Danuis the first King of Denmarke. But Albertus Crantzius being offended at his folly, telles him that England had the name of Britaine many hundred yeeres after that Angul was dead. Others there are that deriue the name England from the manner of this Ilands situation, being narrow in the West and North, for that Eng in the ancient Teutonic Tongue, as well as in the moderne, doth signifie Narrow, Strait, or a Nooke; and to that purpose doe produce this verse of a Portugall allusion:

Anglia terra ferax et fertilis Angulus Orbis, Insula preclues, qua toto vix eget orbe:

A fruitful Angle, England thou, another world art said:
An Iland rich, and hast no need of other countries aid.

(11) Calpine without prooffe deriue the Name from Queen Angula: but on as weak a ground as those who will fetch it from their Angel-like faces, alluded vnto by Pope Gregory the Great. Or that of Goropius, from the Angle or Fishing-hooke, because, faith he, they hooked all things to themselves, and might vnder well therefore be called Good Anglers: a very meane conceit in sooth. But howsoeuer, most certaine it is that these Angles stole the name of this blessed Iland from their elder brethren the Saxons (as Iacob did the birth-right from Efus) and called it after their owne; as wee shall further shew when our Historie hath gotten to the age of the Saxons Monarchie.

(12) These all claime their descents from Prince Woden, called by the ancient Latines Othinnus and who is deduced by our Antiquaries, as hath bene said, from the eldest Sonne of the Patriarke Nath, and is accounted the most noble of all the Progenitors of the Saxon Kings, insumch as they, and especially the Angle-Saxons, our Ancestors, haue (in their superstitious conceit of such woddish gods) imagined Woden to be their principall God of Battell; whose Wife named Frea, was by the like fancie held a Goddess; of whom more hereafter.

(13) These had issue between them sundry Sons, and from sue of them, all the Monarchs of the English-men haue claimed to haue bene descended. Wechta the first being reported to be the Progenitor to the Kings of the Kentishmen: Caser the second, to the Kings of the East-Angles: Wethelgeat the third, to the Kings of the Mereians: Wegdeg the fourth, to the Kings of the Dierians: and Beldeg the fifth, to the Kings of the

the South-Saxons, to the Kings of the Bernicians, afterwards Kings of Northumberland; and also the Kings of the West-Saxons: only the Kings of the East-Saxons, claiming to descend of the same race, deride not their defections from any of the Sonnes of the same men. This may suffice for the Originals of these three people; who, as Cisner affirmeth, retained still the same manners after they were seated in Europe, as they had formerly done in Asia. And what those were, let vs heare the reports of Tacitus, and other ancient Authors, who together with the Germans (among whom they dwelled) doe thus describe them.

THE MANNERS AND CUSTOMES OF THE ANCIENT SAXONS.

CHAPTER III.

These Germans, and among them the Catti and Suetons, (our Ancestors according to Albertus Cranzius) were a people (saith Tacitus) well set, sterner of countenance, tall of stature, gray eyed, and of a fire aspell, and their haire yellow.

Vnto whom, Witichindus the Monke addeth and saith, that They were faire of complexion, cheerfull of countenance, very comely of stature, and their limbes to their bodies well proportioned, bold of courage, hardy in fight, and very ambitious of glory: for which parts (saith he) the Franks had them in great admiration, and wondered at their new and strange attire, their armour and their busbie lockes of haire, that from their heads ouer-spread their shoulders, but about all at their constant resolution and valiant courage. Their heads and beards they suffer (saith Tacitus) to grow at length, and neuer put off that vowed ornament and bond of valour, vntill they haue slaine an Enemy: but then vpon blood and spoile, they encounter their forehead, and say they haue paid backe the price of their birth, and thinke themselves worthy of their Country and parents. Their curled lockes (saith he) they binde up in knots, and standing on end, tie it in the crayne oyle, that is the baywolfe care they haue of beantie, to seeme more terrible to the Enemy. And by Sidonius Apollinaris his testimony, they vied to haue off the haire of their heads, reseruing onely a tuft in the crowne, about which they wore a hoope or plate of copper, which cauled the haire to stand vp right, as by these his verses appeareth.

*Isle Saxona ceruolum videmus, Adiectum ante Salo, solum timeret:
Cuius verticis extinguitur per ora,
Non contenta suos tenere morfus,
At lat lamina mygem comarum:
Et sic crinibus additem reuicis
Decrescit caput, additurq; vultus.*

In English thus:

There doe we see the Saxons clad in blew,
Bold on the Sea, but fearefull now on land:
Their beighted tops vpon their crownes that shew,
Are not content to hold their wanted band,
But raise in tufts, where all the rest, doth stand Bare naked shew'd, and bath no haire at all,
Which makes full face'd, but heads seeme passing small.

(2) And that they wereindeede bold vpon the Seas, Agrippinus witnesseth. The Saxons (saith hee) a most valorous kinde of men, excell all others in Piracies. In imitation of whom, Isidore affirmeth, that for their valour and nimblenes in seruice they had their name. A people (saith he) stout, hardie, and most valiant, and farre out-stripping all others in Piracies, seemed more fearefull to lue on Land then at Sea. Whole intrusions and sudden violence both France and Britaine with great damages felt: for in Gallia they seized into their possession the Country of Baioacses, as is to be scene in Gregorius Turonensis, who thence termeth them Saxones Baioacses: and in Britaine an Office of Charge was instituted to defend the Coasts from their irruptions, the Capitaine whereof was commonly called the Count or Earle of the Saxon Shoure: of whose Piracies and savage Cruelties, let vs heare Sidonius in his Epistle to Numantius complaine: So many Rovers as you see (saith he) so many Arsh-Pirates thinke you behold, they all of them together so command, obey, teach and learne, to rob and steale. There is no enemy so cruell as this, that setteth vpon others at vnawares, and as occasion serues, as warily slips himselfe away. Hee setteth at nought such as encounter him: hee bringeth to nought those that take no heed of him: whom he couerth, hee surely ouertaketh: when hee flieth, hee is sure to scape. To this seruice, Shipwrackes inure him, they terrifie him not. Be there a Tempest vpon the same serueth them, and to a safe others. They neuer weigh Ancour vpon the enemies Coasts, but with a resolution againe to returne: and their manner is to kill euery tenth Captiue with a lingering and dolorous torment: for to such Vowes they binde themselves, and with such Sacrifices they discharge their Vowes againe, being indeed not so much purified by such Sacrifices, as polluted with Sacrilege: and the bloody and abominable Murders thinke it a religious thing, rather to torment a Prisoner vnto death, then to set him free for a Ransome.

But when wee shall heare these vnhumane and barbarous reports either of the old Britains or these savage Saxons our ancient Progenitors, let vs neither be offended at Gildas, or at the reports of these other forrain Writers, who spake thus of them as they were then Heathens, and knew not God: the time of whose ignorance seeing God regarded not, as the Apostle teacheth, let vs acknowledge with due thanks the goodness of a most gracious God, who hath brought vs to a holier conuerfation, and hath made vs Iudges of those finnes in them, that we might flie them in our selues.

(3) Their Apparell was much different from others, and seemed strange to the Gauls, as Witichindus hath told vs: and Tacitus declareth the manner thereof; which (saith he) was a kinde of Casiocke, called Sagum, clasped, or (for want of a claspe) fastned with a thorn, hauing otherwile no garments at all, but going stark naked. Neuertheless, the richer sort were distinguished from others, by their garments; which were neither large nor wide, as the Sarmates and Parthians use to wear them; but strait and shewing the proportion of euery part of their bodie: besides they wore Pelts made of beasts skins. The Man and Womens attire differed in nothing, saith he, sauing that the women wore linnen Garments trimmed and interlaced with purple, and without sleeves, their armes bare, and bosomes naked and vncouered. Yet Paulus Diaconus speaking of the Longobards, comparing them to the Saxons, saith that their Casiocks were large and worse loose, most of linnen, trimmed and set out with very broad Gards or welts perfect, and embroidered with sundry colours, and the richer sort with Pearles: their haire bound up in a copper hoope, stood in tufts vpon the crowne, the rest curled and falling downe vpon their shoulders: their beards they kept still vment, till they had killed an enemy; and for another note of ignominie, they wore an Iron Ring, as a signe of bondage, till they had cast it from them by the Conquest of a Man. Great Knives, or rather broad bending Swords, they trusted vpon little Shields thwart their backs, from which (as we shewed) Engelhusius auoucheth they had their appellation. Hee that abandoned or lost this shield in battle (saith Tacitus) was debarred from their publicke Sacrifices and Assemblies, the greatest disgrace that could be; for very shame and griefe whereof, many many times hanged themselves. And vpon these Shields their manner was to lift vp their new elected Generall, and with acclamations so to carrie him thorow their Campe.

(4) For Warres, the Germans by Tacitus are reputed the best, who for two hundred and tenyeres held tack with the Romans. Not the Samites (saith he) not the Carthaginians, not the Spaniards, or the Gallies, no not the Parthians haue so much troubled vs: for what can the East obiect against vs, sauing the death of Craffus, when hee had defeated Pacorus, before trodden downe by Ventidius? But the Germans hauing either slaine or taken Carbo, and Cassius, and Scaurus Aurelius, and Seruilus Cepio, and M. Manlius, haue defeated also sue Consularie Armies, and Varus with three Legions in Cassars time. Neither haue C. Marius in Italie, or Iulius in Gallia, Druusus or Nero, and Germanicus molested them at home in their Country, but to their more smart. And yet these Saxons among those valiant Germans were accounted the best for courage of minde, strength of body, and enduring of trauell, as Zosimus saith. Terrible also they were, and full of agilitie, by the report of Orosius: and for their sudden inuasions, most feared of the Romans, saith Marcellinus.

(5) Their fashion was to goe forth singing to the Warres, (or rather they especially are said to march to battle, whereas others are said to goe) carrying before them certaine Images taken out of their consecrated Woods. Their manner was before they ioined Battle, to trie by single Combat (therein arming one of their own against some captiue enemy) what successe was to be expected: and this they kept as a Law vniuoluate, that none might presume to beare Armes before hee was solemnly admitted, where in a frequent Assemblie a Shield was giuen him by his Parents or Kindred: and this was the pledge (as it were) of his first honour, he being till then reputed but a particular of a Familie, but thenceforward a member of the Common-wealth. They are very sensible, wise and considerate in their seruice, in preferring choice Captaines, in following their Leaders, in observing their ranks, in taking the advantage and benefit of the day, and intrenching in the night, holding Fortune euer doubtfull, but valour alwaies certaine. Their weapons, as testifieth Ioannes Pomarius, were long Speares, broad Swords, and the Crof-bow: these they held in such esteeme, that with a horse furnished, shield, sword, and Lance, their Virgins were receiued in marriage, accounting them for the greatest bonds, and the very Patron-Gods of Matrimony: which custome might well bee taken from their neighbours the ancient Saracens, whose Maidens usually presented to their husbands a Tent and a Speare, in way of Dowrie at the entrance of their Nuptials. And among these Germans those Martiiall habiliments were in such vfe, that they did meet neither at Feasts nor in Council, but in their Armour.

A People (saith Tacitus) whom thou canst not so easily persuade to manure the ground, as to provoke the Enemy, and adventure wounds, holding small esteeme of that which is gotten by the sweat of their browes, when it might haue been obtained by the expense of their blood. A strange diuersitie (saith he) that the same men should so much loue sloth, and hate quietnesse. It is with them a great shame for their Prince to be ouercome in Valour; but for any one to returne alius from that Battell wherein the Prince is slaine, a perpetuall infamie and reproach. And that their resolutions were euer noble, and their courage not daunted in distresse or bondage, it well appeared by a whole band of them taken by Symachus, and designed for the Romans pastime of Sword-playes, who the same morning that this spectacle was expected, frangled themselves rather then they would incurre such infamie and basenesse, as to make others pastime with the ignominious vlsage of their owne persons.

(6) Their Lawes were seuer, and vices not laughed at, and good Customes of greater authority among them, then elsewhere were good Lawes; no temporising for siner, nor vsury for gaine; but bounteous in hospitality, and liberal in gifts, accounting both due to bee giuen and receiued, yea and that without thanks: no Nation freer from adulterie, or punishing that sinne more severely. For the woman offending, hauing first her haire cut off, was turned stark naked out of her Husbands house, and that in presence of her owne kindred; thence she was scourged with whips thorow the Towne, without regard of birth, beauty, age, or wealth, and neuer after could finde another Husband. Those that were vnaturally leand of their bodies, their manner was to drowne them in filthy mud, and to coner them with hurdles. Yea and greater punishments then these the Pagan Saxons executed vpon such offenders, as by the Epistle of Boniface an English-man, Arch-bishop of Magunce, which he wrote vnto Ethelbald King of the Mercians, in reproaching his adulterous life, is manifest. For (saith hee) in the ancient Country of the Saxons (where there was no knowledge of God) if either a Maid in her fathers house, or one hauing a husband, became a whore, shee should bee frangled with her owne hands cloed to her month, and the Corruptor should be hanged vpon the Pit wherein she was buried. If she were not so fed, then her Garments being cut away downe from the Girdle-steel, the chaste Matrons did scourge and whip her, and did prick her with knives, and so was she sent from Towne to Towne, where other fresh and new scourges did meet and torment her vnto death.

And their seuer Lawes a long time remaining in the daies of Christianitie, doe declare with what rigor (without regard of person) they both examined and punished this offense: whereof that of Queene Emma, the mother of King Edward the Confessor, is a sufficient example, who being accused for incontinencie of body with Alwyn Bishop of Winchester, was inioined to passe ouer nine Plough-share frowns glowing red hot, the being blind-fold and bare-footed; by which triall shee is said to haue acquitted her selfe, in somuch that hauing passed them all before shee knew it, cried and said: O good Lord, when shall I come to the place of my purgation? This punishment beginning in these Pagans, and continuing vnto the yere 750. Stephen the Second, and most pontificall Pope of Rome, did vtterlie abolish, as too seuer and ouer-rigorous for Christians to vndergoe.

The Virgins of these Saxons were neuer to bee married but once, that they might haue no other thoughts, nor further desire but in case of matrimony: neither had the men pluralitie, excepting great Personages, and they sued vnto in regard of procreation, for to be without Children, was to be without reputation. So that the testimony of Salimanns, which liued among them, fitteth well our purpose, saying: I though the Saxons are outrageous in cruelty, yet for chastity they are to be honoured.

(7) But as in these vertues they out-stripped most Pagans; so in the Zeale of their heathenish superstitions and Idolatrous seruice, they equalized any of them: for besides Herthus, the Mother-Earth, whom the Angli our auncetors accounted for a Goddess of Aide: they worshipped Mercurie vnder the name of Hhh 1 Woden

Leopards, which by Richard Cordelion King of England was given vnto his ancestor Henry the Lion, Duke of Saxony, who had married Mathilda the said Kings sister, and by the Emperour Frederic Barbarossa had been bereft of his Armes, and Titles of honor. Moreouer, Charles Emmanuel the now Duke of Saunoy, who is lineally descended from the ancient Princes of the chiefe house of Saxony, by Prince Beral, who came out of Saxony into Saunoy in the yeere of our Lord 998. and was the third sonne of Hugh Duke of Saxony, which Hugh was brother vnto the Emperour Otto the Third, doth yet beare for one of his Coats the said Leaping Horse.

(7) This Hengist was doubtlesse a Prince of the chieft blood and Nobilitie of the Saxons, and by birth, of Angria in Westphalia, wherein vnto this day a place retaineth the name of Hengist-holt. Hee with his brother were the sonnes of one Wihgisl, whose father was Witla, and his father Vella the eldest sonne of Yodenas, Beda writes him, of whose issue many Kings of sundry Prouinces (saith he) had their originall.

Hee growne now into high fauour with the King, by the marriage of Rowena, and feared of the Nobility for his strength and policie, bare himselfe great a-mongall, and his supplies daily arriuing, peltred (if it not plagued) most parts of this Land. For saith Ni-nias, and Beda, the riches of Britaine, and the fertilitie of the soyle, were such motives to their conuents and aspiring minde, that where they got footing, there they kept stand-ing, and picked occasions where they were too strong. Among the that were sent for, by the aduice of Hengist, two principall Captaines, Ofta and Elfric were chiefe, who being embarked in forty Pinnaces, sailed about the Pits Coasts, waiting the Isles that were called the Orades, and got many Countries from them beyond the Frib, whereby a further terror was stricken into the Brittaines hearts.

(8) The Nobilitie perceiving what was in work-ing, and the marke whereto Hengist let his eie to aime, complained to the King of their dangerous estate, shewing themselves agreed to be disposed of Offices and Charge, (as Gaunor the Earle or Licutenant of Kent, by Hengist had bene) the Land peltred with strangers, that sought their subuersion; reproo-ving him much for his match with that Infidel Rowena, his owne carelesse government and adulterous life, and in such manner, that Voderne Archbishop of London, a man of great sanctitie, feared not to tell him that thereby he had endangered both his soule and Crowne, which words by Vortigern were so digested, that thorow-lye it cost the good Archbishop his life. But hee still continuing in his lasciuious and carelesse idleness, was lastly taught by wofull experience, what miserie wilfull rashnesse and neglected government do bring: for the Brittaines his subjects no longer would be thus abused, to see themselves wouen into greater danger by the of defence, then they formerly had bene by the hostilitie of the enemies; but forthwith disclaimed their obedience to the King, when he had raigned the space of fix yeeres, and chose for their Gouverneur his sonne young Vortigern.

(9) His Sonne hee was indeed by nature, but not his in conditions, who (besides the quarrell of his Queene mother for Rowena sake reiecte) bare an inward loue to his native Country, and an outward hate to the strangers that daily sought the subuersion thereof, and presently encountered with them in a pitched Battell neere vnto Ailsford in Kent, wherein Catigern and Horsa, brethren to Vortigern and Hengist, in single fight hand to hand slew each other.

In which place Catigern was buried, and a Monu-ment in memory of him erected: the stones whereof to this day appeare, and stand vpon a great plaine in the Parish of Ailsford, and from Catigern as yet is corruptly called Ciss-Cotthoufe. The like Monu-ment the Saxons built for Horsa, which time hath now defaced, and wherof Beda maketh mention, who saith, that a tombe bearing his name was in his daies to be seene in the East part of Kent. The credit wherof is continued to this day, where the Village Horsed is reported to haue receiued that name from him, which standeth in the very same place where that Battell was fought, as the Inhabitants report.

(10) Three other Battles after this with variable successe were fought betwixt the Brittaines and the Saxons, one at Crasford, another at Weppled-fleet, and the third vpon Colmore; in which last the Brittaines bare themselves so valiantly, that the Saxons were driuen into the Isle of Tanes (if not ouer the seas) so that small hope refted for them so long as this valiant Vortigern liued, who had dispossessed them of all their footing in the Continent, and often assailed them in Tanes, as Fabian saith. After this Victorie long hee liued not, but was made away by poison through the means of Rowena the mother of all this mischief, when he had late King the space of foure yeeres; and the father againe reestablished.

(11) Vortigern now was no sooner reftored, but that Hengist had notice thereof, who was then in building a Castle at Leiden in Holland, as their Annales doe witness, and John Douja in his verses specifie: where leaving all (as it were) at random, returned to follow his fortunes further in Britaine, and with a mighty Armie of his Saxons thought to land without im-pachment: but the Brittaines growne bold by their former victories, and their blood not cooled since it was heat in fight, admonished their reestablished King, who with them went to withstand his arriuage. When Hengist therefore perceiued their courage, and knew their hatreds to him and his Saxons, hee sought by smooth words to gaine the shoare; and by some stratagem, his wished desire: therefore pretending only to visit his daughter, yea and to rid the Land of her, if so he might haue leaue of the King and them; and therefore desired a conference in friendly manner: after which, his Saxons should depart the Land, and rest the like friends to the Brittaines as they were when first they came in.

(12) This motion seemed reasonable to the No-bilitie, and the place and time appointed, which was the first of May, and vpon the Plaine of Ambrij, now called Salisbury: whither vpon equall tearmes (as was thought) each partie repaired, and a while conferred with friendly semblances; but in the end the Saxons vrging their wrongs, fel from words into blowes, the watch-word first giuen by Hengist their Leader. The Brittaines meant simply, and were no weapons, accord-ing to covenants; but the Saxons vnder their long Caf-focks had short Skaines hid, with which, no sooner the words, Nem eowr Seaxes, were pronounced, but that each slew him with whom hee conferred, by which treason the Brittaines lost three hundred of their disar-med Nobilitie, onely Eldol Duke of Gloucester, as Ran-dolph Higden declareth, with a Stake gotten from the hedge, slew fouenteene Saxons. The King they tooke prisoner; for whose ranfome, the Countries of Kent, Suffex, Suffolke, and Northfolke, were deliuered vnto these Infidels, who shortly defiled the beauty of Chri-stianitie with their Paganisme and heathenish cruelties. Then (saith Beda) the fire of Gods vengeance was kindled by these wicked Conquerors, and raged first vpon those Countries next adioyning, and afterwards from the East Sea vnto the West, without resistance made to quench the same, publike and priuate houses were overthrowne and laied leuell with the ground, Priests were slaine standing at the Altars, and Bishops with their flocks were murdered; neither was there any to bury the dead. And these are the times wherof we speake, and wherein the miserable Brittaines abandoned the Land or hid themselves in caues, wherein they either perished for hunger, or re-deemed their liues with perpetual slavery.

(13) Neither were their calamities greater in out-ward afflictions then their soules, polluted with the heresie of the Pelagians, brought by Agricola, the Son of Seuerianus a Pelagian Bishop, that did foulely cor-rupt the faith of the Brittaines: to redresse which, Ger-manus Ambrosius, and Lupus Bishop of Treves in France, were by the brethren desired, and sent vnto their their thus troubled and declining estate. These pil-lars of Gods truth, after they had powred forth pra-ers, and conuicted the Heretikes, lead an Armie of Brittaines against the Picts and Saxons, and gained the victorie; after which (like vnto people that drew on Gods vengeance and their owne destructions) they fell to robberies and rapine, one Citie banding against another, and all laied waste by the Saxons and them-selves. These miseries doth Gildas impute to haue hapned to his Brittaines, because they tooke no care to preach the Gospell of Christ vnto those Infidels the English-Saxons, that in their heathenish cruelties fought the Lands destruction.

(14) Vortigern thus dispossessed, for his further securitie betooke himselfe into Wales, where among those vast Mountaines hee built a strong Castle, of whose foundation, Merlin the Welsh Wizard, with the future successe that should afterward follow the Bri-ttaines, haue by way of prophesie vainly spoken. This Castle most of our Writers haue said to be in South-Wales, vpon a rockie and solitarie mountaine called Breigh, or after others Cloarie, in the West of that Pro-vince, not farre from Radnor, and neere vnto the Ri-uer Gnana: but the inhabitants of North-Wales report (by the reports of their ancestors) that in old Bethke-lerit was that Castle, which Vortigern built, and is yet called Embris, from Merlin Embris, as they affirme. And surely (besides the craggie and solitarie of the place, which seemed to mee rather an entrance in-to the shadow of death, then to be the Palace or Court of a King) the Riuer Llynerrenny mooueth much, by which Fawstus his sonne, begotten of his own daugh-ter Rowena, is said to spend his life in continuall praers.

(15) But whilest Vortigern was busied in building this Castle, and the Saxons making spoiles wher-eo-euer they came, the Brittaines vnder the conduct of Aneulus Ambrosius, began to receiue some breath of hopes, and to flee themselves out of their Caues. This Ambrosius (saith Beda) was a gentle natured man, which only of all the blood of the Romans remained then a-line, his parents being slaine, which had borne the name of the King of the Country. Hee with his brother Vter, commonly called Pendragon, returning out of Britain Armorica, where they had remained from the Tiran-nie of Vortigern, landed at Tameffe in the West of this Island; vnto whom resorted great Troopes of Brittaines.

His first Expedition was against Vortigern the scourge of his Country, and murderer of his King: whose Castle straightwaies hee besieged, and by the iust reuenging hand of God, with wilde fire consumed, wherein those adulterous and incestuous persons were burned to ashes.

(16) Next, following the common Enemy, hee gaue battle to the Saxons on the North of Humber, at a place called Maesbell, wherein Hengist was discom-fited, and in flight taken by Earle Edol of Gloucester, and beheaded at Coningsburray, saith he of Monmouth. Howbeit, Matthew of Westminster maketh him fight another battle vpon the Riuer Dwr, in Anno 489. wherein, saith he, Hengist was taken. And Polydore saith, that in the same battle Hengist at the first onset was slaine, with many of his Germans: the fame of whose victorie (saith he) had in memorie with the Inhabitants of those parts euen vnto this day. Yet Gildas, Beda, and Ethelward, Writers of those ancient times, and two of them Saxons, mention not the death of Hengist, nei-ther this great victorie of the Brittaines. And Marrianus the Scottish Monke seemeth to affirme the contrarie, where he saith, that Hengist raigned thirty foure yeeres in great glorie, and died peaceably, leaving his sonne Etke to succeed him in the Kingdome of Kent. With whom al-so Florentius the Monke of Worcester agreeeth. How-focuer, sure it is, had not the diuine power of God o-therwise determined, the waning estate of Britaine doubtlesse had recovered her former strength, both by the praers of Bishop German, the prowess of this last spoken of Ambrosius, the valorous attempts of Vter Pendragon, and the worthy indutries of the Christian King Arthur. The famous resistances of this last mentioned Arthur, the Monke of Monmouth with such fables hath augmented, that his Acts and Trauels may be compared to those of Hercules, or with the Conquests of Cesar himselfe; inasmuch that he hath bene accounted and ranged in the Catalogue of the worlds nine Worthies. And surely (by the tes-timonie of Malmsbury) hee was a Prince of great worth, and did often aduerture with his final power to meet the Saxons in the face and in Field.

But the Brittaines strength daily decreasing, and new supplies of these Saxons daily arriuing, brought the one in despair to enjoy their owne right, and the o-ther to triumph in their intrusions of wrongs. For continually incroaching forward, and enlarging their limits wher-eo-euer they came, drove the inhabitants before them from their wonted possessions, & seated themselves in the southern and best part of the Land, laying the stones (as it were) of those foundations, wherupon in short time they raised their most glo-rious buildings.

(17) For every severall Captaine or Commander accounting that part his owne, wherein hee first entred or made conquest of, with full resolution determined to keepe what hee had got, and (as an absolute King) commanded his Prouince, whereby the Land became burdened with seven of them at the first: as Hengist of Kent; Ella, of those parts now called Suffex and Sur-rey; Cherdik, of the West; Erehenwin, of the East; Ida of the North; Crida, of the Middle-land; Vffa, the parts now Middlesex and Essex: which Kingdomes thus be-gunne and erected, stood not long vnshaken by ciuill diffensions among themselves, each King enuying his equals greatness, and seeking to enlarge his owne Dominions vpon the next. In which combutations, few or none of them came to the graue in due time, but were either slaine in warres, or treacherously murdered in peace, or else enforced to heare himselfe a Monke, and resigne his Crowne to another. To speake of all these together, I hold would bring too great a confusion to our Historie, and a needlesse sur-charge to the Readers memorie: To auoid which, I will briefly set downe the Conquests, Circuits, Acts, and Defents, that in euery severall Kingdome hap-pened while they stood in their Heptarchie, before they were vnto an absolute Monarchie; and then (according to my prefixed purpose) continue the suc-cession of GREAT BRITAINES Monarchs.

(18) For albeit the Land was diuided into seven severall Kingdomes, and each of them carrying a foueraigne command within his owne limits, yet one of them euer seemed to be supreme of the rest, and that Prince who had the greatest power or successe in his warres, was euer accounted and called the King of the English-men, as Venerable Beda in the fifth Chapter of his se-cond Booke, and Historie of England, euer termeth them.

(19) Such therefore as held the rest vnder, either by Armes or alliance, in amitie or subiection, swaied the whole Monarchie, and were acknowledged as Supremes in power ouer the rest, which succeeded not euer in the same Familie, neither continued in one and the same Kingdome without reuersement, but were car-ried vpon the Flouds and Ebbes of variable successe, or as destinee pleased to alter the chance: wherof each of them (saing the East-Saxons only) did attaine to the height of that government, as to the haue of their wished desires. See therefore (if you please) a generall view of the whole, and afterwards the se-uerall Historie of euery Kingdome apart, before we enter into the Succession of the English-Saxons Mo-narchs.

THE KINGDOME OF KENT BEGUN BY HENGIST THE SAXON, WITH THE SESSION OF THEIR KINGS, THEIR ISSUES AND RAIGNES.

CHAPTER V.

Kent, the first Dominion of the Saxons Heptarchie, was formerly in the daies of Julius Caesar, the Seat of foure feuerall petty Kings, yet neuer called a Kingdome, before that Hengist, the first Saxon Captaine, in fauour of his Daughter Rowena, got it by the gift of King Portigern, about the yeere of Grace 455. and in the seventh yeere after his first arriuage, heere he first laid the foundation of those fortunes which the Saxons his Nation in this Land afterwards attained vnto: for hauing possessed the same with Victorie and Wealth the space of thirty one yeeres, (some adde three more) he left it in peace to his sonne Eske; and the rest of the Land so weakened by his meanes, that others of his Nation were shortly planted in other parts thereof. It contained the Continent that lieth betwixt our East-Ocean and the Riuer Thames, being bounded vpon the West with Suffex and Surrey.

Eske, the second King of Kent, is reported to bee the second sonne of King Hengist, who accompanying his father into this Iland, made prooffe of his great valour in all his Battles fought against the Brittaines, and in one of them (as Geffrey of Monmouth reporteth) being taken prisoner, was for a time retained in Torke, but thence escaping, hee aided his father in the Battle of Crekynford; and after his decease, succeeded him in the Kingdome of Kent, from whom those Inhabitants (saith Beda) were called Eskings, amongst whom he peaceably raigned about twentie yeeres, and died in the yeere of our Lord 512.

Ossa the sonne of Eske began his raigne ouer his Fathers Dominions, the yeere of Christs Incarnation 512. and raigned twenty two yeeres, without mention of any memorabile Act.

Imerik, the sonne of Eske, and the fourth King of Kent, raigned twenty five yeeres, saith Stowe; twentie nine, saith Saul in his Table collected from our English Writers. He had issue, Ethelbert the first Christian King of Kent, and a daughter named Rikell, married to Shedda the second King of the East-Saxons, the mother of Sebert and Segebold.

Ethelbert, the sonne of Imerik, in the yeere of grace 561. succeeded him in the Kingdome of Kent, who by reason of his young yeeres, was sore molested by his neighbour Princes, that sought to enlarge their Prouinces vpon him: for now the Saxons hauing made full Conquest of the Brittaines, fell at variance amongst themselves, taking all occasions to supplant each other, as Conquerours commonly can endure no equals, and prosperitie euer is looked at with an enuious eie; whereupon Cheulin King of the West-Saxons, proud of his victorious successes ouer the Brittaines, beganne to disdain all amitie with his owne neighbour Saxons, invaded the Territories of this young Prince, and in a set Battle slew Oslane and Cnebba, two of his Dukes, discomfited the King, and wonne the day. This field was fought at Wipbandun, in the yeere of our Redemption 567. and is noted to bee the first Battle betwixt the Saxons themselves since their first entrance into Britaine.

But young Ethelbert growne vnto yeeres, repaired his losses with the enlargement of his Kingdome to the banks of Humber, and was the fifth Monarch of the Englishmen, as after we shall heare. His first Wife was Berta, the daughter of Chilperik, King of France, by whom he had Edbald, Ethelburg, and Eadburg: a second Wife he had unworthy of name, for her incestuous and abominable act, in matching her selfe in marriage with her Husbonds sonne, A sinne (saith the Apostle) not to be named among the Gentiles. Of this King, as also of all the rest that attained vnto the glorie, to bee entailed (per excellentiam) the Soueraigne Kings of the Englishmen, I purpose to bee sparing in their particular Kingdomes, and to referre the larger relation of their Acts, Matches, Issues, and continuance, to the times of their feuerall Monarchies, whereby a more historicall course may be carried, through the successions of the English-Saxon Monarches, and a needlesse repetition of the same things avoided, which otherwise of necessitie would follow. Hee raigned in great glory fiftie six yeeres, and was the first Saxon King that received and established the Gospell. He died the foure and twentieth day of February, the yeere of Christs 616. after he had raigned 56. yeeres, and was buried at Canterbury, with this inscription vpon his Tombe:

Rex Ethelbertus hic clauditur in Polindro, Fana pians Christo meat absq. Meandro.

Edbald, the sonne of King Ethelbert, in the yeere of Christs 617. assumed the Government of Kent; who no sooner, saith Beda, had gotten from vnder the awe of his father, but he refused to entertaine the Doctrine of Christ, and so polluted himselfe with the foule sinne of fornication, as that hee married his Mother in Law, the late Wife to his owne Father: which two hainous faults gaue his subjects both occasion and impunity to returne to their former idolatry, who vnder his Father, for fauour, or for feare, had yielded to the Lawes of the Christian Faith. But Chulvin invaded his Territories.

Ethelbert the fifth Monarch of the Englishmen. His first wife, and children by her. In the life of Saint Werburg. His second wife.

the scourge of God & vengeance from Heauen wanted not to the punishment of this vnfaiethfull King: for he was plagued for a season with often phrensie of minde, and raging fury of an vnclene Spirit; but by Laurence Archbishop of Canturbury, he was at length converted from his Idolatry and incestuous Matrimony, and being baptized, endeouored to maintain the state of the Gospell. He married Emme, the daughter of Theodebert, King of Austrasie, now Lorraine, by whom he had issue a Daughter named Ensfith, who died a Virgin at Fulkestone, a Religious House in Kent of her Fathers foundation; and two Sonnes, whereof Ermenred the elder died before his Father, and left issue Dompnena, who was married to a Mercian Prince, Ermenberg that died a vailed Virgin, Ermenith a merchant, Ethelred and Ethelbert, both murdered by their Colingerman, King Egbert. His younger Sonne was Ercombert that succeeded him in the Kingdome. This Edwald built a Chapell within the Monastery of Saint Peter and Paul at Canturbury, in honour of Mary the blessed Mother of God, endowing that Church with sufficient maintenance; wherein, after the continuance of twentyfour yeeres raigne, he was buried neere to King Ethelbert his Father, Anno 640.

Ercombert, the Son of Edwald by Emme his Wife, succeeded his Father in the Kingdome of Kent, in the yeere of grace 641. He was a vertuous, religious, and Christian King: for the Temples of the Heathen Idols he suppressed, and commanded the fast of Lent to be obserued. His Wife was Sexburg, the daughter of Anna King of the East-Angles, by whom he had issue Egbert and Lothaire, both Kings of Kent after him. Ermenhild, Wife to Wolfer King of Mercia, and Erkenode a professed Nunne in the Monastery of Saint Brigs in France where she died, and was interred in the Church of Saint Stephen. In his daies the state of the Church growing to a well settled forme of government, the Prouince of Kent was diuided into Parishes by Honorius the Archbishop, as testifie the Records of Christ-Church in Canturbury. This King hauing raigned twentyfour yeeres and odde months, died in the yeere of our Lord 664.

Egbert, the elder Sonne of King Ercombert, in the nonage of his young Nephewes, Ethelred and Ethelbert, (the sonnes of this Vncle Ermenred) obtained the Rule of Kent, and had not their murder much blemished his peaceable Government, hee might well haue held place with the worthiest of those Kings; but thirsting after an absolute souerainie, and fearing lest his owne power should diminish by their growths and rightfull successions, he set his mind on that bloody, traitorous, and vnnatural attempt, and with the assistance of one Thurme, found fit place and opportunitie to worke that diuillish designe, casting their bodies into a Riuer, that so their Murders might not be knowne. But God (saith Malmesbury) that searcheth the heart, reuiled the act, by casting vp their bodies on the shore, and to the open view of the next Inhabitants, who with great reuerence there buried them, and built a small Chapel ouer their Monument, whose bones afterwards were remoued, and new interred in the Abby of Ramsiey in Hantsire. The Lady Dompnena their Sister, and next Heire to the Crowne, that was married to Merwald, a Prince of West-Mercia, and borne him foure Children, founded the Abbey of Minster in Kent: Wherein, saith Stowe, she became the first Abbess her selfe, and Mildrith her daughter succeeded her therein, saith Capgrau. This King in great quietnesse raigned nine yeeres, and died in the yeere of grace 673. in the month of Iuly: leaving issue Edrik and Wigfred, both Kings of Kent, succeeding after Lothaire.

Lothaire the brother of Egbert, by strong hand obtained the government of Kent. For notwithstanding Egbert left issue Edrik and Wigfred, (as is said) yet Lothaire taking the aduantage of their minority, and the example of his brothers intrusions, made himselfe King against his, as he had done against the Sonnes of Ermenred, but did not inioy the same with the like peace as he had done. For not onely Ethelred the Mercian warred strongly against him, but also Edrik, by the assistance of the South-Saxons continually fought to recouer his right, whereby the peace of the Kentish was much molested: and lastly, in a bloody battell was Lothaire shot thorow with a dart, whereof he died, vnder his Chirurgons hand, the sixth day of February, in the yeere of Christ 685. after hee had raigned eleuen yeeres and seuen months. The punishment of the Murder committed by his brother Egbert, was on him repaid, saith Malmesbury, who deided and made iests at the lamentes for young Ethelred and Ethelbert, that were by the people held and accounted Martyrs. His body was buried with his Predecessors, Kings of Kent, in the Monastery of S. Peter and Paul in Canturbury, Anno 685.

Edrik, the Sonne of King Egbert, hauing slaine his Vncle Lothaire in battell, succeeded him in the Kingdome of Kent, wherein he fate onely two yeeres, and those in continuall warres with his subiects; in which ciuill broiles lastly hee was slaine, leaving the Kentish Kingdome so torne with dissensions, that it became a pray to many Vsurpers, and gaue occasion to Ceadwalla the West-Saxon, to seeke the annexation thereof to his owne Kingdome; who with his brother Mollo entred Kent, and with fire and sword made waste where they came. To meet these, the Kentish assembled, and getting the aduantage, burned Mollo to death: in whole reuenge Ceadwalla persisted, and wasted the most part of that Prouince before he departed: so that after for six yeeres continuance no King raigned in Kent, but the Country lay exposed to the tyrannies of oppressors.

Wigfred or Withred, seuen yeeres after the death of his Brother, tooke vpon him the government of Kent, which hee purchased with the good opinion that his subiects conceiued, and with a great summe of money paid to King Ina for his peace. He entred his Kingdome the yeere of Mans Redemption 693, the eleuenth of November, and two hundred and fiue yeeres, after the death of Hengist the first Saxon. With him raigned one Swebhard, as Beda declareth: but without mention from whom, or vpon what occasion. He founded the Priore of S. Martin at Douer, and behaued himselfe worthily both in Warre and Peace: his raigne was thirty yeeres; thirty three, saith Beda; and death in Anno 725. leaving issue Edbert, Ethelbert, and Aldrick, all three succeeding successiue in the Kingdome.

Egbert, the first Sonne of Withred, succeeded his Father in his Kingdome, vertues, & valours, whereby a peaceable government is allotted him by all Writers of these affaires, for the continuance of twentie three yeeres, without relation of any notable accident peculiar to himselfe and Kingdome: besides the appearances of two fearfull Comets, in Anno 729. and fourth of his raigne; the one arising immediately before the Sunne in the morning, and the other shewing his fierie beames presently vpon the Sunnes face, both of them striking their gleames into the North, and by West, forebiewing (it may be) the scourge and desolation that the Pagans intended, who were at that instant entred into France and Spain.

Ethelbert, the second Sonne of King Withred, and Brother to the last King Egbert, began his Raigne ouer the Kingdome of Kent, the yeere of Mans Salvation 749. and raigned without any memorable act either of his, or of his Kingdomes affaires, the space of eleuen yeeres, leaving this life in Anno 759. and was buried, say some, in the Monastery of Peter and Paul in Canturbury, without issue of his body to succeed him: howbeit the Annales of Canturbury affirms him to bee buried at Reculers, in the Ile of Taney, whose Monument is shewed at the upper end of the South Ile in the Church, and is mounted with two Spires, if there be not a mistaking of him for Ethilbert his Successor.

death of his brother Ethelbert, obtained the kingdome of Kent, the yeere of Christs Incarnation 760. no other glory attending his affaires (saith Malmesbury) besides his vnfortunate fight at Osteford against Offa King of the Mercians, wherein it seemed some honor (though with his ouerthrow) to withstand so puissant and impugnable an enemy. Hee is the last King of Kent that held the scepter in a lineall succession: the rest that followed, both good and enioied it by tyrannie and vsurpation. This King is said to raigne thirtie foure yeeres, and to die in the yeere of grace, seuen hundred ninety three.

Ethilbert, surnamed Pren, vsurped the Title and Authoritie ouer the Kentish Dominions, when that Prouince was sore oppressed with the inuasion of the Mercian Kenulfe, whose warres against Kent, by succession from Offa, were continued with such rigour and valour, that the Country lay desolate where hee had bene, and the people distressed whither he came. This Pren, Kenulfe tooke prisoner, and lead away with him into Mercia: but at the dedicatio of a Church that he had then founded at Winchcombe, in presence of ten Dukes and thirtie Bishops, he released him at the High Altar, without either intreatie or ranome of redemption. The King returning againe into Kent, could not there bee receiued, his place either being supplied by another, or himselfe so disliked, as not worthy any longer to raigne: and hauing had experience of the worlds mutabilities, is left againe to his pri-uate fortunes, from whence hee had stepped, hauing held his estate but for three yeeres continuance. Cuthred, saith Malmesbury, was made King of Kent by Kenulfe King of Mercia, when hee had ouercome and captiued Ethelbert: notwithstanding hee is accounted for an Vsurper, and bare the title of King the terme of eight yeeres, without any other act worthy of remembrance, inheriting his predecessors euill happe and calamitie, through factions and ciuill discords.

Baldred, after the death of this Cuthred, tooke vpon him the princely dignitie of Kent, about the yeere of Christs Natuitie 805. But now the heauenlie prouidence determining to bring againe together that which the Saxons had diuided, raised from exile little Egbert, to make him the Great Monarch of the English-men. His first wars were against Bernulf King of Mercia, and his second against this Baldred, King of Kent, whom in Battle he vanquished, and forced him out of his Kingdome, after he had fate on that princelie Throne the space of eightene yeeres. This Baldred is said to haue fled ouer Thames, and to leaue Kent to the will of his Conquerour, whither againe he neuer returned, neither yet was heard of after his ouerthrow. This Kingdome then that was ceteris by Hengist, the yeere of mans happinesse 455. continued her government 372. and ended her glorie in the yeere 827. being made a Prouince vnto the West-Saxons.

SOUTH SAXONS KINGDOME. THE CIRCVIT AND CONTIN- VANCE, THEIR KINGS, SVCCES- SIONS, ISSVES AND RAIGNES.

CHAPTER VI.

HE Kingdome of the South-Saxons, containing the Countries of Sussex and Surrey, had on the East side Kent; on the South, the Sea and Ile of Wight; vpon the West, Hantsire, and the North side inuerged with the riuer Thames. This Kingdome was erected by Ella a Saxon Captaine, that in the second yeere of Hengists entrance, as some say, brought a supply of his Saxons into Britaine, with whom came his three Sonnes, Kymen, Plenching, and Cissa, these landing at a place which from Kymen was afterwards called Kymenishore, and discomfiting the Inhabitants, that made resistance, became himselfe King of those Southerne parts. But doubtlesse there are many opinions of this mans first entrance and new erected estate: for some (as M. Saule in his Table) set it in the second yeere of Hengists first arriuall, Anno 452.

Others in the second of Anselmus, and no lesse then thirty yeeres after that, Anno 482. Harrison will haue it forty three yeeres after the Saxons first entrance, and fourth yeere after King Hengist his death, Anno 492. And M. Ferrers in his Succession of the English Monarks, placeth it in the three and twentieth yeere of King Hengists Kingdome, and in the fifth after his owne arriuall, the yeere of our Redemption 488. Of such vncertaintie is the beginning of this South-Saxons Kingdome, whose Continuance and Successions are nothing clearer; in so much that Malmesbury making feuerall Chapters vpon the other fix, omitteth only this of the South-Saxons: and therefore as wee finde them, let vs haue leaue to relate them, and for the present to leaue Ella as hee was King, till wee come to a fit place where more shall be spoken of him as hee was Monarch; whose raigne is set by Stow to bee thirty six yeeres; by Sir Henry Saule, twenty foure; and by M. Henry Ferrers, thirty two, and to haue died in the yeere 514.

An. Do. 514. Cissa succeeded. then onely living at his fathers death, succeeded him in the kingdom of the South-Saxons, (leaving the Monarchie to Cherdike king of the West-Saxons, who had planted his kingdom between him and the Britaines, having taken the charge of warre against them, for maintenance whereof, Cissa yielded him a yearly contribution) and living himselfe in long rest and peace, founded Chichester and Chisbury, the one a Citie for resort of his people, the other a place of repose for himselfe; which last he fortified about with a strong Trench, for a further defense against all dangers. Of any other his actions, little is recorded by Writers: onely in this they concur, that hee was a man of great age and small acts, some affirming that hee reigned the space of feventy fix yeeres.

Edithwac (by some called Ethelwolf and Athelwald) succeeded King Cissa in the kingdom of the South-Saxons, and was the first Christian of that Nation, conuicted by Bishop Wilfride, as some conceiue out of Beda: yet Beda saith expressly, that the King was baptized before Wilfrides coming. And the History of S. Withune saith, it was done by S. Berinus, Bishop of Dorchester, who usually preaching the Gospel in the kingdom of the Mercians, in the Citie of Oxford, and presence of Wulpherus King of Mercia, it hapned that King Athelwald, then a Pagan, was present, who by the instigation of Wulpherus, and instruction of Berinus, received the lauer of Baptisme, whom also Wulpherus received at the Font for his God-sonne, and in signe of that adoption gave unto him two Prouinces, to be annexed to his former kingdom, that is to say, the Ile of Wight, and the Prouince of Atannes in the west of England; at which time also Berinus by King Athelwalds permission, baptized the chiefe Dukes and Nobles of that Prouince. His Queene Etha was baptized in her owne Ile, the Prouince of the Victians, being the daughter of Eanfride, who was brother to Eanheres, and both of them Christians. But it is generally held, that King Edithwac gaue vnto Wilfride the Peninsula (as the Latines speake) of Seolefca, now Selsey in the West, with the demaynes of eightie seven Tenements, wherein he built the Monasterie; that bare the same name, and was his owne Episcopall See. Against this Edithwac, Ceadwald a valiant young Prince, of the Blood-royall of the West-Saxons, being banished his Countrey, making head with the assistance of friends and followers, entred his Territories with an impetuous incursion, and slew the King as he made resistance, when hee had reigned twentie fix yeeres: in whose raigne and Countrey raged such an extreme Famine, that both men and women in great flockes and companies cast themselves from the Rockes into the Sea.

(4) Berthun and Anthun, two Dukes of the South-Saxons, maintained the Warres and defence of their Countrey against Ceadwald, and by manly valour forced him to retire. These Captaines betwixt them held the dominion of that Prouince, vntill such time as Ceadwald had gotten the Kingdom of the West-Saxons; who bearing in mind the remembrance of his former proceedings, and thinking to enlarge his owne Kingdom with the subiection of the South-Saxons, entred againe that Prouince, and in Battell slew Duke Berthun, harrying the Countrey miserably before him. Which State, vnable to withstand the West-Saxons puissance, was by Iue, the next King succeeding, made a subiected Prouince, their Government thence forward resting vnder his Successors, after it had stood one hundred and thirteene yeeres: and ended in the yeere of Christ 601. by ordinary computation. But whofoeuer shall compare the times of the foresaid Kings, Wulpherus and Athelwald together, will easily finde, that it is not easie to finde the certaine concurrence of times, in affairs so clouded in obscuritie, and so farre remote from our present times.

THE KINGDOME OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, THE CIRCVIT THEREOF, AND SVCCESION OF THEIR KINGS VNTO EGBERT; WITH THEIR ISSVES AND RAIGNES.

CHAPTER VII.

The West-Saxons were the first that brought the Monarchie to a Monarchie. The Kingdome of the West-Saxons, though in time later then the two former, yet in circuit and fame surmounted them both; whose Monarch was the Maull that first brake the Scepters of the other fix Kingdoms in funder, and made one Crowne of these their feuerall Diadems, more glorious then they all, and that first worne vpon Egbert the West-Saxons heads, and the Scepter swaied in his Imperiall hand, vntill whose time and person wee will continue the succession of their Kings, beginning with Cherdik that first made it a Kingdom, and briefly their Acts, whilst it is stood in the Saxons Heptarchie.

This Cherdik is said to haue brought a second supply of Saxons forces into Britaine, in the yeere of our Lord 495. and fifth of the Monarchie of King Ella: his landing being at a place on that occasion called Chederik-shore, who with his sonne Kenrik was encountered countred by the Britaines, vnder the conduct of Natanleah a British Prince, whose Countrey was then called after his name; whom he slew in Battell, with five thousand more of his Britaines: the fortune of which field gaue resolutions and hopes of better successe; it was fought neere vnto a Brooke vpon that euent called Cherdiks-ford, now by contraction Chard-ford. Hereupon establishing his new erected Kingdom, (which contained Cornwall, Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Hantsire, and Barkshire;) he enlarged the same with the conquest of the Ile of Wight, the gouernment whereof was by him giuen to Stasse and Withgar his Nephewes, which later slew the Britaines then inhabiting, and named the place of his victory Withgarburg, assuming the name of King, and was buried at his Citie Withgar, in the same Ile. About seven yeeres after Cherdiks entrance, Portia Saxon, with his two Sonnes, Megla and Beda, landed in the West, at the place from him called Portsmouth, whose aid with Ken and Ulfes, alsit Cherdik in his Conquests. His raigne is set to be thirty three yeeres; and his death in the yeere of grace five hundred thirtie five: hauing had two sonnes, Kenrik and Chelwolf, the one of which died before his Father; and the other succeeded him in his Kingdom. Chelwolf had issue Cuthgils, whose sonne was Kenfrida, and his sonne Kenfrid, the Father of King Eskwin, who was the Successor of King Kenwald, and predecessor of King Kenwin in the Kingdom of the West-Saxons.

Kenrik, the eldest Sonne of King Cherdik, hauing formerly made proofe of his prowess in the assistance of his Father, was after his death alio verie fortunate in obtaining two victories ouer the Britaines; the one at Searesberige, and the other at Beranbrige; whose raigne beginning Anno 534. continued twenty fix yeeres; ending in the yeere of our Redemption, five hundred sixty. He had issue three Sonnes, of which Chelanin the eldest succeeded him in his kingdom; Cuthwolfe the second alsit his Brother in his Warres, and was partaker with him of his victories, who died Anno 672. leaving issue one onely Sonne, named Chell, or Cearlike, who proued nothing so vertuous and dutifull a subiect as his Father had bene: for he rose in rebellion against his Vncle, and by strong hand expelled him his kingdom.

The third Sonne of King Kenrik was Cuth, famous in his issue, though mentionlesse for action in himselfe: for hee had three Sonnes, of which Chelwolfe the eldest, was King of the West-Saxons (as shalbe declared) Chell the second, was father to Kingils the sixt (and first Christian) King of the West-Saxons, and Grandfather to Kenwald and Kenwin, the seventh and ninth Kings of that Kingdom: and Ched the youngest, was father of Kenbert, Grandfather to Chelwald the most renowned King of the West-Saxons; of whom we are presentie to speake, and of them all in the succession of the English Saxons Monarchs: and now to returne againe to the issue of King Kenrik.

Chelanin his first Sonne, entred vpon the gouernment ouer the West-Saxons Anno 561. and euen at the first began to disturbe the quiet peace of his neighbour Prouinces, taking aduantage at the young yeeres of Ethelbert, who was made King of Kent in the same yeere that Chelanin was, whom he discomfited, and slew his two Captaines, Duke Osiane and Duke Cnebba, at Wibbandune, as we haue said. Other Victories he obtained ouer the Britaines, both at Bedford, Deorham, Glocester, Cirencester, and Bathancester. But the fortunes of warres being alwaies variable, at length his successe altered, and at VVannes ditche in Wiltshire hee was ouerthrowne, and dispossessed of his kingdom by Cearik his brother Cuthwolfs Sonne, when he had reigned thirty three yeeres. Hee had issue, Cuth and Cuthwin: the former ferued valiantly in the warres vnder his father at Wimbleton in Surrey, where King Ethelbert of Kent was chased, and his soldiers slaine: and with the like valour and victorie hee fought at Fethunlegh against the Britaines, notwithstanding that therein he lost his life, the yeere of our Lord 585. and the five and twentieth of his fathers raigne. Cuthwin his younger brother suruiued his father, but succeeded not in his Kingdom, being then (by reason of his young yeeres) vnable to recover his right. He had two sonnes, Kenbald and Cuth, the latter of which was father to Chelwald, whose son Kenred had issue, Iue the eleuenth King of the West-Saxons, and Ingils his brother, whose sonne was Foppa the father of Eafa, whose sonne was Altemund, the father of Egbert the eighteenth King of the West-Saxons, who reduced the Saxons diuided Heptarchie into an absolute Monarchie.

Cearik the sonne of Cuthwolfe, who was brother to this last King, succeeded in the kingdom by the election of his Vncle, and was the fourth King of the West-Saxons. He began his raigne in the yeere of our Redemption 592. and continued it the terme of fix yeeres, without any memorable act by him achieved besides his Treason spoken of before.

Chelwolfe the sonne of Cuth, the sonne of Kenrik, and Cosen-german to Cearik the preceding King, began his raigne ouer the West-Saxons, the yeere 598. on whose first entrance, this prouince of the West-Saxons was invaded both by the Britaines, and also by the Scots and Picts: and the East-Angles likewise molested his peace, vnder the conduct of Redwald at that time Monarch of the Englihmens. But hee wading thorow these troubles, harried the Prouince of the South-Saxons with inuasions and calamities, in the prosecution whereof he died, leaving the pursuit of his warres and possession of his kingdom to Kingils his Nephew, that immediately succeeded him, after he had reigned the space of fourteene yeeres.

Ingils the Sonne of Chel, who was Brother to King Chelwolfe, succeeding his Vncle in the kingdom of the West-Saxons, in the yeere six hundred and twelve, in his third yeere associated vnto him in his Gouernment Quinchelme his Sonne, who ioyntly managed the West-Saxons affaires both of warre and peace. And fighting with victorie against the Britaines at Beandune, they there slew of them one thousand forty six persons, and after that against Penda King of Mercia, neere vnto Cirencester, about the fifth yeere of his raigne, where lastly they came to a conclusion of peace. This King at the preaching of Berinus (an Italian Diuine, afterward reputed for a Saint) and by the persuasions of Osvald the most Christian King of Northumberland, (who was a suter to become his Son in Law, by the marriage of Kingburg his daughter, and was made his Godfather by receiving him at the Font) received the Word of Life, and became the first Christian King of all the West-Saxons; in witness whereof, he gaue the City Dorchester, neere vnto Oxford, to his Conuerter, who therein erected his Episcopall See. He reigned the space of thirty one yeeres, some say but seven and twenty, and had issue (besides Quinchelme, who raigned with him, and died before him) Kenwin and Kenwald, that succeeded him; and Kingburg his Daughter married to Osvald, as is said. Quinchelme had a Sonne named Cuthred, that was baptized with his Father at Dorchester, and is said by Stowe, to haue reigned after the death of Kingils: but I take it rather to be Kenwin, whom some suppose to be his Fathers Associate the terme of foure yeeres, but neuer sole King himselfe.

Kenwald, whom Beda calleth Senwalch, succeeded his Father Kingils in the kingdom of the West-Saxons. His beginnings by Matthew of VVestminster are compared to be with the worst, and his endings with the best of those Kings. At his first entrance he fought with victorie against the Britaines at Pennum, whereof he became most insolent, and refused not onely to receive the Christian Faith, but also put from him his lawfull wife Senburg, the sister of Penda King of Mercia, whereby hee became hateful to his owne subiects, and sore assaulted by the Mercian King, who followed the reuenge so farre, that he forced Kenwald out of his kingdom, who being driuen to extremity, sought succour at the mercie of Anna the Christian King

In the daies of this Brithrik, many prodigies appeared, and more perhaps then will be beleued. For it is reported, that in his third yeere a shower of bloud rained from heauen, and bloody crosses fell vpon mens garments as they walked abroad. And in his

Which wonders, some tooke to be prefiges of the miseries following, both by the Inuasions of the Pagan Danes, that in these times were first seene to arrive in this Iland; and the extreme Famine that afterwards happened: howloever, sure it is that the Hierarchy now beganne to set in the West, and the rising Monarchy to appeare in King Egbert, whose acts and issue shall be further rehearsed, when wee shall come to the time of his succedion among the English Monarchs.

THE EAST-SAXONS KINGDOME. THE CIRCVIT, SVCCESIONS OF THEIR KINGS, THEIR ISSVES, AND KING- DOMES CONTINVANCE.

CHAPTER VIII.

The site of this Kingdome.

He site of the East-Saxons Kingdome, was the Country of Essex, Middlesex, and part of Hartfordshire, and the Circuit so far as the Diocesse of London now extendeth. It was bounded on the East with the Ocean; on the South with the Thames; on the West with the Colne; and on the North with the Riuer Stouere. The Kings thereof claime their descent from Prince Woden, not as all the rest of the Saxon Kings, but onely by a collateral line; and Erchemwine became the first King, which neuertheless he held as Feodarie to the Kings of Kent. For which cause, it seemeth that Malmesbury mentioneth him not in the Catalogue of those Kings, but maketh his sonne Sledda the first, and tenth in descent from Woden.

Erchemwine, is said to bee the Sonne of Offa, the Sonne of Beda, the sonne of Sigefret, the son of Snappa, the sonne of Amppig, the sonne of Supig, the sonne of Seaxnod, from whom all these Kings fetch their originall: His Kingdome began about the yeere of grace 527. and in the fiftenth of Eke the second King of Kent, and his raigne long, but yet without any memorabile acts; dying in the yeere 586. and leauing his sonne to succed in his place.

Sledda the sonne of Erchemwine, succedding in the East-Saxons Kingdome, raigned peaceably without mention of any warres; for hauing married Ricula the daughter of Imerik King of Kent, was thereby the more fauoured of them, and feared of others; and nothing left (besides his quiet raigne) to be recorded to posterities; neither are many yeeres of successions numbred, but as they are gathered from the Computations of other princes, with whom they either liued, or were linked in action. This Sledda died about the yeere of our Redemption 596. and left issue by his wife Queene Ricula, Sebert, who succedded him in the Kingdome, and Segebold his brother whose Sons afterward were Kings of that Prouince.

Sebert the sonne of Sledda and of Queene Ricula, beganne his Raigne in the yeere of Christs Incarnation 596. and in the thirte fix yeere of the raigne of King Ethelbert of Kent, his mothers brother, at that time Monarch of the English-men; who in Seberts chiefe citie London, a Princelie Mart Towne, (saith Beda) of many people arising thither both by sea and land; new built a Church, making it the Cathedral of Bishop Mitletus, and so wrought with King Sebert, that hee conuerted him to Christianity; and alsit him in that Foundation, where formerly (say some) had stood the Temple of Diana. This Church these new Conuers and Saxon Kings, either new reared or enlarged for the honour and seruice of God, and dedicated vnder the name of Saint Paul: which worke Ethelbert further confirmed with sufficient maintenance, as by this his Charter is seene, containing these words: Ethelbert Rex, Deo inspirante, pro anime sue remedio, dedit Episcopo Mitelo terram qua appellatur Tillingham, ad Monasterium sine Solutum silicet S. Pauli. Et ego Rex Ethelbert in a primiter concedo tibi Praefati Mitelo potestatem eius habendi & possidendi, ut in perpetuum in Monasterio utilitate permanent, &c. And that this was the Temple of Diana, some haue further confirmed vnto vs by the incredible number of Oxe-heads there digged vp in the daies of King Edward the First, when the east-end of that Church was enlarged; which were supposed to be of those Beasts that were there sacrificed to this Goddess Diana. These Kings likewise founded the Church of S. Peter in the West of London, at a place called Thorney, where sometimes stood the Temple of Apollo, as Sulcardus affirmeth; which being overthrowne by an Earth-quake, King Lucius new built for the celebration of Gods seruice; and that againe being decayed, those Kings restored it to a greater beautie, where Sebert, after thirteene yeeres raigne, (as some write) with Ethelgoda his Queene were buried: whose bodies in the daies of Richard the Second (saith Walsingham) were translated from the old Church to the new, and there interred: Hee had issue by the said Queene, Sered, Seward, and Sigbert, whose liues and deaths were as followeth.

Sered, Seward, and Sigbert, the sonnes of King Sebert, raigned as it seemeth, together in the Kingdome of the East-Saxons; all three wicked irreligious men, and deadly enemies to the Christian Profession. These contumeliously presuming to the Lords Table, and holy Sacrament of his Body and blood, were prohibited by Bishop Mitletus, because they were Idolaters and unbaptized: which repulse they tooke so offensively, that they expelled Mitletus, who therupon fled into France. But their impietie was not long viuewarded: for fighting against Kingils, and Quichelinus his sonne, (Kings of the West-Saxons) were by them overcome, and in battle slaine about the yeere of Grace 623, as by the learned Sir Henry Sauleis calculated, whose account for these times I altogether follow.

Sigbert the little, the sonne of Seward, the second sonne of King Sebert, entred his raigne ouer the kingdome of the East-Saxons, the yeere of Christ 623, of whose affaires, little matter is left for vs to relate, sauing that hee hauing both a Brother and a Sonne, yet his Kingdome was succedded by neither, but by one Sigbert, his Cosen-German once remoued.

Sigbert, the sonne of Segebold, the brother of Sebert, the sonne of King Sledda, and of Ricula his Queene, succedded his kinsman in the Kingdome of the East-Saxons. This Sigbert reduced againe his Prouince vnto the embracing of the Christian Faith, being daily instigated thereunto by Oswe King of Northumberland, and receiued Baptisme himselfe at the hands of Bishop Finnan, and at the place called The Wall, procured vertuous Cedda to be his asister for the plantation of the Gospel in his Kingdome. He was murdered by two of his kinsmen, who, as Beda saith, were Brethren, no other cause mouing them, but his ouermuch lenitie and clemencie. He raigned by the foresaid account, sixteene yeeres, leauing issue a young sonne named Selred, that succedded Seofrid in that Kingdome.

Swithelme succedded his brother in the Prouince of the East-Saxons, nothing being mentioned of his life or raigne, besides his Baptisme by Bishop Cedda, and that his God-father at the Font-stone was Edelwald King of the East-Angles.

Sighere, the sonne of Sigbert the little, entred his raigne ouer the Kingdome of the East-Saxons, the yeere of our Lord 664, and was the eighth King of that Prouince, in part whereof Sebba his nephew raigned, with better commendations then Sighere at his beginning had done; for Beda reporteth, that vpon a great mortallitie and plague, to appease the wrath of his Gods, Sighere became an Apostate, and forsooke the faith of Christ, whereas Sebba continued constant with those in that Prouince vnder his Iurisdiction: yet by the diligent care of Wulfere King of the Mercians, Sighere and his people were reclaimed, throwing downe the Temples and Altars erected to Idolatrie, and opening againe the Christian Churches for the Saints assemblies, that so (saith hee) they might rather die in hope of the Resurrection, then wallow in sinne, and liue in Idolatrie. His wife was Ofwith the daughter of Edelfrith, King of Northumberland, whom Capgrave maketh a Saint, and Abbeffe of Berking neere London, euen in the daies of her husband.

Sebba, the Brother of Segebold the little, and Sonne of Seward, (as we haue said) succedded as sole King in the Prouince of the East-Saxons, and with much equitie and administration of Iustice raigned therein thirty yeeres: towards the end whereof, the better to prepare his mind for contemplation, he relinquished his Princely Robes, and put on the Habit of Religious Profession in the Monastery of S. Pauls in London; as Radulphus de Diceto, with others affirme. Wherein this penitent King liuing a while in fasting and prayers, died the yeere of Christ 693, whose body was intombed in a Coffin of Gray Marble, the Couer copped, and as yet standing in the North wall of the Chancell of the same Church.

A miracle thereof Beda reporteth, needlesse either then to be wrought, or now of vs repeated, were it not to point at the blindness wherein cun good men were then led; and thus it is: They hauing prepared a Tombe-stone, to lay his body in, found it too thort by the quantitie of an hands bredth, and heuing it longer, yet would not serue: therefore they minding to bow vp the knees, laid the body therein, and suddenly it lengthened of it selfe with more then was sufficient. But surely howsoeuer this tombe was then set on this Monkish center, it is now since shrunke againe in the standing, and exceeds not in measure fife foot in length. His wife (but vnnamed) hee likewise instigated to leaue the momentanie pleasures of princely State, for that which is permanent: which thing with much adoe hee lastly obtained, leauing her to follow him in his vertuous deuotions, and his two sonnes to succed him in his kingdome.

Sigherd, the Sonne of King Sebba, whom Beda maketh a Monke with his Father, followed him also in the succedion of the East-Saxons Kingdome; the time of whose entrance is set in the yeere of Christs Incarnation 694, and his death in 701. no other mention being made either of Acts, Wife, or Issue.

Seofrid, the Sonne of King Sebba, and Brother to King Sigherd, either ioynly raigned with him, or successiely after him, of whom I finde nothing mentioned worthily inscribing, hauing had neither Wife nor issue that are recorded.

Ofsa, the Sonne of Sighere, and of Queene Ofwith his Wife, a man noted for his comely feature and sweet countenance, succedded King Seofrid in the Kingdome of the East-Saxons, the yeere of grace 701. Hee both enlarged with buildings, and enriched with lands the goodly and beautiful Church of Westminster, but after hee had ruled eight yeeres, being moued with a supposed religious deuotion, hee abandoned Kineth with his wife (the daughter of Penda the Mercian King) his lands, kinne, and Country, and with Kenred King of Mercia, and Edwine Bishop of Worcester, went to Rome, where hee was shorne a Monke, and in that habit died, leauing his Cosen Selred to succed in his kingdome. His wife Kineth after his departure, (with the like penance) vowed her selfe a veiled Nunne in the Abbey of Kinberg, whereof his sister was Abbeffe, who had been wife to Alfrith King of Northumberland.

Selred, the Sonne of Sigbert the Good, who was murdered for his ouermuch clemencie, attained to the Kingdome of the East-Saxons, in the yeere of grace 709. His raigne was long, though his acts are little spoken of, either that others worthier affaires filled the pens of those Story-writers, or that his time was so peaceable and vnactiuelly spent, that it ministred not matter whereof to indite. Hee raigned 38. yeeres, and died Anno 746. without relation either of Wife or Children.

Swithred, after the slaughter of Selred, was made King of the East-Saxons, which title hee retained, vntill that Egbert King of the West-Saxons, taking Armes against him, expelled him out of that Kingdome; as also the same yeere hee did Baldred, King of Kent, which was in the yeere of Christs Incarnation 827. and made it a Prouince annexed vnto the West-Saxons, after it had stood in state of a Kingdome 281. yeeres.

CHAPTER IX.

Northumberland now diuided at first.

His Kingdome of Northumberland consisted at first of two distinct Provinces, whereof the one was called Deira, and the other Bernicia, and were governed sometimes by their Kings feuerally, and sometimes vnder one, as successors of warre, or other casualties incident did afford. The royall descents of whole Kings are brought by Florentius both from the Fourth and Fifth Sonnes of Prince Woden, after this manner. Ella, vnder whom the Kingdome of Deira beganne, was the sonne of Ist, who was the sonne of Wulfre, the sonne of Wigils, the sonne of Wesforwalcha, the sonne of Seomel, the sonne of Suarta, the sonne of Sepugell, the sonne of Seabald, the sonne of Siggeat, the sonne of Suebad, the sonne of Siggar, the sonne of Waeleg, the fourth sonne of Woden. And the descent of Ida, the theraier of the Bernicians kingdome, is brought from Bealdeg the fifth sonne of Woden; for Bealdeg was father to Brand, whose sonnes were Beorn and Freodegar, the latter of which twaine was the progenitor of Cherdik the first West-Saxon King: and his brother Beorn begat another Beorn also, and hee Wegbrand the father of Ingelbrand, whose sonne was Alysa, the father of Angeneal, and this mans sonne Ingeneat, the father of Ethelwight, whose sonne Oefa begat Eppa the father of this Ida, the first King of Bernicia.

fourteene yeeres: and Ella by Matthew of Westmister is said to succeed him for thirty yeeres. The issue of Ida legitimate, as Huntington recordeth, were Adda, Bealrik, Ibedrik, Ethelrik, Ofmer, and Theodred; illegitimate, Oga, Ecce, Oswald, Ailrik, Sagoe, and Sogother. These (saith Matthew of Westmister) arrived at Flemisburke with forty Ships, and assisted their Father in manie of his enterprises. The issue of Ella, by Florentius his record, were Acce, Wife of Ethelfrid, King of Bernicia, and mother to the most Christian Oswald, Monarch of the Englishmen, and Edwine the Monarch and first Christian King of Northumberland. Ida is said to beginne his raigne Anno 547. And Ella in the yeere 559. No other particulars ascribed vnto either, besides the building of Bamburge Castell.

With Ella reigned the two sonnes of Ida, namely Adda and Theodrik, with three others, Elappa, Theodwald, and Frethulfe, sprung from Eoppa the father of Ida, all five his substitutes ouer the Bernicians: but because there is no other mention of them besides their names and raignes, I will leaue as I finde them, and proceed to the more worthy recitall.

Theodrik the sonne of King Ida, hauing outrun his youth in pernicious obliquitie, attained in his old yeeres to the government of both the Provinces, and whole Kingdome of Northumberland, wherein his time was so spent (saith Malmsbury) that had not his sonne in the glasse of his owne worths shewed the face of his fathers remembrance, his acts and raigne might easily haue bene forgotten. His issue were Ethelfrid that succeeded him, and Theobald slaine in Battle against the Scots. He reigned five yeeres, and died, An. 593.

Ethelfrid, a man very valiant, and thirstie for renowne, succeeded his father in the Northumbrians Kingdome. Him Beda compares to King Saul in Israel, excepting only in the knowledge of Gods true Religion: to whom (saith he) might be applied the saying of Iacob touching Beniamin, that like a rauening Wolfe he deuoured his prey in the morning, and diuided the spoile thereof in the evening. For he made greater Conquests ouer the daily afflicted Brittaines, then all the Kings of the Angles had done; and peopling their possessions with his Saxons, held the right owners vnder subiection and tribute. This his prosperitie, Edanaden King of the Scots greatly enuid, and attempting to cropp it, and to plant himselfe vpon the

The storie of Edwin and Bantham.

the root of like honour, hee assembled a great and strong Armie against him, and at the place called Deg-fallen strooke Battle with him, wherein notwithstanding he was ouerthrowne, and his Scots discomfited, yet with such losse to King Ethelfrid, that Theobald his brother, with the part of the Armie whereof he was General, were all vanquished and destroyed. This battle went so fore against the Scottish Brittaines, that (saith Beda) no King of that Nation durst attempt to meet the English in the Field for a long time after. And the fortune of the day did so much augment both his fame, and also his haughty spirit, that presently hee reformed his power against the Brittaines, that were at Cair-legion, where of them hee made a most lamentable slaughter, and that not only of the Souldiers prepared for fight, but also of those religious and harmlesse Monks, there assembled for prayer.

These Monks were of the Monastery of Bangor in North-wales, famous for antiquity, forme of discipline and spacious circuit. It was situated in the fruitful valley now called the English Malor; and vpon the Bankes of the Riuer Dee, where it extended it selfe as in the circuit of a walled Citie, containing within it the quantitie of a mile and a halfe of ground: two of whole Gates may at this day easilie be discerned, the one of them called Port Hogen, lying by North; and the other Port Clais, situate on the South; the Riuer Dee hauing now changed his Channell, runneth thorow the middelt betwixt both the Gates, which stand asunder five hundred paces. This Monasterie, saith Clarivalentine, was the Mother of all others in the World; who in memory of the Seuen Churches of Asia, did distribute into seuen portions their Monks, every one numbering three hundred soules, and all of them (as Beda saith) liuing by the labour of their own hands. Many of these assembling at Cair-legion, to assist their Brethren Brittaines with their supplications vnto God against this Ethelfrid, furnished the Wilde, and his fierce Souldiers the Infidell Saxons; with three daies fasts spent their time in continual praiers. But King Ethelfrid beholding their maner, demanded the cause; and understanding that they called for assistance of their God against him and his Army, let first vpon their Guarder Broccmal, a man of Armes, who to saue his own life, left all theirs to the sword, where in perished one thousand and two hundred Christian Monks, besides the discomfiture of the Brittaines Host. Many of these were interred in their owne Monasteries, whose bodies, saith Leyland, haue been found in the memory of man, in the rotten weedes wherein they were slaine. But as his fame increased daily abroad, so were his feares augmented continually at home. For Edwine the sonne of Ella, and third King of Deira, a gallant young Prince, and newly seated in his Fathers Kingdome, wrought many suspitions in Ethelfrids head; and though he was brother to his Wife Acce, yet the neerenesse of that alliance, no whit diminished his ielous conceits, whom therefore by priuie conspiracies and apparant pursuits hee so daily molested, that he was forced to saue his life by auoiding the Country, and tossed in exile from place to place, was lastly receiued and succoured by Redwald, King of the East-Angles, who in his quarrell forthwith assembled his forces, and meeting Ethelfrid in the field, slew him neere the Riuer Idle, after hee had reigned twenty three yeeres, in the yeere of Christ his Incarnation 617. He had issue by his Wife Acce, (the daughter of Ella) Eanfrit King of Bernicia, Oslaf, and Oswald King of Northumberland, Oslake, and Offa, with two Daughters canonized for Saints, Oswith and Edba the Nunne; as also by his Concubine, Ofry, the tenth Monarch of the Englishmen.

Edwine thus raised by the helpe of King Redwald, returned to his Country, and was of the Inhabitants made King of Northumberland, and afterward Monarch of the Englishmen, as in their succession shall be declared. Beda (somewhat too much addicted to fabulous miracles) of him reporteth this storie: That whilst hee lay banished in King Redwalds Court, Ethelfrid instigated his receiuer, by promises to take away his life; or if he refused, threatened him warres: for feare whereof, Redwald, partly inclining to this wicked purpose, revealed the same to the Queene his wife; which a friend of Edwins hearing, told him of his danger, and wished him to flee. Edwine thus perplexed, with troubled thoughts in the dead of the night, fate solitary vnder a tree in dumps, musing what was best to be done; to suspect and flee from Redwald, that had honoured him so much, he held it a wrong; and to thinke himselfe safe in other Provinces against so powerfull pursuers, he thought it was vaine. Thus distracted in casting what way might be safest, suddenly approached a man vnto him, vterly vnknowne, who after salutation, demanded the cause why hee fate at so vnseasonable a time, in so vncomely a place, and pensiu manner? Edwine thinking him to be his death-man, resolutely answered; It nothing concerned him at all, either to aske, or to know his estate. Oh Edwine (saith he) thinke not but that I know thy sorrow, and the cause of thy sitting thus vpon that stony thy death is pretended, and euen at hand: but what wouldst thou giue to rid thee of that danger, and to make King Redwald thy assured preseruer? Any thing, quoth Edwine, which is in my power. But what shall be his reward (saith the other) that shall let thee vpon the throne of thy Kingdome, and that with such glory, as none of thy Progenitors euer attained vnto? I would bee thankful to that man, said Edwine, in all things, and at all times, as reason required, and of right I ought. But tell me Edwine, said he, what if the same man shew thee a more safe way to preserve the life of thy soule, then either thou at this present knowest, or any of thy Parents euer heard of; wilt thou consent and embrace his counsell? Yea, said Edwine, God forbid that I should not bee ruled by him, that thus should free me from this present danger, let me vpon the throne of a Kingdome, and after these great fauours, should also teach mee the way to an eternall life. Vpon this answer, laying his right hand on Edwins head, he said vnto him; When these things shall in order come to passe, then call to minde this time, and what thou hast promised, and so vanished from his presence. The young Prince thus left betwixt hope and despair, his friend that had forewarned him of his death, came hastily to him with a more cheerful countenance, Come in Edwine (quoth he) and successe thy cares, for the Queene hath not onely changed Redwalds mind to saue thy life, but hee also hath granted to maintain thy right against Ethelfrid thine enemy. Which shortly hee did, and slew him, as we haue said.

Edwine thus placed vpon the Princely Throne, his first Wife Queenburg being dead in his exile, receiued in marriage Ethelburga, furnished Tace, (a fit name for a woman) the Daughter of King Ethelbert, and Sister to Edwald King of Kent, a most chaste and vertuous Christian Lady, whose teacher was Paulinus, and both of them Gods instruments for the Conuersion of the Northumbrians to the imbracement of Christian Religion. But because we shall haue occasion to speake of this Edwine as he was Monarch of the Englishmen, we will reuerse his Acts, Issues, and Raigne, to bee further related in the course of his Succession. Hee was slaine in battell against Cadwall King of the Brittaines and Penda King of the Mercians, when he had prosperously reigned seuentene yeeres, the twelfth of October, Anno 633. and was buried in Saint Peters Church at Streaneshall, after called Whithy. Vpon whose death, the Kingdome of Northumberland was againe diuided.

Ostrieke the Sonne of Alfred (Edwines Vncle) succeeding in the Province of Deira, and Eanfrit the Sonne of Ethelfrid the Wilde, in the Province of the Bernicians; these, with the rest of Ethelfrids Children, for the continuance of Edwins Raigne, had in banishment bene preferred among the Scots and Red-shanks, and there had receiued the Sacrament of Baptisme: but after the death of their Enemy, these Princes returned to their owne Country, and former superstitions, renouncing againe the profession of Christ. Yet this their Apostasie (saith Beda) remained not long unpunished: For Cadwallader King of the Brittaines, with wicked force, but with worthy vengeance, slew them both the next Sommer ensuing. Oftrike unprepared, and his whole Army perished in the Suburbs of their owne Citie, he miserably slew, and possessing the Province of the Northumbrians, not as a King or Conqueror, but rather like an outrageous Tyrant, destroyed and rent in tragickall manner, all things before him. Eanfled unadvisedly with twelve chosen persons comming to Cadwallader to intreat upon peace, were cruelly put to death. This yeere (saith he) continueth unhappy and hatefull even unto this day, as well for the Apostasie of these English Kings, as also for the Brittain Kings furious tyranny. Wherefore the Historiographers of that time have thought it best, that the memory of these Apostasie Kings being utterly forgotten, the selfsame yeere should be assigned to the Raigne of the next following King, Oswald, a man dearly beloved of God.

Oswald, the sonne of Wild Ethelfrid, and brother to King Eanfled, beganne his raigne ouer the Northumbrians Anno 634. having first embraced Christianity, and received Baptisme in Scotland, wherein hee was secured all the raigne of King Edwin, and had withall learned some experience in warre. Hee comming unlooked for with a small Armie, but fenced (saith Beda) with the Faith of Christ, obtained against Cedwall King of the Brittaines a great victorie: the manner whereof, with his other acts achieved, wee will further declare in his succession among the Monarches of the Englishmen, whereof hee was the ninth from Hengist.

He sent for Aidan, a Scottish Divine, to teach his people the Doctrine of Christ, enlarged his Kingdome, and reconciled the Deirians and Bernicians, who were at mortall enmitie. He was slaine, and cruelly rent in peeces by the vnmerefull Pagan Penda the Mercian, at Oswaldstree in Shropshire, quinto Augusti, the yeere of our Lord 642. when hee had raigned nine yeeres, and was buried at Bradney in Lincolnshire. His wife was Kneburg, the daughter of Kingils King of the West-Saxons; and his sonne Ethelwald, young at his death, and therefore defeated of his Kingdome by Oswy his Vncle, the Naturall Sonne of King Ethelfrid the Wild. Notwithstanding when Oswy King of Deira was murdered by this Oswy of Bernicia, and he not past sixteen yeeres of age, entred by force vpon Deira, and kept the same Province by strong hand so long as hee liued; and dying, left it to his colen Alsfred, the Naturall Sonne of the said King Oswy.

Oswy the illegitimate sonne of Ethelfrid the wild, at thirty yeeres of age succeeded King Oswald his brother in the Kingdome of the Bernicians; at whose entrance, Oswyne the sonne of Oftrike, that had denied the Faith, and was slaine of King Cedwall, raigned in Deira. This Oswyne was slaine by King Oswy: after whose death, seizing all Northumberland, he spread his terror further into other parts, and was the tenth Monarch of the Englishmen, as in his succession we will further speake. His wife was Eanfled, daughter to Edwin King of Northumberland, by whom he had many children. His raigne was 28. yeeres, and death the fifteenth day of Februarie, in the yeere of grace 670. and of his age 58.

Egfrid, the eldest sonne of King Oswy by Queene Eanfled, had bene Hostage in the Kingdome of Mercia, and after his father was made King of Northumberland, in the yeere of Christ 671. Hee warred, but with great losse, against Edilred King of Mercia, neere unto the Riuer of Trent, wherein his younger brother Elfwyne was unfortunately slaine, to the great griefe of both the Kings, the one being his owne brother, and the other his brother in law by marriage: whereupon a peace and reconciliation was made. But Egfrid being by nature of a disquiet disposition, invaded the Irish, and destroyed those harmlesse and filly people, which (as Beda saith) had bene great friends to the English. Their resistance consisted chiefly in curses and imprecations for reuenge, which though they could not open heauen, yet (saith hee) it is to be believed, that for their cause he was cut off the next yeere ensuing by the Picts or Red-shankes, against whom he prepared, contrary to the advice of his Counsell, and by them was slaine among the strait and waste mountains. 20. May the yeere of mans felicitie 685. and of his age fortie, after hee had raigned fifteen yeeres. His wife was Ethelred the daughter of Anna King of the East-Angles: shee was both Widow and Virgin; first married to Tonbert a Noble man that ruled the Girwy, a people inhabiting the Fenny Countries of Norfolk, Lincolne, Huntingdon, and Cambridge-shires; and after him also in virginitie continued twelue yeeres with her husband King Egfrid, contrarie to his minde, and the Apostles precept, that forbiddeth such defrauding either in man or woman, except it be with consent for a time, and to the preparatio of praier; affirming elsewhere, that Marriage is honourable, and the bed thereof undefiled, wherein the woman doth redeeme her transgression, through faith, loue, holinesse, and modestie, by bearing of children. This notwithstanding, she obtained licence to depart his Court, and got her to Coldingham Abby, where shee was professed a Nunne vnder Ebba the daughter of King Ethelfrid. Then went she to Ely, and new built a Monasterie, whereof shee was made Abbess, and wherein with great reuerence shee was intombd: whose vertues and remembrance remained to posterities by the name of S. Andrie, the being canonized among the Catalogue of English Saints.

Alsfred, the illegitimate sonne of King Oswy, in the raigne of his halfe-brother King Egfrid, whether willingly, or by violence constrained, liued like a banished man in Ireland, where applying himselfe to studie, hee became an excellent Philosopher, and (as Beda saith) was very conuerfant and learned in the Holy Scriptures, and therefore was made King ouer the Northumbrians: where with great widome, though not with so large bounds as others had enioied, hee worthily did recouer the decayed estate of that Province, ruling the same twenty yeeres and odd months, and departed this life, Anno 705. His Wife was Kneburg, the daughter of Penda King of the Mercians; and by her he had issue only one sonne, that succeeded him in his Kingdome.

Oswald, a child of eight yeeres in age, for the hopes conceiued from the vertues of his father, was made King ouer the Northumbrians; whose steps hee no wayes trod in, but rather in filchy abuse of his person and place, wallowed in all voluptuous pleasures and sensuall delight, violating the bodies of vailed Nunnes, and other religious holy women: wherein when he had spent eleuen yeeres more to his age, his kinsmen Kenred and Oftrike conspired against him, and in battle by his slaughter made an end of his impious life. His wife was Cuthburga, the sister of Inas King of the West-Saxons, as by the time may be gathered, from the computation of Marianne, and the Annales of the English-Saxons; who vpon a loathing wearinesse of wedlocke, sued out a diuorce from her husband, and built a Nunnery at Winburne in Dorsetshire, where in a religious habit shee ended her life, and hee by Kenred and Oftrike, leauing his Kingdome to them that wrought his death.

Kenred, the sonne of Cuthwyne, whose father was Leolwald the sonne of Egwald, and his father Adelst, the sonne of Oga, the naturall sonne of Ida, the first King of Deira, after the death of Ofred raigned two yeeres, no other remembrance left of him, besides the murder of his Soueraigne Lord and King.

Oftrike, after the death of Kenred, obtained the Kingdome of Northumberland, and raigned therein the space of eleuen yeeres, leauing to the world his name stained with blood in the murder of young Ofred, no other mention of parentage, wife, or issue of him remaining; for want whereof, hee adopted Ceolnulp, brother to his predecessor Kenred, and died lamented the yeere of Grace seuen hundred twentie nine.

Ceolnulp, the brother of Kenred, after the death of King Oftrike, was made King of the Northumbrians; which Province hee gouerned with great peace and victorie the space of eight yeeres: but then forsaking the Royall Estate and Robes of Maiestie, put on the habit of a Monke in the Ile of Lindesferne or Holy Land. These were the daies (saith Beda) wherein the acceptable time of peace and quietnesse was embraced among the Northumbrians, who now laid their armour aside, and applied themselves to the reading of holy Scriptures, more desirous to be professed in religious houses, then to exercise feats of warre, or of Armes. For not only Priests and Lay men vowed and performed Pilgrimages to Rome, but Kings, Queenes and Bishops also did the like: so great (so blinde I might say) a deuotion was in their hearts, and so holy a reuerence held they of the place. Vnto this King Ceolnulp, the said Venerable Beda (a Priest in the Monasterie of Peter and Paul at Werimouth neere vnto Durham) a great Clerke, and Writer of the English Historie, dedicated the same his Worke, which he continued till the yeere seuen hundred thirty one, and from the first entrance of the Saxons, containing 285. yeeres, according to his owne account.

Egbert, the sonne of Eata, who was brother to King Kenred, succeeded his vncle Ceolnulp in the Kingdome of Northumberland, and ruled the same with the like peace and pietie, the time of twenty yeeres; and then following his example, also forooke the world, and wore himselfe a Monke, as diuers other Kings in those daies had done, whereof Simon Dunelmensis writeth, and noteth their number to bee eight: as Inas King of the West-Saxons, Ethelred and Kenred Kings of Mercia, Sigebert King of the East-Angles, Sebbi and Offa Kings of the East-Saxons, and Ceolnulp and this Egbert Kings of the Northumbrians. These forsaking the world (as they tooke it) left the Charge that God vpon them had imposed, whose authoritie in earth they swaied, and wherein they might much more haue aduanced Gods glory and Christs Gospel, then for a more easie and priuate life, not warranted by his word, but rather disliked, and perhaps foreshewed by those heauenly creatures the Sunne and Moone, which in those daies were fearfully darkned, and for a time seemed to haue lost their light: for Anno 733. 18. Calend. Septemb. the Sunne suffred so great an Eclipse, that the earth seemed to be ouer-shadowed as with sack-cloth. And Anno 756. 8. Calend. Decemb. the Moone being in her full, appeared both darke and bloody; for a Starre (though there be none lower then the Moone) seemed to follow her, and to deprive her of light: but passing before her, shee againe recouered her former brightnesse. This King Egbert had a brother that bore the same name, and was installed Arch-bishop of Yorke, where he erected a beautiful Librarie (a worke well befitting a Noble Prelate) and plentifully stored it with an infinite number of learned bookes. His sonne was Ofswulf, that succeeded in the Kingdome.

Ofswulf, when his father Egbert had put off the Robes of Maiestie, and clad himselfe with a Monkes Cowle, ascended the Throne of Northumberland, and fate therein only one yeere: for before hee had made attempt of any memorable act, hee was traiterously murdered by his own seruants at Mikilwong-ton, the ninth Kalends of August, leauing the Crown vndisposed of vntill the Nones of the same month in the next yeere.

Edilwald or Mollo was then made King of Northumberland, and with great valiancie defended his subiects. Some say, that at the end of six yeeres hee reigned his gouernment; yet others affirme his raig to be eleuen yeeres, and lastly that hee was slaine by Alured his Successour.

Alured, the murderer of his Lord and Master, beganne his raigne ouer the kingdome of Northumberland, the yeere of Christs Incarnation seuen hundred sixty sixe, and continued the same with such dislikes, that hee lastly was expelled out of the Province by his own subiects, & enforced to abandon the same. He was the son of Tanwin, the son of Bichenom, the son of Bofa, the son of Alirick, the naturall son of Ida, the first King of Bernicia. And the sonnes of this Alured were Ofred, afterwards King of Northumberland, and Alnnud, slaine by the Danes, and canonized a Saint.

Ethelred, the sonne of Mollo, was aduanced to the Regiment of Northumberland, and in the fifth yeere of his raigne, was driuen out of the same by Edelbald and Herebert, two Dukes that warred against him; who hauing discomfited and slaine his Generall and fouldiers in a fierce battell, so weakened the hopes of King Ethelred, that he fled his Country, and left the Kingdome in a miserable estate, through the dissensions of those ambitious Princes.

Alfwald the brother of the foresaid King Alured, aspiring to the Soueraignty of the Northumbrians, ruled the same in great Iustice, to his worthy commendations: notwithstanding the wickednes of his people was such, that without all guilt hee was traiterously murdered by the conspiracie of Siga, 23. Sept. the yeere of Christs Incarnation, seuen hundred eighty eight, after hee had raigned eleuen yeeres, and his body buried at Hexham. His sonnes were Alfus and Alfwyn, both slaine by King Ethelred.

Oswald the sonne of King Alured, tooke vpon him the Rule of Northumberland, the yeere of grace seuen hundred eighty nine, and the same yeere finished his gouernment thereof, being expelled by his subiects, and deprived of all kingly authority.

Ethelred the sonne of Mollo, reuoked from exile wherein he had liued the space of twelue yeeres, was againe restored to the Crowne; but he minding the injuries that his Lords had formerly done him, sought the reuenge by their deaths, as also to establish his Throne the surer, slew Alfus and Alfwyn, the sons of Alfwald, as wee haue said, the right heires to the Crowne, and inticing Ethelred the former deposed King into his danger, commanded him to be put to death at Cuthburga, the fourteenth of September, and yeere of Christ seuen hundred ninety two. And to strengthen himselfe the more against all his opposites, the same yeere he married Lady Elsted, the second Daughter to great Offa King of Mercia, forsaking his former Wife without any iust cause giuen on her part.

These things fate so neere the hearts of his subiects, that after seuen yeeres from his second establishment, they rebelliously rose in Armes, and at Cobre miserably slew him the eighteenth day of Aprill, the yeere of Christ leif 794.

After whose death, the Northumbrians were fore molested with many intruders, or rather Tyrants, that banded for the soueraignty the space of thirty yeeres. The first whereof was Ofswald, that held the title of King only twenty eight daies, & then was forced to faue his life by flight vnto the King of the Picts. Next, Ardlwisa Duke, reuoked from exile: then Alfwold, Eandred, Ethelred, Readulph, Osbert, and Elle, slaine by the Danes in Yorke at a place, first Elle his slaughter called to this day Elle-Croffe, and the Kingdome yeelded to the protection of Egbert King of the West-Saxons, who was now become Englands first absolute Monarch, (as holding all the rest of the Kings no longer for his Associates, but his subiects) in the yeere nine hundred twentie fix, after it had stood in forme of a Kingdome three hundred twenty nine yeeres, and was made a Province, and ioined with the rest vnto the English Monarchie.

THE CIRCVIT AND SVCCESSORS OF THE MERCIAN KINGDOME, VN- TILL IT WAS SVBIJECTED TO THE WEST-SAXONS.

CHAPTER X.

His Kingdome of Mercia contained more Counties, and the skirts of that royall Tent were spread with a wider compasse then any of the rest in the Saxons Heptarchie: for in the middelt of the Iland this Kingdome was seated, and from the verge of Northumberland touched some part of Middlesex, which was the possession of the East-Saxons: the North thereof was bounded with Humber and Mersey; the East was inclosed with the German Ocean; the West extended to Seuerne and Dee; and the South part neerly touched the River of Thames; containing the Counties now known by these names, of Cheshire, Darby-shire, Nottingham, Stafford, and Shrop-shire; Northampton, Leicesters, Lincoln, Huntingdon, and Rutland-shires; Warwick, Worcester, Oxford, and Gloucesters-shires; Buckingham, Bedford, and part of Hertford-shire. The first raiser of that Title and name of a Kingdome, was Crida, the sonne of Kemwald, who was the sonne of Cnebba, the sonne of Ichell, the sonne of Eomer, the sonne of Engengate, the sonne of Offa, the sonne of Weremund, the sonne of Wihleg, the sonne of Waga, the sonne of Wethelgate, the third of the five sonnes of Prince Woden. This man, without more fame of his further acts, is said to have reigned the space of ten yeeres, and to haue died Anno 594. His issue was Wibba that succeeded him in his Kingdome, and a daughter named Quenburge, matched in marriage with Edwin afterwards King of Northumberland, with whom she lived in the Court of King Redwald in the time of his troubles, and died before him in that his banishment. She bore him two sonnes, Osfrid and Edfride, as in the succession of Edwin's Monarchy shall be shewed: notwithstanding Beda reporteth this Quenburge to be daughter of Ceorle the third King of Mercia, and grand-child to this first Crida.

Wibba, the sonne of King Crida, not onely held what his Father had gotten, but also enlarged his dominions by intrusion vpon the weak Britanes. His issue was Penda, Kemwald, and Eoppa, all three Progenitors of Kings afterwards in that kingdome, with a daughter named Sexburg, married to Kemwald, King of the West-Saxons, whom he without iust cause diuorced from him; for which cause great troubles afterwards ensued, as in the reignes of those Kings we haue said. He in great honour reigned twenty yeeres, and giuing place vnto nature, left his kingdome to be inioied by another.

Ceorl, not the son, but the Nephew of King Wibba, succeeded in the dominions of the Mercians, about the yeere of grace six hundredth and fourteenth. He was sonne to Kinemund, the brother of Wibba, the younger sonne of King Crida, who was the first King of that kingdome. His reign is set to be ten yeeres, without mention either of A or Issue.

Penda, the sonne of Wibba, beganne his reign over the Mercians the yeere of Christs Incarnation six hundred twenty six, & continued the same the space of thirty yeeres. He was a man violent in action, and merciless in condition, cruell and vsatiare of blood: he shooke the Cities, and disturbed the borders of the Saxon-Kings, more then any other in that Heptarchie before him had done. Against Kingils and Quincheline, Kings together of the West-Saxons, he ioined battell neere vnto the Citie Cirencester, where both the parties fought it out to the vtmost, with the effusion of much Saxons blood: but those comming to concord, he with Cadwalla King of the Britanes, slew in battell Edwine and Oswald, Kings of Northumberland, Sigebert, Egfrid, and Anna, Kings of the East-Angles, and forced Kemwald King of the West-Saxons out of his Country, in quarrell of his Sister. Of these his prosperities he became so proud, that hee thought nothing impossible for his achievement; and therefore threatening the destruction of the Northumbres, prepared his Army for that expedition. Osfrid then reigning King of that Country, proffered great summes of mony, and most precious Jewels to purchase his peace: which being refused, and the battell ioined, more by the hand of God, then power of man, this Tyrant was slaine, and his whole Army discomfited. His Wife was Kingwith, and issue by her Penda, who after him was King: Vulfere and Ethelred, both Monarchs of the English; Aethelhel, a man famous for his great holinesse, and Aethelwald that gouerned some part of Mercia, whose Wife was Edburge, the foundresse of Minster in Tanet, and daughter to Egbert King of Kent; by whom he had issue Mercin, a man of noted deuotion, Milburie, and Mildgith, both holy Virgins, and Mildrith also Abbess of Tanet, all foure canonized for Saints. The daughters of King Penda, were Kineburg, the Wife of Alkfrid, King of Northumberland, afterward a Potestesse in Kinesburg Abby, and Kinewith, who married Offa King of the East-Angles, and became also a Nunne with her sister Kineburg.

Penda, the sonne of King Penda, in the daies of his father, and with his permission, had gouerned the middle part of Mercia, and after his death, by the gift of Osfrid of Northumberland, all the South of that kingdome kingdome from the Riuer Trent, vpon coposition to marrie his daughter, and to embrace Christianity; which thing this Penda performed, and was the first Christian King of the Mercians. His Baptisme received, to witnesse the first fruits of his profession, hee laid the foundation of a faire Church at Medeshamsted, now called Peterborough, but liued not to finish the same, for that he was slaine by the treason of Alkfred his wife in the celebration of Easter, (as Beda saith) hauing had no issue by her. But Robert de Swynham (an Author of good antiquity, who saw the stones of that foundation to be so huge, as that eight yoke of Oxen could hardly draw one of them) saith, that Penda was brought to his end by the practise of his Mother, and not of his Wife; as in these his words is manifest. Penda (saith he) laid the foundation of a Monastery at Medeshamsted, in the Girutans or Een-Country, which he could not finish, for that by the wicked practise of his Mother, hee was made away. Whereby this blot is taken from this Christian Lady, and brands the face of her that most deserueth it. This King reigning as substitute to King Osfrid of Northumberland aforesaid, by some is not accounted for a Mercian King, his regiment resting vnder the command of another.

Vulfere, the Brother of murdered Penda, set vp by the Mercians against King Osfrid, procured a Prince most valiant and fortunate. For hee expelled the Northumbrians Lieutenants forth of those dominions; fought victoriously against Kemwald King of the West-Saxons; conquered the Isle of Wight, and attained to be sole Monarch of the Englishmen: whereof more shall be said when wee come to the times and successions of their reignes.

This Vulfere is said to reigne in great honour for seuentene yeeres, and his body to bee buried in the Monasterie of Peterborough, which he had founded. His Queene Ermenheld after his death, became a Nunne at Ely, vnder her Mother Sexburg, and there died. His children were Kenred, Vulfald, and Kinf, with a daughter, named Wereburg, a Nunne in the Monastery of Ely.

Ethelred the third sonne of King Penda, in the Enage of yong Kenred the sonne of Vulfere, (who in his tender yeeres rather desired a priuate life then any publike authority in the Common-weale) succeeded his brother both in the Kingdome of Mercia, and Monarchy of the Englishmen. But when hee had reigned thirty yeeres, gaue ouer the Crowne to his Nephew the third Kenred, and became a Monke in the Monastery of Bradney in Lincoln-shire, where hee died Anno 716. His Wife was Osfride, Daughter to Osfrid King of Northumberland; and issue, Ethelred, that succeeded Kenred in the Mercian kingdome.

Kenred the sonne of Vulfere, (his Vncle Ethelred changing his Princely Crown for a Monks Coule) beganne his Raigne ouer the Mercians, and his Monarchy ouer the English, Anno 704. wherein he reigned the space of foure yeeres, and then with like deuotion of those times, addicted to an easie and quiet Religion, abandoned both Crowne and Country, and went to Rome, where of Pope Constantine hee received the tonsure and habit of a Monke at the Apostles Tombs, and entering a Monastery, therein spent other foure yeeres of his life to the day of his death, which was Anno 708. hauing had neither wife nor issue to reuiue his name, or to rule his kingdome.

Ethelred receiving the resignation of Kenred his Cousin-german when he went to Rome, and of sufficient yeeres and discretion to haue succeeded Ethelred his Father, what time the said Kenred was ordained King, reigned with great valour ouer the Mercians, and was likewise Monarch ouer the Englishmen. His peace was disquieted by Inas & his West-Saxons, who for seuen yeeres continuance invaded his kingdome. His Wife was Wereburg, saith Mariannus and Florentius the Monke, who alcribe to her a long life, and to die without Children. This Ethelred reigned the space of eight yeeres, and died the yeere of grace seuen hundred and fiftenth: whose body was buried in the Cathedrall Church of Lechfeld.

Ethelbald, after the death of Ethelred, was made King of the Mercians, and Monarch of the English, the yeere of Christs Incarnation seuen hundred sixtenth. He was a Prince giuen to peace, but withall a most lasciuious Adulterer: insomuch that Boniface Archbishop of Mentz wrote his Epistle vnto him in reprehension of the same, which took such effect, that in repentance of his foule facts, hee founded the Monasterie of Crowland, driuing in mighty Piles of Oake into that moorish ground, whereon hee laid a great and goodly building of stone. He was the son of Alwy, the elder sonne of Eoppa, the second sonne of King Wibba, the brother of King Penda: and reigned fortie two yeeres, in the end whereof he was slaine in a battell fought against Cuthred King of the West-Saxons, at Secondone; three miles from Tamworth, the yeere of Christs Incarnation hundred fiftie five, and was buried at Repton in Darby-shire, hauing had neither Wife nor Children.

Offa slaying Bernred the murderer of King Ethelbald, entered vpon the gouernment of the Mercians, and the Monarchy of the Saxons, Anno 758. He enlarged his dominion vpon the Britanes, ouercame the Kentish in a battell, put to flight the Northumbrians, and vanquished the West-Saxons: the East-Angles also he seized vpon, after hee had murdered Ethelbert their King. He reigned thirty nine yeeres, and died at Ostry, the nine and twenty day of Iuly, the yeere of our Lord seuen hundred ninetie foure, and was buried without the Town of Bedford, in a Chapell, now swallowed vp by the Riuer Ouse. He was the son of Thingfrid, the sonne of Eanulfe, whose Father Osfrid was the sonne of Eoppa, the brother of King Penda, and son of King Wibba, whose Father was Crida, the first King of the Mercians. His Wife was Quendred, and children many; of whom, and of them we will further speake when we come to the time of his Monarchy.

Esfride, the sonne of great Offa, was by him made King at his returne from Rome, being the only issue of his parents, and heire apparant to the Saxons Monarchy, vpon which hee entered the day after his fathers death, and liued himselfe but a hundred and fortie daies after, deceasing the fiftenth of December, in the yeere of our Lord God seuen hundred ninetie six, hauing had neither wife nor issue that wee reade of, and his body honourably interred in the Church of the Monasterie of Saint Albanes, founded by Offa.

Kenwolve, the cosen (a farre off) to King Esfrid deceased, and both of them remoued in blood no lesse then six descents from Wibba the second Mercian King, was the sonne of Cuthbert, (as the Monke of Worcester deriues him) the sonne of Basfa, the sonne of Kenwolve, the sonne of Kentwin, the sonne of Kenwall, the sonne of Wibba aforesaid, and succeeded King Esfrid in his Dominions. But of this Mercian Monarch more shall be written in the succession and time of that his gouernment. Hee reigned two and twentie yeeres, and deceased the yeere of our Lord eight hundred and ninetene, and his bodie interred in the Monasterie of Winchcombe in the Countie of Gloucester, being of his owne foundation. His wife was Quene Esfride, the daughter (as some suppose) of Offa, who had bene betrothed to Ethelbert King of the East-Angles, slaine by her father; by whom he had issue, Kenelm, Quendred, and Burgemild, of whom more followeth.

Kenelm, the sonne of King Kenwolve, a child of seuen yeeres old, succeeded in the Kingdome of Mercia, but not in the Monarchie, as his fathers had done, Egbert the West-Saxon at that time being grown great in his fortunes. This yong King Kenelm reigned only five moneths, and then by the ambitious desire of Quendred his sister, who seeking the gouernment by the shedding of his guiltlesse blood, instigated one Askerth his Instructor, by promises of great preferments and rich rewards, to make him away, who only stood (as he thought) in her way to the Crowne. This wicked practise was forthwith as impiously performed: for hauing him forth vnder pretence of hunting

ting, he flew the innocent King, whose vertuous inclination promised great hopes, and whose harmlesse yeeres had not attained to any worldly guile. His bodie hee secretly buried vnder a bush, and (if we beleue the Golden Legend, where his life is described) was thus found out: A white Dove (which belike had scene the deed done) and had got it ingrossed in a scrole of parchment, posted therewith to S. Peter in Rome, and vpon the High Altar laid it to bee read, where in the Saxon characters thus it was found: In Cleac kon had Kenelme Kinbapne lies vnder the thorne, hee was beheaded; that is, At Cleac in a Cow pasture Kenelme the Kings child lieth beheaded under a thorne. But most true it is, that an obscure sepulcher the body had at the first, and howsoever found out, was afterwards with great honour and ceremonie translated to the Monastrie of Wincheombe, which his father had founded. The murderesse Queendrid, for grieue and shame of so wicked an act, ended her life, without the attaining of her ambitious desire, and hath left her name indelebly stained with his innocent blood.

VVithlafe, the sonne of Oswald, the sonne of Osther, of the Mercian blood-royall, intruding himselfe (as it seemeth) into the government of Mercia, was vnspectedly vanquished by Egbert the Monarch that had assumed from Bernulfe that Kingdome before: him hee made his Substitute and Tributarie, who so continued to Egbert and his sonne the time of thirteen yeeres, leauing no other relation off his acts. His issue was Wigmund, the husband of Lady Elfred, the daughter of Ceolwulfe King of Mercia, the parents of Wyssan the Martyr, and of Lady Edburg, married to one Ethelstan Earle in the Prouince of Lincolne.

Bernulfe vpon the like composition of Tribute, and in the like termes of subiection to the West-Saxons soueraintie, held the kingdome of Mercia as a Substitute, and without any notable reports of his Acts, so reigned the space of thirteen yeeres. At this time the Sea-rouers out of Denmarke, that had often infested this Iland with their many Inuasions, got the head so strong, and wing so farre, even to the middle part thereof, (as this of Mercia was) that they filled with terror the hearts of the Inhabitants, and stained the soile with the blood of their sides, which in a most barbarous crueltie daily they shed; whose rage was so great, and mindes so vnstable, that Bernulfe was enforced to forsake the Country, and in a more private estate to secure his owne life. He had a sonne named Berefred, who was the causer of Saint Wyssans martyrdome.

Burdred, the last Mercian King, was thereunto deputed by Ethelwulfe the West-Saxon Monarch, as a shield of defence against the raging Danes, that made desolations where they came. In continuall impliments against them he spent his time, and that with such noble resolutions and manhood, that Ethelwulfe held him worthy of his alliance, and made him his sonne in law, by giuing him Lady Ethelswith his daughter to Wife, the marriage being solemnized at Chipham in Wiltshire, with great estate. This Burdred with Ethelwulfe, wared against the Brittaines with victorie, and he with Alured compelled the Danes vnder the conduct of Hunger and Vbba, to dislodge from Nottingham, and depart the Prouince. Yet lastly, after twenty two yeeres raigme, hee was so ouerlaid with their daily supplies, that three of their Kings (as our Writers terme them) whose names were Godrun, Eske, and Ammon, wintred at Ripidon, and sore wasted his Kingdome.

King Burdred at that time distressed, and himselfe not able to withstand their rage, with his wife Queene Ethelswith fled the Realme, and the same yeere in Rome ended his life, and was buried in the Church of our Lady belonging to the English College there erected. His Queene in the habit of a Nunne, fifteen yeeres after his death, died at Padua in Italie, and was there honourably buried, the yeere of our Lord eight hundred eighty nine. And now the fatal circle of this Kingdome drawne to the full compass, staid the hand of all glorious motion from proceeding any further, and with the lot of the rest fell vnder the government of the West-Saxons, after one yeere vsurpation of the Danes, when it had stood in state of a kingdome the space of two hundred and two yeeres, and ended in title and regall authority, the yeere of Christs Incarnation eight hundred eighty six.

THE KINGDOME OF THE EAST-ANGLE, THE CIRCVIT OF THAT PROVINCE, WITH THE SVCCESION AND ACTS OF THEIR KINGS, SO LONG AS IT STOOD IN THAT REGALL ESTATE, AND VNTILL IT WAS VNITED TO THE WEST-SAXONS.

CHAPTER XI.

He Counties (as we now call them) that were subiect to this East-Angles Kingdome, were Suffolke, Norfolke, Cambridge-shire, and the Ile of Ely. The bounds whereof were limited in this manner: the East and North sides were confined by the Oce, the West, with Saint Edmunds Ditch, and the South altogether with Essex, and some part of Hertfordshire.

The first raiser of the title and State of this Kingdome, was a Saxon Captaine named Vffa, about the yeere of Christs Incarnation five hundred seuentie yeere, whose renowne was such, that he gaue name not onely to that his aspired Dominion, but also from him, the Subjects thereof were a long time after called Vffians: though lastly, it was reduced into the name and Kingdome of the East-Angles. This Vffa (as Florentius the Monke of Worcester hath laid downe) was the sonne of Withelin, and he the sonne of Hripus, the sonne of Rothmund, the sonne of Trigils, the sonne of Titmon, the sonne of Cafer, the second sonne of Prince woden. His raigme is accounted only seven yeeres, without any mention of further matter, worthy the recording, and his death to haue hapned in the yeere five hundred eighty one.

Titulus, the second King of the East-Angles, and onely sonne of Vffa that is read of, beganne his raigme the yeere of Christs Incarnation, five hundred eighty three, & continued the same for the space of twenty yeeres. And although the Writers of these times haue made no further mention of his Acts, yet may we well suppose that his daies were not altogether so quietly spent, both in the infancy of that newly erected kingdom, and when such wars were commenced for the obtaining the whole Iland. His issue was Redwald, that immediately succeeded him, & from whom other Kings of that kingdom were lineally descended.

Redwald, the greatest of all the East-Angles Kings, succeeded his father Titulus in the Dominions of the East-Angles, and Ethelbert of Kent in the Monarchie of the Saxons. He received and succoured in his Court Edwyne with his wife in their Exiles, and assisted him against Ethelfrid King of Northumberland, that sought his life, as before we haue shewed, and hereafter in the succession of his Monarchy we shall haue further occasion. Hee reigned Monarch eight yeeres, and King of the East-Angles thirty one (by the account and computation of the Table annexed to Malmesbury, and others of our English Writers) and died the yeere of our Saluation six hundred twenty three.

Erpenwald, the younger sonne of King Redwald, (Reynhere his elder brother being slaine in battle by Ethelfred, in the quarrell of distressed Edwyne) succeeded his Father in the Kingdom of the East-Angles, the yeere of our Lord God six hundred twenty four. He was the first King of that Prouince, that publicly professed the Christian Faith, which hee received at the friendly motion and zealous exhortation of King Edwyne of Northumberland, but so much to the discontentment & grudge of the people, as thereupon they presently entered into conspiracy to practise his death, which a Paga Ruffian named Richebert, not long after most traitorously executed. His raigme is placed in the foresaid Table of our Writers, (as it is compared with the other Kings of those times) to extend twelue yeeres; after whose death, those people returned to their wonted Idolatry, and for three yeeres continuance embraced their former Genitility, from which they were reclaimed by Sigebert his brother in law, who succeeded him in his Throne, hee hauing no issue, to whom it might be left.

Sigebert, the sonne of the second wife to Redwald, and by her born to a former husband, whose name is vnkowne, was greatly mistrusted by his Father in law, King Redwald, that hee went about to aspire his Crowne: the motives of which suspition, notwithstanding all the endeauours of innocent Sigebert, were still followed with an enuious eye, and his subiectiue semblances, as notes of popularity, were euer conceived to aime at the supreme authority: which blot of ialousie, when it could no otherwise be wiped out, hee abandoned the Court of the King, and Country of his birth, and in France as an exile, at the time of Redwald the Father, and likewise the raigme of Erpenwald the sonne, spent his time in study of good Literature, & contemplatiue exercises, where learning the truth of Christs Doctrine, and hauing received the lauer of Baptisme, after the death of this said Erpenwald his allied Brother, returned, and was made King of the East-Angles.

France, brought the light of the Gospell into his Dominions, and by the assistance of Felix Bishop of Dunwich, for a more firme plantation thereof, built a Schoole for the education of children, appointing them Schoole-masters and Teachers after the manner of the Kentish-men; who are supposed to haue at that time the Liberal Sciences professed among them, in their Metropolitane City Canterbury, which was the paterne (saith that Country Petrumbulator) that this Sigebert followed in the erection of his; but whether at Cambridge or elsewhere, hee leaueeth for Dofor Caius of Cambridge, and M. Key of Oxford, to be disputed of. And indeed Beda assigneth not the place for this foundation, nor once nameth Cambridge, vntlesse you will say, that out of the ruines of Granteester, an ancient Citie decayed in his daies, the same arose, and whereof hee maketh mention in his fourth Booke, vpon this occasion as followeth.

Queene Etheldred (saith he) that had been a Virgin, wife to Egfrid King of Northumberland the tearme of twelue yeeres, and Abbesse of Ely for seuen more, for her reputed holinesse after her death and buriall, was thought worthy by Queene Sexburg her sister (who had bene wife to Ercombert King of Kent, and succeeded her Abbesse in the same Monastierie) to be remooued out of her wooden Tombe & meane place of buriall, into the Church and richer Monument: but for want of stone, which was scarce in those parts, certaine brethren were sent to find out some for that vie, who comming to Granteester, a little Citie left desolate and vninhabited, found by the walles a Tomb of white marble verie faire, and covered with a like stone. This they thought to be found not without miracle, and therefore most fit to intombe her corps, which accordingly they did. But that this had bene the place of Sigeberts Schoole, hee mentioneth not. But whether by him or no, wee know it now the other Uniuersity of England, a seed-plot of all diuine and humane Literature, and one of those springs whence issue the wholesome waters that doe bedewe both the Church & Common-wealth, both, famous for the Arts, for Buildings, and Reuenues, as their like is not to be found in Europe (saith Peter Martyr) and that most truly. But to returne: Sigebert being wearied with the weighty affairs of this world, laid the burden thereof vpon Egrike his kinsman, and shored himselfe a Monk in the Abby of Cumbeburge, which himselfe had built, & wherein he liued, vntill that wicked Penda, the Mercian King, with his heathenish cruelty molested the peace of the East-Angles, who after long resistance, finding themselves too weak, besought Sigebert, for the better incouragement of their souldiers, to shew himselfe in field; which when he refused, by constraint (saith Beda) they drew him forth, where in the midst of them hee was slaine in battle, vying no other weapon for defence, sauing only a white wand; when hee had raigned onely three yeeres, and left no issue to successe him, that is any where recorded.

Egrike, cousin to King Sigebert, and by him made King, as wee haue said, was fore molested by the continuall inuasions of Penda, the cruell King of Mercia; who lastlie in a late battle flew him with Sigebert, about the yeere of Christs incarnation fixe hūdrē fifty two. And when himselfe had raigned 4. yeeres, deceased, without mentio either of wife or child, that is read of, further to reuie his memory to posterities.

Anna succeeded King Egrike in the Kingdome of the East-Angles, the yeere of grace fix hundred fortie two, as the next in blood to Erpimwald, being the sonne of Guudo, saith Beda, the sonne of Eni, saith Alamestide, who was brother to great Redwald; and both of them the sons of Titus, the second King of that Prouince. This King, as the other two former had done, felt the fury of raging Penda, with his mercelless Mercians, that fore assaulted his Territories with rapine and spoile. To withstand whole further proceedings, King Anna drew the strength of this East-Angles against them, and encountred Penda in a great and mortall battle, wherein they were all discomfited and himselfe among them slaine, when hee had raigned in continuall trouble the space of thirteene yeeres. His issue were many, and those of great holinesse or sanctity of life. Whereof Ferminus the eldest, and heire apparent, was slaine by Penda in the same battle with his Father, and was with him buried in Blidriburgh, now Bilbrough, but afterwards remooued to S. Edmondsburie. His other sonne was Erkenwald, Abbat of Cherside, and Bishoppe of London, that lieth buried in the South Ile, about the Quire in S. Pauls Church, where to this day remaineth a memoriall of him. His daughters were these; Etheldrid the eldest, was first married vnto a Nobleman, whom Beda nameth Tenbert, Governour of the Fenny Countreies of Northfolke, Huntington, Lincolne, and Cambridge-shires: and after his death remaining a virgin, she was married to Egfrid King of Northumberland, with whom likewise she liued in perfect virginity the space of twelue yeeres, notwithstanding his intractable and allurements to the contrary. From whom, lastlie, she was released, and had licence to depart his Court, vnto the Abbey of Coldinghithe, where first she was vailed a Nunne vnder Abbesse Ethba, and thence departing, she liued at Ely, and became her selfe Abbesse thereof, wherein lastlie she died, and was interred; remembered vnto posterities by the name of S. Andrie. His second daughter was Sexburg, who married Ercombert, King of Kent, vnto whom the bare two sons, and two daughters, as we in that Kingdome succession haue shewed: after whose death, she tooke the habit of a Nunne, and succeeded her sister Etheldrid, Abbesse of Ely, wherein she died and was interred; and their youngest filter Withgith, was likewise a Menchion with them in the same Monastierie, and all of them canonized for Saints. Ethilburg his third daughter was made Abbesse of Berking, neere London, built by her brother Bishop Erkinwald, wherein she liued, and lastlie died. A naturall daughter likewise he had, whose name was Edelburg, that with Sedrid the daughter of his wife, were both of them professed Nunnies, and succeeded each other Abbesse in the Monastierie of S. Briges in France. Such a reputed holinesse was it held in those daies, not only to be separated from the accompanying with men, wherunto women by God were created, but also to abandon the Country of their nativity, and as strangers in forraine Lands, to spend the continuance of their liues.

Ethelherd, the brother of Anna, the yeere of Christs Incarnation fix hundred fifty four, was made King of the East-Angles: the which it seemeth he had attempted in the raigne of his brother, for that hee had assisted Penda in his warres against him; and was the motiue (saith Beda) of the warres against Offin King of Northumberland, wherein siding with the heathen Penda, he was worthily slaine, the fifteenth day of November, when hee had raigned onely two yeeres, leaving his name to the blot of infamy, and his Crowne to be possessed by his younger brother. His wife was Herefrith sister of Hilda, the famous learned Abbesse of Streanhsale, and great grand-child to Edwyne King of Northumberland, who bare vnto him Aldufe, Elfwolfe, and Beorne, all three succeeding Ethilwald in the Kingdome of the East-Angles.

Edwald the brother of Ethelherd entred his gouernment of the East-Angles the yeere of our Lord six hundred fifty sixe, and continued the same the space of nine yeeres, without either mention of any other memorable act: from whom (as is supposed) issued Ethelred that succeeded King after Beorne.

Aldufe, the eldest sonne of Ethelherd and Queene Herefrith, after the death of his vnkle King Edwald, obtained the Kingdome of the East-Angles, and therein raigned without any honour or honourable action by him performed: onely his name and time of his raigne, which was ninetene yeeres, is left of him by Writers: and affordeth no further relation of vs here to be inferred, besides his Coine here set.

the Kingdome of the East-Angles, the yeere of Christs Incarnation, six hundred eighty three, and continued in the same, the time of seuen yeeres, without record of any memorable Act, Wife, or Issue, to reuie his name.

Beorne, the youngest sonne of King Ethelherd, succeeded his brother King Elfwolfe in the Kingdome of the East-Angles: no further mention being made of him, his wife, nor Issue, which areal together perished, and laid long since in their graues of obliuion. Ethelred, after the death of his cousin Beorne, succeeded him in the Kingdome of the East-Angles, as is supposed) from King Edelwald the brother of Ethelherd, and of Anna, both of them Kings in that Prouince. His raigne by writers is said to bee fiftie two yeeres, which notwithstanding was passed ouer without any memorable note: for albeit that his gouernment was long, and the declining Heptarchie not vnlike to haue ministred matters of remembrance to posterities, yet is the same passed ouer by the silence of four Writers, and no further mention made of him, besides the education of his younger sonne Ethelbert, who proved a most worthy King. His wife, and the mother of this vertuous sonne, was Leofrun, saith the Writer of his life, without further mention of her parentage, or other issue. This King deceased the yeere after Christs nativity, seuen hundred forty eight, the same yeere that Ethelbert entred his Kingdome of Kent.

Ethelbert, the sonne of King Ethelred, after his Fathers death was ordained King of the East-Angles, whose daies of youth were spent in learning and deeds of charity, and the whole time of his gouernment in continuall tranquillity; for hee is recorded to be a Prince religious and charitable, sober, profound and wife in counsell. This King being incited by Offa the Mercian (that still thirsted after greatness) to marie Elfwolfe his daughter, a Lady of great beautie, came vpon that purpose to Offa his Court, then seated at Sutton Wallis in the County of Hereford, and was by him there cruelly murdered at the instigation of Quendrid his vnkle (intended) mother in law, no other occasion ministred, but the greatnes of his Port, that much in her eyes over-heighted her husbands. His Bride-bed the graue was first at Morden, north from Sutton vpon the Riuer Lug. But afterwards vpon repentance, Offa remooued it vnto Hereford; ouer whom, Milfrid an vnder King of the Mercians built a most faire Church in memoriall of him, which yet beares his name, and is the Cathedral of that See. His Bride, Lady Elfwolfe, much lamenting his contriued murder, withdrew her self to Croyland in the Fennes, and there vowed chastitie all the daies of her life; notwithstanding some affirme that shee was wife to King Kenwolfe, the successor of her brother Egfrid. This King raigned the space of forty fve yeeres, as is set in the Table of our English Writers, and died the yeere of Christs incarnation seuen hundred ninety three, the eighteenth day of May, and his Kingdome intruded vpon by the Mercians, hauing had neither wife nor children, that Historians make mention of: after whose death the Kingdome of the East-Angles was brought to decay, both by the Mercians, West-Saxons, and them of Kent; so that by means of their violence, that Prouince was destitute of her owne Gouernours, the space of seuentie seuen yeeres, vntill lastly the assaults of the Danes, a new-come Guest and most dangerous Enemy, caused the other Kings to stand vpon their Guards, and rather to defend what they already had gotten, then to seeke enlargement, to the hazard of all: at which time, it is said one Offa, to whom the right of that Crowne belonged, vpon a religious deuotion, tooke his pilgrimage to the Sepulchre of Christs, and visiting in his way a kinsman of his, whose name was Alkmund, at the Citie Norherberge in Saxonia, there made his will, wherein hee adopted young Edmund his heire, the son of Alkmund, and accomplishing his volage, in his return died at the Port Saint George, from whence hee sent young Edmund his Ring, and therewith ordained him King of the East-Angles. Alkmund a Prince of great power in those parts, maintained his sons rightfull election, and with a sufficient power sent him to claime the kingdome. These landing in the East of England, at a place called Maydenborne, built a roiall Tower, which hee named, and to this day is called, Hunstantone, situated vpon the North-west point of Norfolke, that beareth likewise his owne name.

Edmund thus arrived, was as willingly recciued and by the East-Angles made their king, in whose time Hungar and Hubba, two Danish Captains, with an innumerable multitude of Heathen Danes, entred the Land at the mouth of Humber, and from thence inuaded Nottingham, Torke and Northumberland, where (without respect of age or sex) they laid all wast, and left the Land whence they departed like to a desolate Wildernesse. From thence they came with the like furie into Edmunds territories, and sacked Thetford a frequent City in those daies; but hee not able to withstand their violence, fled into his Castle at Framingham, wherein hee was of them besieged, and lastlie, taken (saith Abba Floriacensis) in a village then called Heglsdunne, of a wood bearing the same name, or rather yielded himselfe to their torments, to saue more Christian blood, for it is recorded, that because of his most constant Faith and Profession, those Pagans first beat him with bats, then scourged him with whips, hee still calling vpon the name of Iesus for rage whereof, they bound him to a stake, and with their arrowes shot him to death, and cutting off his head, contemptuously threw it into a bush, after hee had raigned ouer the East-Angles the space of sixteene yeeres, hauing had neither wife nor issue that is read of. His body and head, after the Danes were departed, were buried at the same roiall Towne, as Abbo terms it, where Sigebert the East-Anglean King, and one of his predecessors, at his establishing of Christianity, built a Church, and where afterwards (in honour of him) was built another most sparious, and of a wonderful frame of Timber, and the name of the Towne, vpon the occasion of his buriall, called vnto this day, Saint Edmundsbury. This Church and place, Suenus the Pagan Danish King in impiety and fury burned to ashes. But when his sonne Canute had made conquest of this Land, and gotten possession of the English Crowne, terrified and affrighted (as saith the Legend) by a vision of the seeming Saint Edmund, in a religious deuotion to expiate his Fathers sacrilege, built it anew most sumptuously, enriched this place with Charters & Gifts, and offered his owne Crowne vpon the Martyrs Tombe. After the death of this Edmund the East-Angles Country was possessed by the Danes, & so continued about some fifty yeeres, vntill that Edward surnamed the Elder, expelled these Danes, and joined that kingdome a Prouince to the West-Saxons, after it had stood three hundred fifty three yeeres, Offa heire to the Crowne, adopted Edmund the sonne of Alkmund.

A CATALOGVE OF SVCH BRITISH PRINCES AS WITHSTOOD THE SAXONS IN THEIR CONQUESTS FROM VORTIGERNE THEIR FIRST MAINTAINER, VNTO CADWALLADER THEIR LAST RESISTER.

CHAPTER XII.

Hitherto the Saxons Heptarchy.

The British Opposers.

Resisters of the Saxons.

Now as we haue spoken of euery feuerall Saxon King, that attained vnto, and held possession of any part in the East & South of this Iland, vntill such time as their Crownes were worn by their Conquerors, and the seuend diuided Heptarchy, vnted into an absolute Monarchy: so by order of History it is required, that their opposers (the Britains) so long as they kept their ground, and stood in defence of their owne rightful inheritance, should be shewed: who with as great a disdain, and valorous resistance, vnderwent the yoke of the Saxons subiections, as their ancient Ancestors had endeauoured to cleere themselves from the chaines of the Romans captivity. And vntill God and destinie withdrew from them the hand of defence, they mated the Saxons in all their designs. For albeit that the Romans had robbed the Land of her strength, and the aspired Vortigern, called in these Strangers for his defence: yet their purposes being wisely perceiued, the execution thereof was as presently practised, and as eagerly pursued, whilest the pillars (that supported the frame of their gouernment) stood vpon their owne Bases. But the ground-work failing, and those props not many, the waight of all, fell vpon some few, whose acts and manly resistance (Christ assisting) shall further bee related, as time shall bring them to the yeeres of their adventures, and carry our History thorow the affaires of their times. Meane while, as we haue recorded the names of their Ancestors, and worthy fore-runners, the resisters of the Romans: so now if you please, behold the Catalogue of their Kings, from the foresaid Vortigern (the first subdued by these Saxons) vnto Cadwallader the last of those British Princes, who left to them his Land, and went himself to Rome: whose times & stories, according to those Guides that lead vs, wee will declare, referring the credit thereof to our British Historians; against whom howeuer some exceptions are, and may be iustly taken, yet are they not altogether to be cast off, in the affaires of these ensuing Princes, especially Gyltas and Ninus, who liued in, and presently after the times of those resisters. Neither is it to be doubted, but that many others there were of that Nation, no lesse carefull for transferring the remembrance of their Ancestors actions to posteritie, (no Nation liuing being more zealously deuoted in that kinde,) though their writings haue in Times ruines bene buried, and their remembrances preferred onely by perpetuall traditions. and although wee haue shewed the ancient Coines of the Britains, and obserued a series thorow the Romanes succession: yet be not offended, that I leaue onely Blanks for these latter Princes, as also the first Saxons, wanting the Monies of their owne feuerall Mintes.

Such therefore as I haue found of any Kings stamp, raigning whilest the Land was diuided and enioied amongst them, I haue in the margin of their remembrances affixed, with the Armes attributed to euery feuerall kingdom: and hence will obserue the same order, without any inuention or fained inscription: which howeuer wee want to furnish their successions, yet this am I sure of, no Nation in Europe can shew the like, or can come to so true a series of their Soueraignes Coines, as England is able at this day to doe.

Vortigern among the many molestations of the Scots and Picts, was ordained the supreme Gouernor of these affaires; and to that end, with the Britains full consent was elected their King. For as touching that Monkish Vortigern how he maintained warre against the Saxons, and the feare of the Saxons.

Monkish Constantine, the sonne of Constantine, who is said to be the brother of Aldricus, King of Little Britaine in France, sent for and made King by these Britains, whose simplicitie this Vortigern is said to abuse, and lastly to cause his murder and death; I rather thinke the storie to be the same that happened about fortie yeeres before, in the daies of Honorius the Emperour; when Constantine among other Conspirators, was raised vpon a hopefull expectation conceived in his name.

This Constantine indeed had a sonne that bare his name, a man of a soft spirit, and no deepe reach, and therefore in his youth was made a Monke. But his Father risen to his aspiring honour, created him first his Caesar, and next Augustus, till Fortune turned those smiles into frownes, and stained their purple robes in both their owne bloods. For not only the same names indueth this doubt, but the place, which was Winchester, and Abbey Amphibius, where this Imperiall Monke was thorne, doth not a little confirme the same; the remains of which Colledge, by that strong and thicke wall standing to this day at the West gate of that Cathedrall Church, doth not a little confirme. But wanting better directions to our proceedings, we must follow for these times men of latter yeeres, and not without some suspect of vncertainty. The rather, for that the Saxons as then the chiefe Actors in this Land, haue purposely concealed all Victors and victories against themselves; neither but sparingly haue recorded their owne.

This Vortigern, howeuer attaining the Crowne, was ouer-awed (saith Ninus) by the Picts & Scots, stood in feare of the Roman forces, and dread much the returne of Aurelius Ambrosius, with his brother Vter, surnamed Pendragon: and therefore wanting strength of his owne to maintaine his standing, sent for the Saxons, as wee haue said. He (saith the British Story) was Earle of Cornwall, of an honourable Familie and noble descent, his Lady euery way answerable to both; by whom hee had three sonnes, Vortimer, Catigern, and Pascentius. His second wife, or rather Concubine, (hauing cast off this first) was Rowena, the daughter of Hengist, which Pagan marriage procured not only the bane of the Land; but so ruined the Church of Christianity, that a Prouinciall Councell of the Britains was assembled in Ann. 470. to repaire those things that this marriage had decreed.

By this Heathen Damosell he had a daughter, who (against the law of God and Nature) was his third wife, that Kings (as he pretended, to excuse his incest) might be descended from the right issue of Kings, vpon whom he begot his sad lamenting sonne Faustulus, a vertuous Impe of those impious parents, that spent his life in a solitarie place neere to the Riuer Llynterrenny, as wee haue said; who abandoning the companie of men, among those mountaines seru'd God in continual teares and prayers, for remission of the fault committed in his incestuous generation, for the recalling of his parents to a better life, and for the restitution of his Country to her former libertie.

This Vortigern raigned first sixteen yeeres, and then deposed for his fauours to the Saxons, was retained in durance all the raigne of Vortimer his sonne, after whose death reestablished, but oppressed by his Saxons, and pursued by Aurelius, he withdrew himselfe into Wales, and among those vast mountaines built a Castle by Merlins direction, wherof we haue spoken, and more we would speake, were those fantastike fictions vnderfet with any props of likelihood or truth, which Rand, of Chester in his daies vtterly reiecteth.

In this Castle, Vortigern with his incestuous wife, after hee had secondly raigned the space of six yeeres, was consumed to ashes, by the iust reuenging hand of God, by fire from heauen, as some haue written; or else kindled by Aurelius and Vter, as his Ministers to execute his wrath.

VORTIMER. 2.

Vortimer, the eldest son of King Vortigern, through the abuse of his fathers gouernment, for which he was deposed by his owne subiects, was erected King of the Britains the yeere from Christs birth 454. a man of great valour, which altogether hee employed for the redresse of his Countrey, according to the testimonie of William Malmesbury, whose words are these: Vortimer (saith hee) thinking not good to dissemble the matter, for that hee saw himselfe and Countrey daily surpris'd by the craft of the English, set his full purpose to driue them out, and from the seventh yeere after their first entrance, for twenty yeeres continuance fought many Battles with them, and some of them with great success in open field; in the first whereof, they departed with like fortune, and losse of the Generals brethren Horsa and Catigern: in the other three the Britains went away with victorie, and so long until Vortimer was taken away by fatal death.

Huntington, Monmouth, Randalphus, and Fabian, name both the places and success of those Battles: The first was in Kent, and vpon the Plaine neere vnto Ailsford, where the memoriall of Catigern to this day remaineth; & Horsa doth as yet reliue of Horsa there interred. The second Battle was fought likewise in Kent at Crocanford, now Craford, where many perished as well Britains as Saxons. The third was at Wep-peds Fleet, with great losse to the Britains: and the fourth vpon Calmore, where many of the Saxons, after long and fore fight, were slaine, and more drowned in flight, and lastly driuen into the Ile of Thanet, their first first assigned habitation, (if not over the Seas) so that small hoped for them so long as this valiant Portimer lived, who had now dispossessed them of all their footing in the Continent, and often assailed them in the Ile of Tannet likewise, as Fabian confidently affirmeth.

But destiny going forward for the downfall of Britaine, remoued these rubbes out of her way : for Rowena, the mother of the Britaines mischief, and the maintainer of the Saxons residence, found the means to make this worthy Portimer away, and by poison caused the end of his life, after hee had valiantly raigned the space of foure yeeres ; all which time, by the testimonie of an old Chronicle that Fabian had scene, Portimer the father remained in durance, and vnder assigned Keepers in the Citie Caelegion, now Chester, and so demeaned himselfe towards his sonne (then his Soueraigne) in dutifull obedience and faithfull counsell, that hee wonne againe the hearts of the Britaines, and was againe re-established their King.

It is recorded by Ninius, that after his last victorie over the Saxons, he caused his Monument to be erected at the entrance into Tanet, and in the same place of that great ouerthrow, which by the said Author is called Lapis Tituli, of vs the Stonar, where for certaine it seemes hath been an haue. In this Monument hee commanded his body to be buried, to the further terror of the Saxons, that in beholding this his Trophy, their spirits might be daunted at the remembrance of their great ouerthrow. As Scipio Africanus conceived the like, who commanded his Sepulchre to be so set, that it might ouerlook Africa, supposing that his very Tombe would be a terror to the Carthaginians. But how that desire of Portimer was performed, I finde not, but rather the contrary: for an old Manuscript I haue, that confidently affirmeth him to be buried in London : yet others from Ninius the disciple of Elmodogus, hold the place to bee Lincolne. But howeuer his graue is forgotten, yet let this be remembered, that Sigebertus hath written of him, that is, After he had vanquished the Saxons (saith he) whose drift was not only to ouer-runne the Land with violence, but also to erect their owne Lawes without clemencie, he restored the Christian Religion then forely decayed, and new built the Churches that those enemies had destroyed.

Geoffrey Chaucer, Polych.

Avrelivs Ambrosius, verily defended of that Constantine who in the fourth Consulship of Theodosius the younger, was elected here in Britaine, onely in hope of his luckienam, succeeded Portimer the Father in the Government of Britaine, and Portimer the sonne, in affection and defence of his Country. He with Vter (saith Geoffrey Monmouth) when their brother Constantine was murdered by Portimer, fled into France, where they remained the yeeres of his first raigne; whose returne (as we haue heard from Ninius) he greatly feared, and whose force at his last he felt to his smart. For hauing againe resumed his Crowne, he liued in his old sinnes, and suffered the Saxons to be Lords of his Land: to prevent which (saith Beda from Gylgas) the Britaines by little and little beganne to take strength, and with some courage to come forth of their Caves, who with one uniforme consent, called to God for his heauenly helpe. They had (saith he) for their Captaine a Roman called Ambrosius Aurelianus, a gentle natured man, which onely of all the blood of the Romans remained then a line, his parents being slaine, which bore the name of King of the Country. This man being their Leader, prouoked the Victors to the fight, and through Gods assistance achieved the victory. From that day forward now the Britaines, now the Saxons did preuaile, until the yeere that Bathe was besieged, which was fortie foure yeeres after their first coming into the Land.

His first expedition (as our British Historians report) was against Portimer, and his Castle in Wales, wherein that incestuous King was consumed to ashes by lightning from heauen, as we haue said: and then following the Saxons, made toward Yorke, & at Maesbel beyond Humber, encountering Hengist, became his Victor: vnto whose mercy (say they) his sonne Occa yielded himselfe, and obtained in free gift the Country in Gallaway in Scotland for him and his Saxons. But these his affaires thus prospering against the common Enemy, was enuied at by Pascentius, the youngest son of King Portimer, who not able either to mate the Saxons, or after his Brethrens deaths to recouer the Kingdom to himselfe, ambitiously fought to prefer his base humor before the recovery of his Countries libertie, which then lay gored in her owne blood. For hauing gotten the aid of Gillmare King of Ireland, whether hee had fled vpon the death of his Father, and now returned into the west of Wales, first indamaged the Citie of S. Davids, and thence proceeded with fire and sword. Aurelius then sicke in the Citie of Winchester, sent his brother Vter to withstand his force, who slew both Pascentius and the Irish King his partaker, in a set & fore battell fought betwixt them. But before this battell, Pascentius had sent a Saxon, whose name was Eopa, in shew a Britaine, and in habit a Physitian, to minister poison in stead of physicke, which according was effected with Ambrosius his death.

Vnto this Aurelius Ambrosius is ascribed the erection of that rare and admirable monument, now called Stonhenge, in the same place where the Britaines had been treacherously slaughtered and interred, whose manner manner and forme in our draught of Wiltshire wee haue inserted. The matter being Stones of a great and huge bignesse, so that some of them containe twelue tunne in waight, and twenty eight foote or more in length, their breadth seuen, and compasse fixteene. These are set in the ground of a good depth, and stand in a round circle by two and two, hauing a third stone somewhat of lesse quantitie laid gate-wise ouerthwart on their toppes, fastned with tenons and mortaises, the one into the other; which to some seeme so dangerous, as they may not safely be passed vnder, the rather for that many of them are fallen downe, and the rest suspected of no sure foundation: notwithstanding, at my being there, I neither saw cause of such feare, nor vncertaintie in accounting of their numbers, as is said to be. The stones are gray, but not marbled, wherein great holes are beaten euen by force of weather, that serue for Raues and other birds to build in, and bring forth their young. The ground-plot containeth about three hundred foot in compasse, in forme almost round, or rather like vnto a horse-shoe, with an entrance in vpon the east-side. Three rowes of stones seeme formerly to haue bene pitched, the largest outwards, and the least inwards; many whereof are now fallen downe: but those that stand, shew so faire an aspect, and that so farre off, that they seeme to the beholders to be some Fortresse or strong Castle. A Trench also is about them, which hath bene much deeper; and vpon the plaines adjoining, many round copped hills, without any such trench, (as it were cast vp out of the earth) stand like great hay-cocks in a plaine meadow: In these, and thereabouts, by digging haue bene found peeces of ancient fashioned armour, with the bones of men, whose bodies were thus couered with earth that was brought thither by their wel-willers and friends, euen in their head-peeces; a token of loue that then was vfed, as some imagine.

This Trophy, Aurelius Ambrosius (in memoriall of the Britaines massacre) erected, and is worthily accounted for one of the Wonders of this Island, and are in the verities of Alexander Netham called The Giantes Daunce, wherein this Ambrosius was interred after hee had raigned thirtie two yeeres, and whereof the towne Ambresbury beares the name. Others report, that the Britaines erected this most lately Sepulchre ouer the body of Ambrosius there slaine by the sword of his enemies; that his Countries loue, in such a costly peece of worke, might remaine vnto posterities in this, the Altar of his vertue and manhood: for Paulus Diaconus saith, that this man, in succouring his decayed Countrey, tooke vpon him the Imperiall Robe, and against the violent rage of those German enemies, oft times ouerthrew their puissant armies, but was lastly slaine by them vpon the Plaines of Salesburie. I cannot with silence let passe the ridiculous reports of the bringing of the Stones out of Africke into Ireland, and from thence, vnder the conduct of Vter the brother of Ambrosius, vnto this Plain, by the industrious means of Merlin, surnamed Ambrose, borne in the ancient City Merdyhn, and as Humfrey Lluyd saith, of a noble virgin, whose father, for his skill in the Mathematicks, and wonderfull knowledge in all other kinde of learning, was by the rude common people reputed to be the sonne of an Incubus, or a male Diuell, which in the similitude and likeness of men doe vse carnally to companie with women. But how this may agree with his diuine mouth, that telles vs the Spirits haue neither flesh nor bones, and the whole Scriptures, that man is carnally begotten, conceived and born, I leaue for others further to dispute. Only I know, that such begettings as Merlines is reported to be, without father, and Simon Magus also, that before him would needs be the sonne of a Virgin, doe not a little contradict our Christian Profession, who acknowledge onely the conception of Christ to be conceived without the seed of man, or of sinne. But to our purpose: Ambrosius Aurelius (by Panninius accounted the last Emperour of the British blood) is said to raigne in Britaine thirty two yeeres, and to die in that of Christs Incarnation foure hundred ninety seuen.

Vter, surnamed Pendragon, the brother of Ambrosius, succeeded him both in valour, and in the Government of Britaine. His entrance was with troubles against the Saxons, who vnder the leading of Eske and Ossa, the sonnes of King Hengist, had passed with spoile to the Citie Yorke, whither this new-made Generall presently repaired, and giuing them battell, with the discomfiture of the whole Army, tooke both the brethren prisoners, and committed them to safe custodie.

But the Britaines (saith Boetius) becomming disloyal to their Prince, seldome assited him with preuenting counsell: and the Prince enamored vpon the Duke of Cornwall Wife, consulted more with Merline to transforme himselfe from himselfe, then to giue direction against the common enemy. For comming to Tindagell Castle in Cornwall, possessed by Gorlois, Duke of that Prouince, beheld (in his eye) the Pendragon of Nature, which was Lady Igen, his Dutches and wife. Vter, whose thoughts till then had bin free, and from his childhood had euer followed Stars in the field, was now surprised so far with her loue, that his Shield and Armes were both neglected and vnworne, and all his thoughts set on worke to purchase his most wished desire; which lastly, by Merline and Magick was effected, and that after this manner (if we will CONSTANTINE 6.

An. D. 542.
Brute booke.

Constantine the sonne of Cador Duke of Cornwall, and cosen to King Arthur by his alliance in marriage, at his death was appointed by him to succeed in his Dominions, and most ioyfully receiued of the Commons, as the man, in the opinion of this worthy elector and themselves, accounted most fit to defend the Land from the many oppressions of the Saxons, who now beganne to spreade the wing as farre as to Ynne in the North, and to set downe the limits of their seuerall Kingdomes; which notwithstanding, these strangers daily enlarged vpon the home-bred Inhabitants, the ciuill warres of the Britaines giuing way to the same, and that not onely among themselves, but by the Picts also, in the behalfe of the two sonnes of Mordred, that sought to dispossesse him of the Crown. In which quarrel many battles were fought, but with such successe to the attemptors, that these two Competitors were forced for refuge into London and Winchester, chryser, whither Constantine pursued them, they taking Sanctuarie in the Churches, and not farre from the Altars he slew them: for which decde, the Priest Gyldeas, that flourished in those daies, in his inuestiue reprehensions thus writeth: Britaine hath Kings (saith hee) but they are Tyrants: Iudges it hath, but they are wicked, pillaging and harming the innocent people; reuenging and defending, but whom? Such as be guilty and robbers. They haue many wines, yet breake they wedlocke; many times swearing, yet perjure themselves; vowing, but for the most part with dissembling lies; waruing, but still maintaining vniust and ciuill broiles; abroad pursuing theenes, and yet at home chryst them, euen at their owne Tables, and sometimes also reward them. They giue large almes indeed, yet heape they vniustnes high as the Mountaine. They sit in the Seat of sentence, yet seldome seeke the rule of right iudgement, despising the humble and innocent persons, and extolling vp to Heauen proud and bloudie Murderers, Theenes, and Adulterers, yea and if he would permit them, the very enemies of God. Many they keepe in prison, and load them with irons, more to serue their owne purposes, then for any guilt in the person, taking solemn Oaths before & vpon the Altars, and yet despise they the Altars, as altogether vile, and but filthie stones.

Of this hainous and wicked offense, Constantine the tyrannicall whelpe of the Lionesse of Deuon-shire is not ignorant, who this yeere, after the receiuing of his dreadfull

Oath, whereby he bound himselfe, that in no wise he should hurt his Subiects, (God first, and then his Oath, with the company of Saints, and his owne mother being present) did notwithstanding in the reuerend laps of both his Mothers, the Church, and her by nature, and that vnder the vesture of an holy Abbat, deuoure with sword and spear, in stead of teeth, the tender sides and the entrails of two children of noble and Kingly race, and likewise of their two Gouernours, yea and that (as I said) before the sacred Altars; the Armes of which Persons so slaine, not stretched forth to defend themselves with weapons (which few in those daies handled more valiantly then they) but stretched forth to God, and to his Altar, in the day of Iudgement shall set up the reuerend ensignes of their patience and faith at the Gates of the Citie of Christ, which so haue covered the seat of the Celestiall Sacrifice, as it wore with the red Mantle of their cluttered blood.

These things hee did not after any good deeds done by him deserving praise: for many yeeres before ouercome with the often and changeable filths of adulterie, and forsaking his lawfull wife (contrary to the law of God) being not loosed from the snarles of his former sinnes, hee increaseth the new with the old. Thus far Gyldeas, for this time, and for the raigne of Constantine, whose life being no better, was cut off in battell by Aurelius Conanus, when he had reigned fully three yeeres, and without issue was buried at Stonhenge.

AVRELIVS CONANVS. 7.

An. D. 545.
An. D. 545.

Aurelius Conanus, the Nephew of King Arthur, after he had slaine his Cosen Constantine in battell, was made King ouer the Britaines in the yeere after Christis Natiuitie five hundred fortie five. He was of disposition free and liberal, but therewithall of a light credit, and very suspicious, cherishing them that accused others, without respect of right or wrong, putting some to death, and retaining others in perpetuall prison, among whom his own Vncle was one, whose two sons he caused to be slaine, no causes objected, but that these three were in truth betwixt him & the Crowne: for which, and other the like impious parts, the said Gyldeas continueth the tenor of his vehement reprehension in this manner. And thou Lions whelpe (as speaks the Prophet) Aurelius Conanus, what dost thou? art thou not swallowed up in the filthy mire of murdering thy Kinsmen, of committing fornications and adulteries, like to the others before mentioned, if not more deadly, as it were with the waues and surges of the drenching Seas, ouerwhelming thee with her vnumersfull rage? dost thou not in hating the peace of thy Country, as a deadly Serpent, and thirring after ciuill warres and spoiles (often times vniustly gotten) shut up against thy soule the Gates of celestially peace? Thou being left alone, as a withering tree in the middle of a field, call to remembrance (I pray thee) the vaine youthfull fantasie, and ouer timely deaths of thy Fathers and thy Brethren: shalt thou being set apart, and chosen forth of all thy lineage for thy godly deserts, be reserved to live an hundred yeeres, or remaine on earth till thou bee as old as Methuselah? nothing lesse. And thus with exhortations for his amendment, turneth his speech to his Successor.

The raigne of this King, among the vncertainties of other proceedings, is ranged by our owne Historians, as vncertainly. For some hold him to rule onely two yeeres, and no more, being then cut off by the iust reuenging hand of God for his sinnes: others allow three yeeres for his raigne, wherein, as they say, most viciously hee liued: And yet Matthew of Westminster will haue him continue in gouernement no lesse then thirty yeeres; and Iohn Stow addeth three more: such extremes are wee driven vnto, that haue our relations onclie from them.

An.Do. 578.

Vortiporus, after the death of Aurelius, succeeded him in the Kingdome of the Britaines, which then was much scantled by the intrusions of the Saxons whom in many battels (as saith the British Historians) he vanquished, and valiantly defended his Land and Subiects, from the danger of them and of their Allies: notwithstanding their reported actions thus honorably achieved, yea and his Parentage with succession of government, may be both suspected and iustly called in question, as by the words of Gyltas is manifest; who suffered not this King also to passe vntrouched in his Inueltine and lamentable pangsions. And thou (saith he) Vortiporus the Tyrant of South-wales, like to the Panther in manners and wickednesse, diuersly spotted, as it were with many colours, with thy boarie head in the Throne full of deceipt, craft, and wiles, and defiled even from the lowest part of thy body to the Crowne of thy head, with diuers and sundry murders committed on thine own kin, and filthy adulteries, thus proving the unworthy sonne of a good King, as Manasse was to Ezechias; how chance it that the violent streames of finnes, which thou swallowed up like pleasant wine, or rather art swallowed up by the (the end of thy life by little & little now drawing neere) cannot yet satisfie thee? what meanest thou, that with fornication, of all evils as it were the full heap, thine own wife being put away, with her death, which thou wroughtest, dost oppress thy soule with a certain burthen that cannot be avoided?

By this testimonie of Gyltas, this Vortiporus could not be the sonne of bad Conan, as Geffrey Monmouth and Matthew of Westminster affirme him: his Father being compared to godly Ezechias King of Iudah, and himselfe continuing his gouernment, as is said the space of foure yeeres, ended his life without issue to succeed him.

21. 22. 23. of the 11th century.

Malgo Canonus, the Nephew of Aurelius Conanus, as some write, succeeded Vortiporus in the Kingdome of Britaine, a man of a most seemly presence, but withall, charged with many vnbecoming and foul finnes, by ancient Gyltas, the onely recorder of the Actions in these times; who calleth him the Dragon of the Isles, greater in power then many, but exceeding all in mischiefe and malice; a large giuer, but more lauish and prodigall in all finnes and licentiousnesse: in Armes and dominions more strong and greater then any other British Potentate; but stronger in the destruction of his owne soule, in committing the grand abhorred sinne of Sodome.

In his youthfull daies, with sword and fire he brought to destruction his vnkle by the mothers side (being then king) together with many others, and after vpon a shew-seeming remorse of Conscience, vowed the profession and life of a Monke; but returned shortly after to his owne vomit, and became worse then he was before: for despising his first marriage, he became enamored vpon the wife of his brothers sonne, whiles he was living; and after that he had kept her a certaine time, murdered them both. In these finnes he continued the terme of five yeeres, and dying without issue, left his Crowne to another.

By these reprehensions of Gyltas it should rather seeme

seeme that these Princes liued all together at one and the same time, vnto whom hee spake personally, and mouth to mouth, which could not be, if such successions and such yeeres had bene expired, as heere is laid downe. And therefore not without cause some haue affirmed, that these Captaines vsurped authoritie together in diuers parts of the Iland, and not successiuelly one after another; neither indeed as Kings, but rather Tyrants, polluted with these greuous finnes, as you haue heard, and are so termed by their own Historian, that bringeth one more to tyrannize, whom neither Monmouth nor hee of Westminster hath spoken of, which is Cuneglasius, whom hee calleth, a Lion tawney Butcher, a Beave, a Contemner of Religion, an Oppressour of the Clergie, that fought against God with his many greuous finnes, and warred vpon man with his martiall weapons. Hee (saith hee) did put away his lawfull wife, prouoked the godly with many iniuries, was proudly conceited of his owne wisdom, and set his whole hope in vn-certaine riches. If then the head was so sicke, could the body be found, that (as Beda saith) were so fit to breake all orders of truth and iustice, that scant any token or remembrance thereof remained? And for witness against them, calleth their owne Historian Gyltas, that accused them of many impieties, and this not the least, that those Britaines neglected the preaching of the Gospell to the Saxons.

For these finnes assuredly, God gaue their Land to another Nation, and themselves to exile, or to the sword of their enemies. Howbeit, some latter Britaine hath rather excused their finnes by the ouerrall zeale of Gyltas, whom he tearmeth a Pulpit-Priest (but no perfect Historian) that beat down finnes with an ouer-sharpe censure of the sinners, as the manner of many Preachers is at this day. But (saith hee) let the true renowne of the Britaines appeare to the world: and surely so shall it doe for me. And againe I returne to my intended purpose.

Careticus succeeded Malgo in the gouernment of Britaine, as destitute of vertue and fluent in vice, as any of these his preceding Kings: for it is recorded that hee was a nourisher of dissensions, and sowed ciuill warres among his subiects; a sinne odible to God and Man, and vnto the vnconstant Britaines gaue occasion of his hatred: which when the Saxons perceived, was further instigated, and with the assistance of Gummund an Arch-pirate, and Captaine of the Norwegians, followed against the King, who not able to resist them, fled into the Towne of Chichester for safety, but by the deuice of his pursuers, certaine sparrows being caught, and fire fastned to their feet, were let lie into the Towne, where lighting vpon straw and other matter fit for flaming, burnt in short space the whole Citie, and Careticus flying beyond Seuerne, secured himselfe among the Mountaines of Wales, wherein he died, after he had vnprosperously reigned three yeeres: and from that time forth (saith Randolphus) the Britaines lost their whole Kingdome in the East part of the Iland, and were confined in the West by the Riuers Seuerne and Dee.

they had forgone their Country, and betaken themselves to those vast, but securing Mountaines; of a Ruler

Ruler only of North-wales, was made Gouverneur of all those parts, a man deterring well before hee came to that estate, and being risen, maintained himselfe and subiects in great honour and peace. His first affaires against the Saxons, was to revenge the deaths of his Britaines, and harmelesse Monkes of Bangor, slaine (as we haue said) by wild Ethelfrid, the mighty King of Northumberland, who in Field had assembled all their powers, wherein the fallall end either of the Britaines or Northumbrians must needs haue ensued, had not the quarrell bene staid by the mediation of friends. These Kings, then, and there reconciled, embraced peace, with such true friendship, that they continued amitie together so long as they liued.

Harding saith, that this British King Cadwan, honorably receiued and worthily cherished Arca, whom this King Ethelfrid had put from his bed, for the loue he bare vnto his Concubine, but is deceived in making her the mother of Edwin, that was his sister, and Cadwan to raigne but thirteen yeeres, whereas others allot him two and twentie.

Cadwallo or Cadwallin, the sonne of Cadwan, was made King ouer the Britaines, the yeere of Christs Incarnation six hundred thirty five. He warred most strongly against the Saxons, and either by Conquest or Alliance ioined amitie with Penda the cruell King of the Mericians, a Pagan Idolater, himselfe by the report of Beda, although a Christian in name and profession, yet in minde and manners so rude and outrageous, that hee spared neither womens weaknesse nor childrens innocencie, but put all to death with greivous and bitter torments, to fulfill his cruell and unmercifull tyrannie, waiting a long time, and raging over the Prouinces, purposed to exterminate out of the borders of Britanny the whole Nation of the English, and to extinguish the very name of them. Neither did hee ought esteeme any reverence or honour to the Christian Religion, which those men embraced: so that uen to this day (saith he) the Britaines custome is to set light by the Faith or Religion of the Englishmen; neither will they communicate with them more then with Heathens or Pagans. These two cruell Kings slew the most Christian Edwyn King of Northumberland, with his sonne Prince Osfride, in a great and bloody battle at Hetfield, the yeere of Christs Incarnation six hundred thirty three: and the yeere following, with wicked force (saith Beda) but with worthy vengeance, Cadwallo the Britaine slew Osfride and Ranfild, Kings of Deira and Bernicia, that were become Apostates from their Christian Faiths, and that with crueltie and losse of the Saxons, as their owne Historians held it fit neither to mention their names in their monthly Calendar, nor register the yeere wherein they were slaine, in account of their government, but assigned it vnto the raigne of their Successour King Oswald, which was so observed vnto his daies; so terrible was this worthy Cadwallo, and odious the remembrance of this unfortunate Battle. But this cruell Captaine (saith he) enioied not this felicitie long: for the said Oswald, to revenge his brothers death, came with a small power, but strongly fenced in the faith of Christ, and nere to the River Denise gaue him battle, wherein himselfe and late-victorious Host were all slaine and confounded.

But we must remember that Beda was a Saxon, in whose behalfe his penne hath somewhat passed the bounds of equitie (if not veritie) in charging this most valiant Conqueror with tyranny, and his Martiall Sword with crueltie, that was drawne and stricke in defence of his native Country, wherein the Saxons claime stood only vpon vniust intrusion. So likewise himselfe being a Monke and Priest, hath euery where blamed the Britaines for dissenting from the Roman Church, in celebration of Easter and other Ceremonies, whereas in doctrine they were as sincere, which is the true substance of the Gospell. But the Britaines record that this valiant Cadwallo died not in Heuen-seild, neither by the hand of King Oswald, but that he raigned in great honour the space of eight and fortie yeeres, and in peace died 22. of November, in the yeere of Christ Iesus six hundred seuentie seuen. His body the Britaines buried in S. Martins Church in London, nere Ludgate, whose Image great and terrible, triumphantly riding on horsebacke, being artificially cast of Brasse, they placed vpon the same West gate, to the further feare and terror of the Saxons, as Vortimer before had commanded his at Stouar. But this relation, as also that he married the sister of King Penda, as my often named Manuscript reporteth, I leaue to the best liking of my Reader.

About this time the most blasphemous doctrine of Mahomet began to infect all the Easterne World. For although himselfe liued some nine yeeres before the government of this Cadwallo, yet presently after his death his doctrine was more publickly embraced. He was borne in Arabia, of a poore and base stocke, and being fatherlesse, was sold for a bondslauue vnto an Ismaelite, whose name was Ademona, a man of exceeding great riches, and in great trade of merchandizing, and Mahomet for his subtiltie in wit, was his fit instrument, and greatly in his fauor. The Master dying, left Mahomet his chiefe Factor, who hauing great riches in his keeping, married his Mistresse, and so became heire of all; with whom comforted one Sergius a Monke, which for heretie was fled into Arabia, who instructed Mahomet in the heresie of the Nestorians, and now for his wealth and Magickall Arts, wherewith he bewitched the minds of the people, assumed assumed to himselfe the name of the great Prophet of God, and began to be famously published for the doctrine which he taught: the which was none other but a confuled Chaos of all the heresies that had been before him: for with the Sabellians he denied the Trinitie; with the Manichies, he affirmed but two persons to be in the Deity; with Eunomius, hee denied the equalitye of the Father and the Sonne; and with Macdon, taught that the Holy Ghost was a creature. He borrowed of the Iepes Circumcision; of the Nicholaitans, pluralities of wiues; and of the Gentiles, much Superstition; and more to cloake his diuellish inuented fantasies, somewhat he tooke from the veritie of the Gospell. Of these compounded he deuised a Law, and wrote this his Religion in the booke called his Alcoran; and those his Professors he named Saracens, from Sara the wife of Abraham.

Hee died of the falling sicknesse, which long time hee had dissembled, saying forsooth after his trances, that the Angell Gabriel had conference with him, the brightnesse of whose glorie hee could not behold.

CADWALLADER. 13.

13. An. Do. 685.

Geffrey Mon.

Cadwallader, the sonne of Cadwallo, and last King of the Britaines, after the death of his Father, succeeded him in his dominions, and with great valour fought against the Saxons, as hee of Monmouth affirmeth, of whom heare him speake in his owne words. Cadwallader (saith he) raiguing victoriously the time of twelue yeeres, fell lastly into a dangerous sicknesse, with despaire of recovery, and vnable to gouerne. Much debate and strife arose among his great Lords, and others of high estate, inasmuch that they warred each against others, to the no small annoyance and detriment of the whole Country. At which very time likewise, so great a death of corne and victuall raigned, that herbes and roots were the Commons chiefe sustenance: whose third calamitie was mortalitie and pestilence, raigning so sore, and so suddenly, that in their eating, drinking, walking, and speaking, they were surprisid with death, and in such number, that the liuing were scarce able to bury the dead, which miseries lasted no lesse then eleuen yeeres continuance, whereby the Land became desolate, and brought forth no fruit at all, inasmuch that the King and many of his Nobles were driuen to forsake their native Country, and to seeke releefe in forraigne parts. Cadwallader repaired to the Court of Alan his cosen, the King of Little Britaine in France, where he was honourably receiued and maintained.

Burnow the Angell of God sheathing his sword from slaughter, and the earth answering man againe with her former abundance, those Saxons that were escaped, sent for more of their Nation to their further supplie, who replenished the Cities, and manured the Country, at this day called Lhogger, containing all the Land that lay on the East of Seuerne and Deu, dispossession the poore Britaines of their rightful inheritance, and diuiding their Lands vnto their owne use. Cadwallader hearing of their daily arriues, and their vniust intrusion vpon his home-bred subiects, minded their redresse by his present returne, and to that end had wrought King Alan, for his succour & assistance. But see how it chanced: He being now ready to imbarke his Host, and to hoise vp his sailes for Britaine, and in the silent night much spent in praier & supplication, that God would prosper with good successe these his great affaires, behold an Angell appeared to him, or at leastwise to his seeming he heard a voice, that forbade him the enterprise, declaring that it was not Gods will that hee should vndergoe that Voiage, or that the Britaines should rule their Land any longer; but contrariwise bade him to Rome, and of Pope Sergius receiue the habit of Religion, wherein hee should die, and rest in peace.

This dreame (for I hold it no other) being told vnto Alan, search was made into the Bookes of both the Merlines, as also into the speech of the Eagle at Shafesbury, pronounced eight hundred and eighty yeeres before the birth of our Sauour Christ (if wee doe beleue these to be true) wherein it was prophesied forsooth, that the Britaines should lose their Kingdome, and that the same should be possessed of others, vntill the time that the bones of Cadwallader should be brought from Rome. By such roiles and illusions in those daies of darknesse, the euil-erring minds of men were content to be led; for not onely Cadwallader, a quiet and meeke-spirited man, was possessed with this conceit, that it came vnto him by a diuine providence, but also King Alan perswaded him to obey his Oracle; and thereupon preparing for his Pilgrimage, gaue ouer his expedition for Britaine, and left his distressed Subiects to bee ouer-runne by strangers, and the Land to bee enioied by a forraigne Nation: and receiuing the habit of seeming Religion at the hands of Pope Sergius, died some after in the yeere of our Lord six hundred eighty nine, and there was buried in S. Peters Church, being the last King of the Britaines blood, after they had held possession thereof the space of one thousand one hundred thirty and seuen yeeres before the Natiuitie of Christ, and six hundred eighty eight yeeres after his Birth, as the Chronicle of Wales, with other Britaine Writers, haue calculated, though (as is said) after the largest size. But how fouer this sudden alteration was wrought in Cadwallader, yet whiles he continued a King in health, hee raigned (saith Geffrey) in great magnanimitie, the terme of three yeers, and fought many Battles against the Saxons, whose sword was ever sheathed with victory; for Lothaire King of Kent he slew in the Field, and Edithwath also King of the South-Saxons, with the ruine of his Country, as the British Historians report, and would haue it.

But Beda, vnto whom more credit is heerein to be giuen, telles vs, that Lothaire was slaine by Edrik, his Nephew and Successour, declaring the manner and day of his death; and that Cadwall, a young man of the West-Saxons bloud royall, being banished from among them, fell vpon the South-Saxons, harrying the Country and killing their King. But afterwards lamenting the bloud he had spilt, whereat euē Nature her selfe seemed to bee offended, in great repentance abandoned his Kingdome, and pilgrim-like went vnto Rome, where of Pope Sergius he was baptized vpon Easter Euen, the yeere from Christs Natiuitie six hundred eightie nine. The times thus agreeing, their names to nere, their deuotions alike, Sergius the same ghostly father to both, their sepulchers in one and the same Church, doe strongly confirme that they both were the same and one only man, as we formerly haue said. But with this man Cadwallader, wherefoeuer he died, lay buried the last bloud of their Kings, their gouernment, and immediatlie the very Name of Britaine, for many hundred yeeres ensuing, as in the sequell of this Historie (Christ assisting) shall bee shewed.

And now at last, according to my first intendment, I am come to speake of the succellion of Great Britaines Monarkes, from which (vpon the fore-shewed occasions of the Islands diuision, the Saxons possessions, and these Britaine Resisters) I haue bene ouerlong staied, and am forced to returne againe to King Hengist, the first of the Saxons, that I may shew their succeeding succellion in this English Monarchy: wherein of necessitie I must desire the patience of my Reader, if some things be againe touched that formerlie haue bene spoken, the Matter of Historie so much requiring, and the Method that to my proceeding I haue herein proposed, enforcing it.

THE SAXONS SVCCESIONS IN THE MONARCHY OF GREAT BRITAIN, WHEREOF HENGIST THE FIRST KING OF KENT BECAME THE FIRST MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

CHAPTER XIII.

Hengist, a Prince of the English-Saxons, hauing the Command ouer certain forces planted in the Low-countries of Germany, in the yeere of Christs Incarnation foure hundred and fiftie, transported them ouer into Britaine, where the fiftiyeere after his arrival, he began his Kingdome in Kent; & hauing surprised his son in law King Vortigern, slain his Britaines, and seized into his possession the best of the Land, he laid the foundation of a Monarchy, and deserueth to be reputed the first Monarch of the English Nation.

(2) He (as all the Saxon Kings besides) doth claime

his originall from Prince Woden, and his wife Fria, by Wechta the eldest of their teuen sonnes, being the fifth in issue from them; as thus: Himselfe was the sonne of Witigils, who was the sonne of Wutha, and he the sonne of Wechta, the eldest sonne of the Deified Woden.

This Prince held the supreme Scepter of this Iland for thirty foure yeeres continuance, and therein died honorably, faith Marianus Scotus. But Peter de Ikham, Polydore, and others say, that he was slaine in battell, or else taken by Edol, Earle of Gloucester, and beheaded at Conesborow. Hee left issue behind him two sonnes and one daughter, whose names were Hatwaker, Eske, and Rowena.

(3) Hatwaker his eldest sonne, is reported by Petrus Albinus of Wittenberg, a great Genealogist and Histori-

Historiographer also) to be Duke of the Saxons in Germany, and there left to gouerne the people at his Fathers departure for Britaine. And if Albinus authority be sufficient, he was the Father of Duke Hatwaker, and grandfather of Hildrik King of the Saxons, ancestor to the valiant Witikindus, the principall progenitor of the most noble Familie of the Dukes of Saxony.

(4) Eske, the second sonne of King Hengist, came ouer with his Father into Britaine, and was his assistant in all his warres, wherein he gaue worthy testimonie of his valour: whose Kingdome of Kent after his death he enioyed, and gaue name to that Countrey Inhabitants, who were from him called Eskings, ouer whom he reigned peaceably twenty yeeres.

(5) Rowena, the daughter of King Hengist, was borne in Germany before her Fathers departure, and afterwards sent for by him into Britaine, to further his designs. At whose surpassing beautie and feature

Vortigern so viciously gazed, that he put from him his lawfull and louing wife, to inioy the pleasures of her Paganish bed, and to the great decay of Christianitie, and grieue of the Nobilitie, she became the Kings second wife, and the principall cause of the Lands destruction. By her he had a daughter, who contrary to all lawes either of God or man, was likewise his third wife; by whom he had issue Faustus, that as vertuouly spent the daies of his life, as he was incestuously begot in that wicked bed.

This Rowena, whom some call Ronixa, by Vitarpius is accounted the Niecee, and not the Daughter of Hengist. But seeing his opinion is grounded vpon the youth of Hengist, as not sufficient in yeeres to haue a daughter so marriageable, I rather thinke and hold this bare testimonie vnable to turne the great streame of other Writers out of their vñall course and receiued chancell.

Vitarpius.

ELLA THE FIRST KING OF THE SOVTH-SAXONS, AND SECOND MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

CHAPTER XIV.

Ella a noble Saxon, being sent for by King Hengist, about the three and twentieth yeere of his raigne, brought a fresh supply of those Germans to the reliefe of his Countrymen, who with his forces landed at the haven now called Shoreham in Suffex, where putting backe the Inhabitants in many skirmishes, lastly chased them into a great wood then called Andredeslege, whence often being assailed by the sudden assaults of the Britaines, wherein, as may be thought, he lost the liues of his two elder sonnes, was so hardly beset, that hee sent for more aid of his Saxons, who came to his supply.

(2) His strength thus augmented, and ambition still increased, he fought three cruell and bloody battels, but the last of them most fatal against the Britaines, in the place then called Macrodes-burne, and besieging the ancient and famous City Anared-Chester situated in the said great forest, and chiefe defensible fortresse in all those Southern parts, intercepted the Britaines that came to their reliefe, and entering the same by an assault, put to the sword all that were found within it. After which great losse, the Britaines fought rather to provide for their owne safety by flying into desert places, then by making open resistance to procure their owne too apparant destruction.

(3) Ella in this state continued the time of five yeeres before he assumed the name of King, or the limits of that Prouince assigned vnder his gouernment, but then without any shew of resistance laid the foundation of this Kingdome, which was the second of the Saxons; and as Hengist held Kent, so he had Suffex and Surrey for his Possellion, wherein for six yeeres space with Hengist he liued, and that with such approbation of valour as that after his death he became the second Saxon Monarch of the Englishmen, in the yeere of grace 488.

(4) He is said to be the elder sonne of Osa, whose genealogie Florentius of Worcester thus deriueth: Osa (faith he) was the sonne of Ethebert, and he the sonne of Ingengeat, who was the sonne of Angengist, whose father was Alufa, the sonne of Imgebrand, the sonne of of Wegbrand, the sonne of Beorn, the sonne of Beornus, the elder sonne of Brand, the sonne of Bealdeag, the sixth sonne of prince Woden and of Lady Fria his wife.

(5) His issue were Kymen, Plenching, and Cissa, three valiant sonnes, that came ouer with him, and assulted him in his enterprises for Britaine. From Kymen, the port wherein they arriued, was called Kymeniflore; by the Britaines, Cuncusshore, which time and seas hath both shortened, and altered: and now is it called Shorcham, a well knowne haven in Sussex. This Prince came to his graue before his Father, either by the stroke of warres, or by the course of nature, without further mention of his acts, and his succession, cut off by his death.

(6) Plenching his second sonne, was borne vnto him in the Lowe countries of Germany, and with his brethren assisted his Father to the attaining of the South-Saxons Crowne; but being cut off by vntimely death, whether by the hand of the enemy, or by natures appointment, is vncertaine.

(7) The youngest sonne of king Ella, was Cissa, whom death spared to liue a long life; but fame as sparing to adorne it with memory of his acts: for nothing of him is left memorabell, besides the building of Chechefer. Fortune indeed for his fathers Crowne on his head, but kept the Imperiall Diademe in her owne hand, to adorne the head of a worthier bearer, which was Cherdik the West-Saxon, vnto whom Cissa gaue yeerely contribution, to secure him from the Britaines, as before and after hath been, and shall bee shewed.

(8) This Ella his entrance and erection of his Kingdome, for time is vncertaine; but his raigne therein, as also in his Monarchie, is more certainelie knowne: for hee was King of the South-Saxons the space of thirty two yeeres, and Monarch of the Englismen six and twenty, dying in the yeere of Christs Incarnation six hundred and fouretene, which was the thirty sixth after his first arriual into Britaine.

CHERDIK THE FIRST KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND THIRD MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

CHAPTER XV.

He Saxons Sunne, thus risen and high ascended vpon the South of Britaine, began now to sprede his beames towards the West; for Kent being quietly possessed by King Eske, and South-Saxia, with all the subdued, at the dispose of great Ella, Cherdik a valiant Captaine of the Low Country Germanys, thought himselfe as sufficient in warres, and as able to reach at, to weare, and to weld a Crowne of Estate, as either of them that had so done before him: and seeing that Britaine was now the seede-plot for Diadems, set his affection and preparation that way.

(2) He with his forces entred in the West of that Iland, where he in his first battell so danted the Inhabitants, that apparat signes of approaching glory were added to his aspiring hopes: for therein hee slew Natanlead, otherwise called Nazaleod, a mighty King of the Britaines, whereby an easie entrance was laid open to his desired Empire, and a more easie warre left to his posteritie. This battle chanced about the yeere of Christ Iesus six hundred and eight, and was fought in the region of Natanlead, (which Country bare the name of the King) and neere vnto a brooke of water in the West of Hampshire, which from Cherdik began to be called Cherdiksford, where now a Towne of the same name standeth, but by contraction and shortness of speech is called Chardford.

(3) Florentius of Worcester, the Saxons Genealogist (as I may well terme him) bringeth this Cherdik (as he doth the rest of the Saxon Kings) from the ancient Prince Woden, and that in this manner: Cherdik (saith he) was the sonne of Elisus, and hee the sonne of Ella, the sonne of Gerisus, the sonne of Wigga, the sonne of Friathin, the sonne of Frodegar, the brother of Beorn, the progenitor of Ida the first King of Bernicia, and both both of them the sonnes of Brand, the sonne of Bealdeag, the fifth sonne of the foresaid Woden.

(4) In the feuenth yeere of Ella his Monarchie, was his arriage, and six yeeres after hee beganne his Kingdome of the West-Saxons, leaving himselfe and foundation thereof betwixt the Britaines and the South-Saxons, for whose further securitie, Cissa King of that Prouince, gaue him an yeerely contribution towards the maintenance of his charge in warre; wherein hee got such reputation, that after the death of Ella, and the thirteenth of his owne raigne, hee assumed the Monarchie vnto himselfe, and was both the first King of the West-Saxons, and the third Monarch of the Englismen, wherein he continued the space of twentie one yeeres, and deceased in the yeere of our Lord five hundred thirty five, being the three and thirtieth of his Kingdome, and the fortieth after his first arriual.

(5) His issue were two sonnes, Kenrik and Chelwofe: the one immediately; and the issue of the other collaterally attained to the same possession and title that Cherdike heere first laid.

(6) Chelwofe his second sonne (for of Kenrik the eldest wee are heereafter to speake) hath little mention made among our writers: more then that hee was the Ancestour of Eskwin the eight King of the West-Saxons, that is to say, the father to Kenfrid the father of Kenfy; which Kenfy had issue the said Eskwin, who was the Successor of king Kenwalk, and predecessor of King Kentwin in the kingdome of the West-Saxons.

KENRIK THE SECOND KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND FOVRTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

CHAPTER XVI.

Enrik, the eldest sonne of King Cherdik (as is said) being borne in Germanie, and following his father into Britaine, valiantly serued vnder him, as well in the Battle fought against King Natanlead, the first day of his arriage, as in other battles against the Britaines in other places; namely, at Cherdiksford, Cherdisley, and in the Conquest of the Ile of Wight. Immediately vpon the death of his Father, he succeeded in his whole dominions, and was ordained the second King of the West-Saxons, and the fourth Monarch of the Englismen, beginning his raigne ouer both at one and the same time, the yeere of Christs Natuitie six hundred thirty foure.

(2) And enlarging his confines vpon the Territories of the Britaines, gaue them two great overthrowes; the one at Saresbery in Wiltshire, and the other at Banbury in Oxfordshire, which was fought the two and twentieth of his raigne, whereby his fame grew more renowned, and his Kingdome in more quiet after. He raigned the space of twenty six yeeres, and left this life in the yeere of our Lord God five hundred sixty.

(3) He had issue three sonnes, Chenline, Cuthwofe, and Cuth. Chenline the first, succeeded his father in the Monarchie, and West-Saxons Kingdome.

(4) Cuthwofe, the second, assisted his brother in many victories, as presently in his raigne shall follow. And Cuth, the third brother, famous in his issue, though mentionlesse for action in himselfe, whereof more largely hath bene spoken in the raigne of Kenrik, as he was King only of the West-Saxons.

CHEVLIN THE THIRD KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND FIFTH MONARCH OF THE ENG- LISHMEN.

CHAPTER XVII.

Chevlín, the eldest sonne of King Kenric, served with great commendations vnder his father, in all his warres against the Britains, and is specially mentioned at the Battle of Banbury in Oxfordshire; and after his fathers death became the third King of the West-Saxons, and the fifth Monarch of the Englishmen. Hee much enlarged the bounds of his Kingdom, and increased the power and glorie of the West-Saxons.

(2) For continuing the warres where his Father left, did not onely subdue the Britains in many Battles, but also set himselfe against his owne Nation the Saxons, and fought to impose the scope of his power vpon the South of the River Thames: for entering Kent (whole King was then a child, by name Ethelbert, the sonne of Imerik) at Wiphaun or Wilbandun in Surry, in a set and fore Battle, defeated all his forces, whence the young King was chased, and two of his greatest Captaines, bearing the names of Dukes, were slaine, as we haue said.

(3) Not long after this victory, he set his minde to enlarge his West-Saxons Dominions vpon the possession of the declining Britains, and to that end furnished forth a great Band of his Souldiers, whereof he made his brother Cuthwin chiefe Generall. These marching to Bedford, gaue Battle to the Britains, where they slew them downe-right, and surprized foure of their chiefe Townes, at that time called Liganburge, Egleborough, Benington, and Eussham, which they fortified, to their owne strength, and the Britains great losse.

(4) And following the Tract of his fore-going fortunes, about six yeeres after sent forth againe his Saxons, vnder the conduct of the forefaid Cuthwin, who encountered the Britains at Diorth or Deorham, with such valour and successe, that besides great slaughter of the British Souldiers, three of their Kings, whose names were, Coimmagill, Candidan, and Farimnagill, fell in the Field, with the surprizall of these three Cities, Glocester, Bathe, and Cirencester. Then (saith Gylas) euidently appeared the Lands destruction, the sins of the Britains being the only cause, when neither Prince nor People, Priest nor Leuite, regarded the Law of the Lord, but disobediently wandered in their owne waies.

(5) But no greater were the finnes of the Britains, then the vnassailable desires of the Saxons were to conquer: for Chevlín about the last of Malgoe his gouernment, met the Britains at Fethanleah, in the face of a Field, which was fought out, to the great slaughters of them both, and with the death of Prince Cuth, King Chevlín sonne: notwithstanding the victorie fell on his side with great spoiles obtained, and possessions of many Prouinces, which himselfe no long time enioied.

(6) For growne proud through his many prosperous victories against his enemies, and tyrannizing ouer his owne Subiects, the West-Saxons, fell into such contempt, that they ioined with the Britains for his destruction. The greatest against him, was disloyall Chell, or Cearik, his nephew, the sonne of Cuthwin his most loyall brother, whom both the Nations had collected for Generall. Vnder him they mustered and march into Wiltshire, and at Wodnesbeote (now Wannes-ditch) pitch downe their Standards. Chevlín that thought hee lead fortune in a leafe, with confident boldnesse built his present proceedings vpon his former successe, and in the face of his enemies displaced his colours. But the Battles ioined, and the Field goared with blood, the day was lost vpon the Kings side, and he in distresse saued himselfe by flight. Heere might you haue scene the world, as it is, vnconstant and variable; for he a Mars, that had ouer-borne the Britains in so many Battles, and had raised his Saxons vnto so great a height, is forced to flee before his conquered Captiues, and to exile himselfe from the sight of his owne Subiects, after he had gloriously reigned thirty one yeeres, or (as some will) thirty three, and as a meane meane man, died in his banishment, the yeere of grace five hundred ninety two.

(7) He had issue two sonnes, which were Cuth and Cuthwin, the elder whereof had valiantly serued in his fathers warres, namely at Wimbledone in Surry, against King Ethelbert and his power of Kentishmen, in the yeere of Christ five hundred sixty seven; and lastly in the Battle at Fethanleah, where the Britains received a great ouerthrow. Notwithstanding, as hee was valiantly fighting among the thickest of his enemies, hee was there slaine, in the yeere of our Lord five hundred eighty foure, being the five and twentieth yeere of his fathers raigne, and that without issue.

(8) Cuthwin, the younger sonne of King Chevlín, suruiued his father, but succeeded him not, because of his young yeeres; or else (and that rather) for the hatred that his father had purchased of his Subiects, which they repaid him in his owne expulsion, and in this his sonnes deprivation. But although the wreath of the West-Saxons did not adorne this Cuthwines head, yet shone it more bright, and stood with greater maiesty vpon the browes of Ina, the warlike and zealous King of West-Saxons, and of Egbert the victorious and first sole absolute Monarch of the English Empire: both of them in a right line issued from this Cuthwin, as in the seuenth Chapter we haue said.

ETHELBERT THE FIFTH, AND FIRST CHRISTIAN KING OF KENT, AND THE SIXTH MONARCH OF THE ENG- LISHMEN, HIS WIVES AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XVIII.

He flame of the West-Saxons for a time thus quenched, the Lampe of Kent began againe to shine, and to assume the Title of the Monarchie, after it had bene suppressed in them through the raignes of these foure last Kings: for young Egbert entrance, with the great losse of his Kentish, ouerthrowne by King Chevlín, gaue rather inducements to a tributary subiection, then any apparant hopes to purchase an Empire.

(2) But such is the dispose of God in his hidden Counsell, that things of least appearance many times become the greatest in substance, as in this Prince it was euidently scene, who making vse of his owne youth and losse, got thereby experience, both to defend himselfe, and to prouoke others, and with such victories abroad, repaired his losses at home, that as farre as Humber he made all subiect to Kent.

(3) Thus growne to be the greatest of any Saxon before him, hee fought to hold it vp for foraine alliance, and to that end became suter for Berta a most vertuous Christian Lady, the daughter of Chilperik

King of France, vnto whom by her father she was lastlie granted, but with these conditions, that she might reuerue her Christian Profession, enioy the presence and the instructions of Luidhard her learned Bishop, with the place of his Queene.

(4) These couenants concluded, and many French Christians attending her in his Court, by their daily seruice of God, and continuall practise of pietie, drew many of the English to fauour their Religion, yea and the King also to bee inclined that way. And as these were working the saluation of Kent, behold Gods proceedings for the conuersion of the reft.

(5) It chanced great Gregory (then but Arch-deacon of Rome) to see certaine youths of this Iland brought to that Citie, to be sold for slaues: His Christian heart pitying at such heathenish tyrannizing, and beholding stedfastly their faces to be faire and Angel-like, demanded of their Merchants, of what Nation they came; who made him answer, that they were Angles, and by that name were knowne vnto other Nations. Indeed, said he, and nor without cause, for their resemblance is Angelicall, and fit it is that they be made inheritorious with the Angels in Heauen. But of what Prouince are they? said Gregory. It was replied; Of Deira, a Country situated in the Continent of Britaine. Now surely, saith he, it is great pity but these people people should bee taken from Deira, the ire of God. And farther asking what was the name of their King, it was answered, that he was called Ella; whereunto he alluding, said, that Alleluia, to the praise of God, in that Princes Dominions should shortly be sung.

(6) And to that purpose himselfe, being afterwards Pope, sent Aufine a Monke, with forty others, for assistance, whereof Melitus, Iustus, and Iohn were chiefe. These landing in Tanet, in the month of Iuly, about five hundred ninety and six yeeres after the Incarnation of Christ, and one hundred forty and seven after the first marriage of these Angles into Britaine, had immediately access vnto the presence of King Ethelbert, but yet in the open Field, for hee feared to conferre with them in any house, left by force (as hee fondly furnished) he might be overcome.

(7) These preaching vnto him the word of life, his answer was, that presently he could not consent to their Doctrine, neither rashly forsake his ancient and accustom'd Religion. But seeing (said hee) you tell vs strange things, and giue vs faire promises of after life, when this life shall be ended, wee permit you to preach the fame to our people, and to conuert as many as you can; and wee our selues will minister all things behoouefull for your livelihood. Which promise hee instantly performed, and in Canterbury his head City, allowed them fit places for residence, and sufficient prouision for their maintenance; wherein these religious men, following in some measure the examples of the Apostles, spent their times in preaching and prayers, watching for the peoples conuersions, and exercising the workes of true piety, as examples and motives vnto others, to embrace the Gospel which they fought to plant.

(8) Neere vnto the East part of the City, stood an ancient Church, built by the Christian Romans, whiles they had dwelt in Britaine, and by them dedicated to the honour of S. Martin, and is so yet called. To this Church the Christian Queen Berta, with her Communicants the French, daily resorted to pray, and vnto these, and in this Church, Aufine and his fellows began daily to preach: vnto whose Sermons so many of the Kentish also resorted, that a plentiful harvest in short time appeared, vpon the felds-plot of their tillage; for it is reported that ten thousand of the English people were baptized there in one day, inasmuch that the King himselfe forooke his Heathenish Idolatrie, and likewise received the Sacrament of Baptisme, vnto his situation in Christ: in witness whereof, hee gaue the Lordship and Royaltie of his chiefe Citie Canterbury, vnto Aufine, and resigned his princely Palace therein vnto him, who in the East of this City laid the foundation of that great, and afterwards magnificent Church, dedicated to the seruice and name of Christ, which at this day is the Cathedral of that Metropolitan See: and Ethelbert to giue him more roome, withdrew himselfe vnto Reculer in Tanet, where he erected a Palace for himselfe and his successeurs, the compass whereof may be traced by an old wal, whose ruines remaine there yet to this day.

(9) Aufine thus seated, and in the well deferred fauour of King Ethelbert, got one request more, which was this, that whereas by the Law of the Twelue Tables, it was forbidden to bury the dead within the walles of any Citie, (the practise whereof, wee daily finde by monuments taken vp in the fields adjoining) it would please him to giue to that use, an old Idol Temple standing without the East Wall of the Citie, wherein the King himselfe had wontedly worshipped his Idols. This obtained, and the Church purged fro that prophane exercise, to the seruice of God, being honored with the name of S. Pancras, King Ethelbert added thereunto a most faire Monastrie, built vpon his owne cost, and dedicated it vnto the name of Peter and Paul the Apostles, appointing it to bee the place for the Kentish Kings Sepulchers, and Aufine likewise meant it for the Burials of his successeurs in that See. But first it became the Monument of his owne name: for in regard of the Procurer, both Pan- cras, Peter, and Paul were soone swallowed vp, and the whole called only by the name of S. Aufines. In this place, eight Kings of Kent had their bodies interred, and tenne of their Arch-bishops therein laid, vntill that Cuthbert the cleuenth in succession, in fauour of S. Iohn, a new Church by him erected, procured of King Egbert the sonne of Ercombert, that the succeeding Arch-bishops might be buried there. This Monastrie, as all the rest did, came to her fatal period in the daies of King Henry the Eighth, whose vncouered walles stood so long languishing in time and stormes of weather, that daily increased the aspect of her ruines, till now lastly they are made subiect to other publike uses, and the whole tract of that most goodly foundation in the same place no where appearing. Onely Ethelberts Tower, in memorie and honour of the man, as yet hath escaped the verdict and sentence of destruction; whose beauty, though much defaced and ouerborne, will witness to succeeding ages the magnificence of the whole, when all stood compleat in their glory together.

(10) These his happie beginnings, Aufine signified by Letters to Rome, and withall demanded directions, how he might further proceed: which questions, were they not written by the Venerable Bede, wee could hardly beleue that such idle conceits should haue place in the minde of a man so well and fruitfully buied: as, Whether a woman with child might receive the Sacrament of Baptisme, or in her monthly discharge, the holy Communion, or enter the Church: how long after her deliuerance, the husband ought to refrain her Bed: How the Gifts that were offred on the Altar, ought to be distributed: and vnto what degree of consanguinitie Christians might marie: and many others such like, as though himselfe had neuer read either Moses or Paul. But of the thing then more needfull, for that at that time it stirred most contention, it seemeth he was sufficiently instructed; neither among his other questions is it once named: and that was, the due time for the celebration of Easter: the difference whereof, betwixt the Britaines and the Romans was such, that it caused Lord-like Aufine to prophesie (if not to seeke) their destructions, and they in their opinions, to hold him no better then the Man of Sinne: for thus the Storie is reported.

(11) Aufine, by the assistance and authoritie of King Ethelbert, called an Assemblies of the British Bishops and Doctors, that had retained the doctrine of the Gospel among them, euen from the first plantation thereof by the Apostles themselves, to be holden in the Borders of the Pictians and West-Saxons, and at the place vpon that occasion called Aufines Oake: thither resorted seven British Bishops, and many other well learned men (saith Beda) out of their greatest Monastrie at Bangor, where at that time Dimoth was Abbat. These men now ready to goe to the foreaid Synod, came first to a certaine holy and wise man, which lived thereabout an Anchorite life, to aske his counsell, whether they ought as Aufine preaching and exhortation, leane their Traditions or no: The Anchorite replied, If he be a man of God, follow him. But how shall we proue (said they) that hee is a man of God? The Anchorite answered, Our Lord (saith, Take ye on you my Yoke, and learne ye of me, for I am milde and humble of heart. If therefore this Aufine be milde and humble of heart, it is like that himselfe beareth the Yoke of Christ, and will offer you the same to beare. But if hee be curst and proud, it is certaine that hee is not of God, neither must we much esteeme his words. Then they enquired, how they might know whether this Aufine were proud or no? Prouide (quoth he) that he and his companie may come first to the place of the Synod or Councell-house: and if hee be so that when you approach neere him, he arise courteously, and salute you, then thinke him to bee the seruant of Christ, and so beare him, and obey him: but if when you approach, hee despise you, and will not vouchsafe to rise at your presence, which are the greater number, let him likewise be despised of you. And truly (saith hee) as this Anchorite bade them, so did they: for it happened, that when they came thither, S. Aufine was already set in his chaire, and stirred not: which which when they saw, forthwith waxing wroth, they noted him of pride, and therefore endeuoured to overthrow him, and gain say whatsoeuer he propofed. And so the Synod brake vp without any thing done.

Thus then wee see, that the substance of doctrine was embraced in Britaine, before the sending of Aufine from Rome: only in ceremonies they differed, as the most of Christian Churches, without derogation to the Gospel, at this day doe. And this for the celebration of Easter, a matter of no great moment (if we consider our Christian libertie, and the Apostles feare, that the obseruations of daies, months, times, and yeeres, turne the hearts after beggerly rudiments, bring againe into bondage, and make his labours for Christ in vaine) yet for the different obseruation only of this Feast from the Romans, how oft are the Britaines termed by Beda, a wicked people, a curst nation, and well deserving those calamities which the Lord did afflict vpon them? This controuersie for Easters celebration, thus begun, continued no lesse then ninety yeeres after, and was lastly concluded in manner as followeth.

(12) This variance (saith Beda) made not onely the people to doubt and feare, left bearing the name of Christians, they did and had runne in vaine, as the Apostles speaketh, but also good Osby King of Northumberland, and learned Prince Alkfrid, with Queen Eanfleda, were much distracted and perplexed: for by this variance (saith hee) it often times hapned, that in one yeere two Easters were kept; for the King breaking vp his Fast, and solemnizing of the Feast, the Queen with Prince Alkfrid, continued their Fast, and kept that day their Palme-Sunday. To conclude which contrarietie, a Synod purposely was called, and the Question disputed by their best Diuines. The place was Stranalech or Whitley, whereof Hilda was Abbess. The chiefe parties for, and against the accustomed time of keeping that feast, were King Osby and Prince Alkfrid his sonne. The Disputers for Osby and the established orders, were Colman Arch-bishop of York, with his Scottish Clergie, and Hilda the vertuous and learned Lady Abbess of the place. For Alkfrid and the attempted alteration, were Agilbert Bishop of the West-Saxons, Wilfrid Abbat of Rippon, with Iames and Romanus, two learned men, and the reuerend Cedda newly consecrated Bishop, appointed Prolocutor of the Assembly.

The Conuocation set, King Osby made a solemn Oration, wherein hee urged a necessitie, that those people which serued one God, ought to celebrate his heavenly Sacraments alike, and should keepe one order and rule in the fame: the truth of which seruice, and force of that long vnchristian variance, for the Christian celebration and time of Easter, was then presently by those learned men to bee handled, and by best approuements to be determined; whereunto hee requested their vttermost endeuours, and to that purpose commanded his Arch-bishop Colman first to speake: whereupon Colman with reuerence stood vp and said: T he Easter which I obserue, I receiued of my Fore-fathers, of whom I was consecrated, and sent hither for your Bishop. They all (you know) were godly men, and obserued the Feast as we doe now: neither thinke you they kept this tradition without sure warrant from greater then themselves, which was Saint Iohn the Euangelist, and the Disciple whom Iesus especially loved, who in the Churches which himselfe planted, celebrated the Feast of Easter, as we doe now. Therefore knowing the man so worthy, and the manner so ancient, I hope you will all con- fesse, it is not safe for vs now to reiect.

Wilfrid the declaimer, appointed to answer, stood vp and said: T he Easter which we obserue, wee our selues haue sene obserued in Rome, where the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul liued, preached, suffred, and are buried: and in our travels thorow France and Italie, either for studie or upon pilgrimage, we haue sene the same order kept: and we know by relation, that in Africa, Asia, Egypt and Greece, may thorowout all nations and tongues in the world where Christ hath his Church, that this our time and order is obserued. Shall then these obstinate Picts (I meane the Britaines) and these remote lands in the Ocean Sea, as yet not all of them neither, fondly contend in this point against the whole world?

But here Colman interrupted him, and said, I much marvel, brother, that you terme our doings a fond contention, seeing we haue for our warrant an Apostle as Iohn was, who only leaned vpon our Lords breast, and whose life and behaviour all the world acknowledged to bee most wise and discreet.

God forbid (Alkfrid Wilfrid) that I should accuse Iohn: but yet we know that he kept the decrees of Moses literally, and according to the Iewish Lawes; and so the rest of the Apostles were constrained in some things to doe, for the weakness of them who accounted it a great sin to abrogate those rites that God himselfe had instituted; and for that cause S. Paul did circumsise Timothee, offred blood-sacrifices in the Temple, shaued his head at Corinth with Aquila and Priscilla: vpon which consideration also Iames vnto Paul, You see brother how many thousand of the Iewes haue receiued the faith, and all of these are yet zealous followers of the Law. But the light of the Gospel now shining thorow the world, it is not lawfull for any Christian to bee circumsised, or to offer up bloody sacrifices of Beasts. Saint Iohn therefore, according to the custome of the Law, in the fourteenth day of the first month, at euen began the celebration of Easters Festiuitie, regardlesse whether it fell vpon the Sabbath day, or any other of the weeke. But S. Peter preaching the Gospel in Rome, remembering that our Lord arose from his graue the first day after the Sabbath, giuing thereby vnto vs certaine assurance of our resurrection, obserued the Feast of Easter according to the Commandement of that Law he looked for, euen as S. Iohn did, that is to say the first Sabbath after the full Moone of the first month. Neither doth this new obseruation of the Gospel, and Apostles practise, breake the old Law, but rather fulfilleth it: for the Law commandeth the Feast of Passeouer to bee kept from the fourteenth day of that month, to the twentieth and one of the same. And this hath the Nicene Councell not newly decreed, but rather confirmed (as the Ecclesiasticall Historie witnesseth) that this is the true obseruation of Easter, and of all Christians after this account is to bee celebrated: and thereupon charged Bishop Colman, that hee neither obserued it according to Iohn nor Peter.

To this the Bishop replied, that Anatholius for his holiness much commended by the said Ecclesiasticall Historie, and Columba a Father of like Antiquitie, by whom miracles were wrought, kept the Feast according as he then did, from whose imitation hee durst not digresse.

Your Fathers, which you pretend to follow, how holy souer they bee (saith Wilfrid) and what miracles sene they haue wrought, yet this I answer, that in the day of iudgement many shall say vnto Christ, that they haue prophesied, cast out Diuels, and wrought miracles in his name, to whom our Lord will answer, I know you not. And if your Father Columba (yea and our Father, if hee be the true seruant of Christ) were holy and mightie in miracles, yet can hee by no means bee preferred to the most blessed Prince of the Apostles, vnto whom our Lord said, Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not preuaile against it, and to thee will I giue the keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen. Thus said, the King asked Colman, whether our Lord indeede spake thus vnto Peter, who answered, He did. But can you (saith hee) giue euidence of so speciall authoritie granted to your Father Columba? The Bishop said, No. Then (quoth the King) doe you both agree confidently, that these words were principally spoken vnto Peter, and that vnto him the keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen were giuen? They all answered, It is most certaine. Whereupon the King concluded this great controuersie, and said, T hen will not I gainsay such a Porter as this is, but as farre as I know, and am able, I will conent in all points to obey his ordinance, left perhaps when I come to the Doores of Heauen, I finde none to open vnto mee, hauing his displeasure, which is so cleerly proued to beare the keyes thereof.

And with this so simple a collection of King Osby, concluded this long and great contention for the celebration of Easter; which heere, as borne before the time, I haue inferted, to continue the narration thereof together, & to avoid repetition of the same things, which I seeke purposely to shunne; and so to returne againe to King Ethelbert.

(13) Who now became an instrument himselfe for the conuersions of his Nation the Saxons. The first fruits of his intendements were wrought vpon Sebert King of the East-Angles, his owne sisters sonne, whom not onely hee converted to Christianitie, but therein assisted him in the building of the Cathedrall Church of S. Paul for Miletus his Bishop; as also the Church of S. Peters on the West of London, then called Thorney, with the assistance of a London Citizen, as some haue said; and himself at Rochester, built the Cathedrall Church there, which he dedicated to the Apostle S. Andrew.

(14) This noble King having a care for them that should come after, brought the Lawes of his Country into their owne mother tongue, and left nothing vnattempted, that might aduance the glorious Gospell of Christ, or with honour adorne his owne temporal raigne; and is worthily an example to all succeeding Princes, in all true pietie, and heroical parts of a true Christian King. He died the foure and twentieth day of Februarie, in the yeere of our Lord God six hundred and sixteene, being the one and twentieth of his Christianitie, the three and twentieth of his Monarchie, and the fifty sixth of his Kingdome of Kent, and was buried at Canterbury in the Church of S. Peter and Paul, afterwards called S. Augustines, in the Chapell of S. Martinus.

(15) His first wife was Berta, the daughter of Chilperik King of France, as we haue said, who was the son of King Clotaire, the sonne of Clodoue, the first Christian King of that Country. Shee decaied before the King her husband, and was buried in the Church of S. Peter & Paul and Canterburie, within the Chapell of S. Martinus there.

(16) He had a second wife, whose name is not recorded by any Writer, being, as is thought, unworthy of remembrance, because of the vnnatural contract and marriage of Edwald her husbands sonne; a sinne that both Law and Religion doe condemne: and lastly by her conuerted husband was forsaken, without either note of her issue or death.

(17) The issue of King Ethelbert by Queene Berta were Edwald that succeeded him in the Kentish Kingdome, Ethelburg, and Edburge two daughters.

(18) Ethelburg, the elder, was a Lady of passing beautie and pietie, and surnamed Tace, who greatly desired and intended a Virgins life, had not her mind bene auerted by the intreaty of her brother, the persuasions of Bishop Paulinus, and the earnest suit of Edwine King of Northumberland; vnto which Edwine lastly he yielded to bee his wife, in hope of his conuersion, and vnto whom for that purpose Pope Boniface directed his Epistle from Rome, earnestly exhorting her that shee should bee diligent for the Kings saluation: which shee soone after effected, to the great joy of both the Kings, and to the comfort and increase of the Christian Faith thorowout England.

(19) Edburge, another daughter of King Ethelbert, is warranted only by the testimonie of John Capgrave, a great trauelier in Antiquities, and should bee most skilful in his own Country of Kent: notwithstanding he is to be suspected in this, that hee reporteth her to haue bene a Nunne in the Monasterie of Minster in the Ile of Thanet, vnder the Foundresse Domneue, being the daughter of her nephew Ermenred, and that shee succeeded in the government of that house, Mildred the daughter of the same Domneue. Hee reporteth also, that shee died and was buried in the same place, and that her body was from thence remooued by the Arch-bishop Lankfrank, to his Church of S. Gregorie in Canterburie.

CHAPTER XIX.

An. D. 616.

Edwald, the sonne of Titulus, and the third King of the East-Angles, had been a substitute vnder Ethelbert King of Kent, and serued a long time as his Vice-roy ouer all his dominions, whereby he gained such reputation to himselfe, that either for his owne valour, or Edwalds vices, (contemned of the people for his Apostatie, sensle, and incestuous bed) became the seuenth Monarch of the Englishmen, about the yeere of Christ his Incarnation six hundred and sixteene; and the twentieth and fourth of his raigne ouer the East-Angles.

(2) This Redwald (saith Beda) had receiued Baptisme in Kent, but in vaine, and without zeale, as it afterwards appeared. For returning to his Country, through the perswasion of his wife, returned againe to his superstitious worships; and in one and the same Temple, after the manner of the old Samaritans, hee erected an Altar for the seruice of Christ, and another little Altar for burnt sacrifices to his Idols, which stood vnto the daies of Beda himselfe. But as he was an instigator to the East-Saxons idolatry, so was hee an instrument to the further spreading of Christianitie (though not by her so purposely meant) in fauour the life of Edwine, who afterwards planted the Gospell in all the North parts of the Saxons government.

(3) For Edwine flying the rage of wilde Ethelfrid, was succoured and maintained in the Court of King Redwald, vnto whom lastly, the Northumbrian sent both threats and rewards to haue him deliuered, or else put to death: and surely had not the Queene stood for his life, he had presently died. But shee alleasing the law of humanitie, the trust of a friend, and the royaltie of a Prince, prevailed so farre, that Redwald did not onely saue his life, but assisted him in battell, to the destruction of his enimie, and the gaining of Northumberlands Crowne. For vpon the return of Ethelfrids Ambassadors, vnto whom Redwald had yielded to make Edwine away, he with his power of the East-Angles were at their backes, and as an enimie made towards Northumberland.

(4) Ethelfrid, whose rage and reuenge was ready enough vpon lesser occasions, with such sudden preparation as he was able to make, met the East-Angles almost at Nottingham, and that not farre from the Riuer Idle, where boldly encountering his vnequall enimie, at the first brunt slew Reynhere the sonne of King

Redwald, to the great griefe of him and his whole host: whose reuenge was so violently fought, that they slew King Ethelfrid in the field, and established Edwine to be his successor; which was the second yeere of Redwalds Monarchy.

(5) Wherein he raigned the space of eight yeeres, and was King of the East-Angles thirty one; and decaied in the yeere of our Lord six hundred twentie foure; the eighth of Edwalds King of Kent; the thirteenth of King's King of the West-Saxons, and the eighth of Edwins ouer the Northumbrians.

(6) The Queene and wife of this King is not named by any of our Writers, but that she had been the widow of a Nobleman, defended of the bloud-royall of that Nation, and was a Lady that had deserued great commendations for the many vertues by her possessed, had been a Christian, or a fauor of the Christians, or had not been an vtter enemy to their faith. Notwithstanding by her first husband she had a sonne named Sigebert, that proued a learned and most religious Prince, of whom we haue spoken in Chapter eleuenth.

(7) His issue were Reynhere and Erpenwald. Reynhere the elder, and Prince of the East-Angles, was slaine as you haue heard, in the battell that his father fought against wilde Ethelfrid, neere vnto the Riuer Idle in Nottinghamshire.

(8) Erpenwald the younger succeeded his father Redwald in the Kingdome of the East-Angles, and was the fourth King of that Nation, whose life and raigne we haue declared in the succession of the East-Angles Kings: Chapter 11.

Redwald, his raigne.

EDVINE THE GREAT KING OF NORTHVMBERLAND, AND THE EIGHTH SOLE MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, WIVES, AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XX.

An. Do. 617.

He Monarch reuerted from the East-Angles, was next possessed by the Northumbrians, wherein it was held with greater glorie and for longer time. For Edwine in King Redwalds life growne very potent, after his death became his successor in the English Monarch, and most worthily did adorne the same by his ciuill iustice and diuine pietie: his exile, visions, and obtaining of the Northumbrians Crowne, we haue already spoken of, and therefore without repetition will passe on to his end.

(2) This Edwine, the sonne of great Ella, the first King of the Deirians, was the third King that possessed the same, the eighth of Bernicia, the second (and first Christian) King of all Northumberland, at the age of twenty three, and in the yeere of Christ six hundred twenty foure, succeeded Redwald in the Monarchy, and was the greatest King of all the Saxons. For

(as Beda saith) hee subdued all the coasts of Britannia wherefoeuer any Provinces were inhabited, either of Englifo or of Saxons, which thing no King of the Englifo before him had done; and added the Meutian Iles vnto his owne Dominions. The first of them, and next the South, was large and fertile, gaue roome for nine hundred and fixty of his Englifo Families, and the second, ground for about three hundred Tene-ments.

Ethelburg
good parte.

(3) His first wife dead, he became suiter for Lady Ethelburg, daughter to Ethelbert King of Kent, decaied, and sister to King Eadwald then reigning: whole Ambassadors were answered, that it was not lawfull for a Christian Virgin to be espoused to a Pagan, lest the faith and sacraments of the heavenly King should bee prophaned, by the matching with that earthly King, which knew not to worship God aright. But Edwine hearing of the Virgins beautie, integrity, and pietie, was so farre ouergone and rauished therewith, that hee condescended, shee should with her place retain her owne Christian Profession, and enioy the Christian societie both of her men, woman, Priests, and seruants, to bee her attendants in his Court. These couenants thus confirmed, the Lady accompanied with Paulinus the reuerend Bishop, and an honourable retinue, all of them Christian, came to King Edwine Court, and with great ioy theee was espoused his Queene.

A conspiracie.

(4) The greatnesse and prosperitie of this Northumbrian King, was both feared by them a farre, that reigned in no such power, and beheld by his neerer, with an enuious eie: among whom, Quinchelme that reigned with his father king ouer the West-Saxons, sent a desperate Ruffin, whose name was Eumerus, to murder Edwine the next yeere of his marriage; who repairing to his Court, then resident neere the riuier Dereunt, at the place that is now called Aldeby in Yorkshire, with a double-edged short sword, the point thereof poisoned, and girt vnder his garment, vpon Easter day entered his Palace, as an Ambassador, and with craftie speech retained the Kings attention, where getting occasion, and stepping forward, drew his sword, which one Lilla the Kings seruant saw, and wanting wherewith to defend his person, put himselfe betwixt the King and the sword: and throw his bodie so flaine, the same was so farre runne, that it dangerously wounded the King with his point, and with the same sword, before hee could be beaten down by the Guard, slew another seruant, whose name was Forthere.

Beda hist. Angl.
lib. 3. cap. 9.

Bishop Paulinus.

(5) It happened the same night, being holy Easter Sunday, that Queene Ethelburg was brought to bed of a daughter: for ioy whereof, and her safe deliuerance, the King gaue thanks to his Idols; which Bishop Paulinus, then in presence, greatly reprovied, and bade Edwine to giue thanks vnto God, from whom only all goodnesse came; and spake vnto him of our new birth in Christ: at which conference the King much reioiced, and promised that hee would euer after renounce all his Idols, and worship that Christ whom he preached, if that God would grant him his life, and giue him victorie against that King, who had sent this Manqueller to murder him; in pledge whereof, he assigned Paulinus to baptise his daughter, the which vpon Whitsunday following was performed in her, by the name of Eanfled, and shee the first of the Northumbrians which received that Sacrament. At which time also, Edwine being recouered of his wound so lately received, made an Armie, and marched forth against the West-Saxons, and in battle either slew or tooke prisoners all them that had conspired his death, and as a victorious Conquerour, returned to his Country.

(6) Where continuing in honour, and his affaires prospering to his owne desires, hee was yet in minde distracted, and his thoughts continually perplexed, what God he should worship. The sanctitie of the Christians moued him much, and the ancient customes of his Ancestours fate neere his heart, betwixt whom there seemed a combat in himselfe. And in these dumps sitting one day alone, it chanced Bishop Paulinus to haue access to his presence, where laying his right hand vpon the kings head, demanded of him whether hee remembered that signe: whereat Edwine suddenly fell at the Bishops feete, whom hee in haste and reuerence presently lifted vp, and spake vnto him as followeth.

Behold O Soueraigne (said he) by the bountifull hand and power of our God, you haue escaped the hand and vengeance of your most hated and dreadful enemy. Behold also, by his most gracious goodnes you haue obtained the souerain- tie of raigne and rule of the Kingdom. Remember now therefore the third thing which you promised him, and de- ferre no longer to accomplish the same by receiving his faith and keeping his Commandements, who hath deliuered you from your temporal aduersities, and exalted you to the ho- nour and Maistie of a King; whose holy will if you hereaf- ter obey, and doe his precept which by mee is preached, hee will also deliuer you from the perpetuall torment of Hell, and make you partaker with him in his heavenly Kingdom and eternall blisse without end.

(7) Whereupon conferring with his Counsell, whereof Bishop Cosy was chiefe, for the establishing of the Gospell, and suppressing of Idolatrie, it was then concluded, that the true God should be wor- shipped, and the Altars of their wonted Idols ouer- throwne: vnto which action, Cosy himselfe became the first man; for mounted on horsebacke in armour, with a girt sword and lance in his hand (all which was vnlawfull for those Idoll-Priests) he brake downe their Altars, Grates, and Barres, and destroyed their Temples wherefoeuer he came. Some ruines there- of not farre from York, and neere vnto the rising of the riuier Dereunt, remained to be seen vnto the daies of Beda, and were then called Gottmund in Gaham. And king Edwine himselfe, with all his Nobilitie, and most of the Commons, received the lauer of Baptisme, the eleuenth yeere of his raigne, and of Christs Incarna- tion six hundred twenty and seuen, one hundred and eighty yeeres after the Saxons entrance into Britaine. The king was baptized the twelfth of April, being Easter Sunday, at the Citie York, in the Church of S. Peters, built then of wood, and was the kings Ora- torie, which he enclosed about with a deepe founda- tion, and laying the walles with squared stones, made it the Cathedrall Church, and his Conuerter Paulinus Arch-bishop of that See.

(8) The Gospell thus established in these North-erne parts, spread daily further into other Prouin-ces, and with such fruit of peace, that in the raigne of this Edwine, and thorowout his Dominions, a weakie woman with her new-borne babe might haue passed without damage or danger ouer all the Iland, euen from Sea to Sea. And so much did the King tender his Subjects, that his prouident care was extended to the way-faring passengers, for whose vse he enclosed cleere Springs by the waies, where he set great Balens of brasle, both to walke and to bathe in; which either for loue or displeasure of the king, no man defaced, or tooke away.

And so great was the magnificence of this Monarch, that (according to Beda) he had not only in Battle the Ensignes proper to battle borne before him, but in his ordinarie passages thorow the Cities and Towns of his kingdom, there alwaies went an Ensigne-bearer before him. And (to vse the words of the same venerable Author) he went not in any street, in which there was not borne before him that kinde of Stand-ard which the Romans called Tufa, and the Englifo Thauf. That the Romans had such an Ensigne, as that which here is called Tufa, Iustus Lipsius in his Com-mentarie vpon that place in Vegetius (lib. 3. cap. 5.) where the feuerall Ensignes of the Romans are recited, doth declare, correcting that place of Vegetius (where Rufa was set for Tufa) by this place of Beda, and in the same shewing, that Tufa signified a Ball, as the Ball (by the example of Augustus) was an Ensigne of Monar-chie, or absolute government.

(9) But as the Sunne hath his rising, his height and descent, and euer is mouing in the circle of his celestiall orbe; so man hath his birth time, being, and death, and till then is neuer staid in one certaine point. Kings therefore, as they be Kings, are the Suns of their owne world, but as they are men, goe to the shadow of death: neither can the strength of their power, wisdom, or policie, loue or applause, stay the hand heere that holds the fatall knife; for so in this King Edwine wee see, raised about hope to attaine the Diademe, and ruling in loue and liking of the people, was notwithstanding cut off in the midst of his glorie and greatnesse of strength.

(10) For Penda the stout Mercian enuying his peace, and Cadwallo the Britaine seeking to receiue his right, ioined in friendship against this Monarch, and met him as his enemies in the face of a Field. The plaines was large, and called Heilsfeld, where after a long and most bloudie fight, king Edwine was slaine, with prince Offryd his sonne, his whole Host put to the sword, or most shamefull flight: which chanced the fourth of October, the yeere of our Lord six hundred thirty three, the sixth of his Christianitie, the se-uenth of his Monarchie, the seuenteenth of his king- dome, and the forty seuenth of his age. His bodie was lastly buried in S. Peters Church at Streatshall, after called Whitby.

His Wines.

(11) Quenburg his first wife, was the daughter (as Beda reporteth) of Ceorle, but as all other Writers doe witness, of Crida King of Mercia. Shee was married vnto him in the beginning of his youth; (and when hee was dispossest of his inheritance by the Tyrant Ethelfrid, as we haue said) with him shee liued a great part of his banishment, and in the Court of Redwald King of the East-Angles decaied, before her husband could recouer his Kingdom.

(12) Ethelburg, surnamed Tate, was the second wife of this King, who was the daughter of Ethelbert King of Kent, and of Queene Berta his first wife. Shee was married vnto him in the yeere of grace six hundred twentie five, being the second of his Monarchie, and was his wife six yeeres: but suruiuing him, and desirous to liue a religious life, shee returning into Kent, withdrew her selfe to a place not far from the Sea side, called Lymming, wherein shee built a Mona-sterie of Nunnes, and amongst them spent the rest of her life, and therein died, and was there buried.

His Issue.

(13) Offryd, the eldest sonne of King Edwine, and Quenburg his first wife, was borne in the time of his fathers exile among the East-Angles. Hee was baptized in the faith of Christ by Paulinus the first Arch-bishop of York, and was slaine the same day, and in the same battell that his father was. He had a sonne named Iffy, who was baptized also by Bishop Paulinus; and after the death of his father and grand-father, for feare of King Oswald, was conueied ouer the Seas into France, to bee brought vp in the Court of King Dagobert, where he died in his childhood, and was there honour-ably interred.

(14) Edfrid, the second sonne of King Edwine and Lady Quenburg his first wife, was borne in the time of his fathers exile, and baptized with his brother Offryd by Bishop Paulinus. After his fathers death, for feare of King Oswald, hee fled to Penda King of Mercia, who was his fathers enemy, and his mothers kins- man, by whom hee was most treacherously murder- ed. He left behind him a son named Herrik, who by his wife Beriswith had issue the vertuous & learned la- dy Hilda, Abbess of Streatshall: & Queene Herefrith her sister, the wife of Ethelbert King of the East-Angles brother to King Anna, by whom shee had issue Ald wolve, Elfwold, and Beorne, all three succeeding Kings of the East-Angles.

(15) Ethelme, the third sonne of King Edwine, and the first of Queene Ethelburg his second wife, was bap- tized by Paulinus Arch-bishop of York, not long after his father and half-brethren; but in short space after his baptism, he departed out of this world, euen in the time that he wore the white attire, which in those daies was vsed to bee worn by such as were newly baptized for a certaine space. His body was with all due funeral obsequies entred within the new Church of S. Peter in the Citie of York, which his fa- ther had newly founded.

(16) Vskfrea, the fourth sonne of King Edwine, and the second of Queene Ethelburg his second wife, and the last and youngest of them both, bare the name of his fathers great grandfather. Hee was baptized by the Arch-bishop Paulinus at one time with his brother Ethelme. After the decaie of his father, his mother carried him with her out of Northumberland into Kent; and from thence conueied him ouer into France with his Nephew Iffy, the sonne of his halfe-brother Offryd, where hee continued in the custodie of King Dagobert, being his mothers cosen-german, and there died, and was honourably buried in a Church with his Nephew Iffy.

(17) Eanfled, the elder daughter of King Edwine and Queene Ethelburg his second wife, was borne the night following that her father was wounded and baptized, hee being a Pagan. Shee was afterwards married to Osvey, the fourth King of Northumberland, and tenth Monarch of the Englifo, as shall bee said.

(18) Ethelrida the younger daughter, the fifth and last-borne child to King Edwine and of Queene Ethelburg, was baptized at the same time with Ethelme and Vskfrea her brethren. Shee died an infant, the white clothing not yet put off, which in those daies was vsu- ally worn at certaine feir times after their baptism, and was with like funeral obsequies buried by her brother Ethelme in the Church of S. Peters in York, which their father had founded.

OSWALD

OSVVALD KING OF NORTHVM-BERLAND, AND THE NINTH MO-NARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, WIFE, AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XXI.

Oswald, the fifth King of Deira, the ninth of Bernicia, the third of Northumberland, and the ninth Monarch of the Englishmen, began his raigne the yeere of Christs incarnation six hundred thirty foure. He with Eanfrit and his brethren, the sonnes of wilde

Ethelfrid, and Ofrik also the sonne of Alfrid King Edwins Vncle had been seured in Scotland all his raigne, and among the Red-shanks liued as banished men, where they learned the true religion of Christ, and had receiued the Lauer of Baptisme. But Edwines death wrought and diuulged, these Princes returne again to their Country, and the Northumbrians Kingdome lately gouerned by one, was now againe diuided into two seuerall parts, as formerly it had been.

(2)ouer the Deirans, Ofrik was made king, and of Bernicia, Eanfrit assumed the raigne; but Gods iustice ouer taking their Apostasie, neither their liues nor this diuision lasted long. For Cadwall the Christian, and Penda the Pagan were Gods instruments, that with worthy vengeance in the first yeere of their gouernment, cut the one off in battell, and the other by trecherie; whose names and yeere of raigne as vnhappy and of hateful remembrance, the Historiographers of those times would haue to be omitted.

(3) But religious Oswald lamenting the effusion of his Countries blood, long slept not, their reuenge. For assembling his power, which was not great, hee suddenly and vnlooked for came vpon Cadwall, and at Denfelhorne pitched downe his tents. The place (saith Bede) stood nere the wall that seuerus had made, where Oswald for the first day forbore to fight, and among his Souldiers for his Standard set vp a Crosse of wood, wherunto it seemeth those dawning daies of Christianity were ouermuch addicted. Here

Oswald making first intercession to God, the onely preseruer of his people, in fore & long fight obtained great victory, with the slaughter of Cadwall, and of all his British Army: which so accomplished, many haue attributed the vertue of that Crosse to bee no small cause of that great ouerthrow. This Crosse so set vp, was the first we read of to haue been erected in England, and the first Altar vnto Christ among the Bernicians, whose pretended miraculous cures, not onely in the wood it selfe, but in the mosse and in the earth wherein it was set, let Bede report them, and Stapleton vrge them, yet for my part, I hold them no Article of our canonically Creed.

(4) But certaine it is, that Oswald himselfe was a most religious and godly king, and tooke such care for the conuersion and saluation of his subiects, that he sent into Scotland for Aidan a Christian Bishop, to instruct his Northumbrians in the Gospel of truth. And whereas the Bishops could not speake their language, the king himselfe was interpreter at his Sermons, and gaue his words in the English, as hee spake and pronounced them in the Scottish, which language Oswald perfectly spake, hauing bene there the space of eightene yeeres.

Thus the godly proceedings of the king and Bishop, produced such increase of their heavenly seed, that it is reported in seuen daies space, fiftene thousand Christians receiued Baptisme; and many of them forsaking the pleasures of the world, to haue betake themselves to a religious and solitarie life.

(5) At this time the whole Iland flourished both with peace and plentie, and acknowledged their subiection vnto king Oswald. For, as Bede reporteth, all the Nations of Britannie which spake foure languages, that is to say, Brittaines, Redshanks, Scots, and Englishmen, became subiect vnto him. And yet being aduanced to so royall Maiesie, he was notwithstanding (which is marvellous to be reported) lowly to all, gracious to the poore, and bountifull to strangers. The fruits whereof the same Author exemexemplifieth in his bounty and humilitie towards the poore; who vpon a solemne feast day, seeing many such at his gates, sent them both the delicacies for himselfe prepared, & commanded the charger of siluer to be broken, and diuided among them. The Bishop much reioycing thereat, tooke the king by the right hand, and praised that it might neuer consume; as after his death it did not, but was shined in siluer, and in S. Peters Church at Bebb, now Bambrongh, with worthy honor was worshipped for the many miracles in cures that it did, as likewise the earth wherein his blood was spilt: with such lauish enlargements haue those writers interlined the deeds of Gods Saints.

(6) But as the Sunne hath his shadow, and the highest tide her ebbe, so Oswald, how holy soeuer, or gouernment how good, had emulators that fought his life, and his Countries ruine: for wicked Penda the Pagan Mercian, enuying the greatnesse that king Oswald bare, raised warres against him, and at a place then called Maserfeld in Shropshire, in a bloudie and fore fought battle slew him, and not therewith satisfied, in barbarous and brutish immanitie, did teare him in peeces, the first day of August, and yeere of Christ Iesus six hundred forty two, being the ninth of his raigne, and the thirty eighth of his age: wherupon the said place of his death is called to this day Oswaldstree, a faire Market Towne in the same Countie.

(7) The dismembred limmes of his body were first buried in the Monastery of Bradney in Lincolnshire, shined with his standard of Gold and Purple erected ouer his Tombe, at the industry and cost of his neece Offryd, Queene of Mercia, wife vnto king Ethelred, and daughter to Oswyn that succeeded him. From hence his bones were afterwards remooued to Glocester, and there in the north side of the vpper end of the Quire in the Cathedrall Church, continueth a faire Monument of him, with a Chapell set betwixt two pillars in the same Church.

His Wife.

(8) Kineburg, a most vertuous Lady, and daughter to Kingls the sixth, and first Christian king of the West-Saxons, was the wife of king Oswald, who became both his father and sonne in the day of her marriage, by receiuing him at the Font, and her of his gift. She was married vnto him in the second yeere of his raig, which was the yeere of Christs Incarnation six hundred thirty six: no other relation made of her besides the birth of his sonne.

His Issue.

(9) Ethelwald, the only childe of king Oswald and Queene Kineburg his wife, was borne in the yeere of our Lord six hundred thirty seuen, being the third yeere of his fathers raig; and but an infant at his fathers death, was disappointed of the Northumbrian Kingdome by the fraud of his vncle Oswyn. Notwithstanding at the death of Oswyn king of Deira, and then not aboue sixteene yeeres of age, hee tooke the same kingdome, and by strong hand held it against his vncle so long as he liued, and at his death left it to his cosen Alkefrid, the naturall sonne of king Oswyne, as in the ninth Chapter we haue said.

OSVYV KING OF NORTHVM-BERLAND, AND THE TENTH MO-NARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS ACTS, WIFE, AND CHILDREN.

CHAPTER XXII.

Osvey, the illegitimate sonne of King Ethelfrid, surnamed the Wilde, at thirty yeeres of age succeeded Oswald his halfe brother in his Dominions, being the fourth King of Northumberland, and the tenth Monarch of the Englishmen, entring his gouernment the thirteenth day of October, and yeere of Christs Incarnation six hundred forty three. His first beginnings were much disquieted by Penda the Heathen Mercian, by the rebellions of his base sonne Alfrid, and by the oppositions of Ethelwald the son of King Oswald: but none late more neere his heart then Oswyn king of the Deirans did, whose vertuous gouernment did much darken (as hee tooke it) his owne, and the free loue of those subiects, daily to lessen his among the Bernicians.

(2) This Oswyn of Deira was the sonne of Ofrike (who

(who did apostate from his faith) and ruling his Province in plentie and peace the space of seven yeeres, was therefore greatly enuid by Ofwy of Bernicia, and lastly by him prouoked into the field. Their hosts met at the place then called Wilfars Downe, ten miles West from the village Cataracton, and there attended to hazard the day. But Ofwy finding himselfe too weake for Ofwy, and to faue the effusion of Christian blood, forsooke the field, accompanied onely with one Souldier, and went to Earle Hunwald his friend as he thought, to secure his life. But contrary to trust, hee deliuered him vnto King Ofwy, who cruelly flew him the twentieth of August, and ninth of his raigne, at the place called Ingethings where afterwards for satisfaction of so heinous an offence, a Monasterie was built, as vpon like occasions, many the like foundations were laid; whose stones were thus ioynd with the mortar of blood.

(3) Of this Ofwys thus slaine, Reda reporteth the Story following: Among his other rare vertues and princely qualities, his humility (saith he) and passing lowliness excelled: whereof he thus exemplifieth: There- uerend Christian Bishop Aidan vsing much trauell to preach the Gospel thorowout that Prouince, the King for his more ease, gaue him a goodly Gelding with rich and costly trappings. It chanced one day, as the Bishop rode to minister the word of life, that a poore man demanded his almes: but hee not hauing wherewith to releue him, and pitying his distressed poore estate, presently alighted, and gaue vnto him his horse and rich furniture; whereof when the King heard, he blamed him, and said, What meant you (my Lord) to giue to the begger the horse that I gaue you, with my saddle and trappings? Had we horses of no lower price to giue away to the poore? To whom the Bishop replied, And is the brood of a beast dearer in your sight, then this poore mans childe of God? The King thus reprooued, turned himselfe towards the fire, and there sadly pausing vpon this answer, presently gaue from him his sword, and in haste fell at the Bishops feet, desiring forgiveness in that he had said. The Bishop much astonished, suddenly lift up the King, desiring him to sit to meat, and to be merry; which the King immediately did, but the Bishop contrariwise began to bee pensive and sadde, and the teares to trickle downe his cheekes: in which passion hee burst out into these speeces, and said to his Chaplaine in an unknowne tongue, I neuer till this time haue scene an humble King; and surely his life cannot bee long, for this people are not worthy to haue such a Prince to govern them. But to returne to King Ofwy.

(4) Who after many cruell inuasions of the mercileffe Penda, was forced to flee vnto him for peace, with proffers of infinite treasure and most precious iewels: all which reiected, and the Tyrant comming on, Ofwy sought his helpe by supplication to God, and with such zeale as then was embraced, vowed his young daughter Elsted to be consecrated in perpetuall virginity vnto him, with twelue Farmers and their landes, to the erection and maintenance of a Monasterie: and thereupon prepared himselfe for battle.

(5) The Armie of this enemy is reported to redouble thirty times his, all well appointed and old tried souldiers: against whom Ofwy with his sonne Alfrid boldly marched, Egfrid his other sonne then being an hostage with Cinifin vnder Queene of the Mercians: Ethelwald the sonne of Ofwald, tooke part with Penda, against his naturall Vncle and natie Country: so did Ethelherd the brother of Christian Anna, side with this heathenish and cruell Mercian.

(6) The battle was fought nere to the riuer Juuet, which at that time did ouer-flow his banks, so that the victorie falling with Ofwy, more were drowned in the water then slaine with the sword. And heerein proud Penda lost his life, with the discomfiture of all his Mercian power. Heerein also died Ethelherd, the East- Angles King, who was the only motiue to these waues: and Ethelwald escaping, returned with dishonour vnto Deira. The day was thus gotten the thirtieth yeere of King Ofwy his raigne, the fiftieth day of Nouember, and yeere of Christ his Incarnation six hundred fifty six.

(7) After this victorie, king Ofwy raigned in great glory the space of three yeeres, subduing the Mercians, the fourth parts of the Englifs, and made the northern parts likewise subiect vnto him. He it was that decided the long controvercy for Easters celebration, and founded the Cathedral Church in Lichfield for a Bishops See: which Citie, with all South-Mercia, diuided from the north by the riuer Trent, hee gaue to Penda the sonne of king Penda in marriage with his naturall daughter Alkfled, on condition that he should become a Christian: all which the said king not long enioied, but was murdered in his owne Court. And the Mercians erecting Vulfhere his brother and their natie country-man for king, rebelled against Ofwy, and freed themselves from a foraine subiection.

(8) Thus Ofwy ending in troubles as he began in warres, raigned the space of twenty eight yeeres, and then falling sicke, was so strucke with remorse for the death of good Ofwy, and blood which hee had spilt, that hee vowed a pilgrimage to Rome, in which reputed holy place hee purposed to haue ended his life, and to haue left his bones therein to rest: but his disease increaseth, and that purpose failing, he left this life the fiftieth of Februarie, and his body to remaine in S. Peters Church at Streatsbach, the yeere after Christs birth six hundred seuentie, and of his owne age fifty eight.

His Wife.

(9) Eanfled, the wife of this king, was the daughter of Edwin and Ethelburg, king & Queene of Northumberland. She was the first Christian that was baptized in that Prouince, and after her fathers death, was brought vp in Kent vnder her mother, and thence married vnto this Ofwy, whom shee furruied, and spent the whole time of her widow-hood in the Monastery of Steanshale, where her daughter Elfred was Abbess, wherein shee decaied and was interred in the Church of S. Peter, hard by her husband king Edwin.

His Issue.

(10) Egfrid, the eldest sonne of king Ofwy and of Queene Eanfled, was borne in the third yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of grace six hundred forty six. In the twenty fifth yeere of his age, and of our Lord God six hundred seuentie one, hee succeeded his father in Northumberland, but not in his Monarchie: of whose life and acts, wee haue further spoken in the seuenth Chapter of this Booke.

(11) Elfwine, the second sonne of king Ofwy, and of Queene Eanfled, was borne in the yeere of our Lord six hundred sixty one, being the ninth of his fathers raigne; at whose death he was nine yeeres old: and in the ninth yeere after, being the eighteenth of his age, was vnfortunatly slaine in a battell, wherein hee serued his brother Egfrid, against Ethelred king of the Mercians, to the great griefe of them both, the yeere of Christs natiuitie six hundred seuentie nine.

(12) Elsted, the eldest daughter of king Ofwy and queene Eanfled, was borne in the month of September, the yeere of grace six hundred fiftie foure, being the twelfth of her fathers raigne; and when she was a yeer old, by him committed to the custodie & bringing vp of the renowned Lady Hilda, Abbess of Streatsbach, wherein shee liued vnder her a Nun, and after her death did succeed her Abbess of the place, and in great holinesse and vertue, spent therein her life, vnto the day of her death, which was the yeere of Christ Iesus seuen hundred fourteene, and of her owne age sixtie, being interred in S. Peters Church within the same Monasterie.

(13) Offrid, the younger daughter of king Ofwy and queene Eanfled, was borne about the fiftieth yeere of her fathers raigne, which was the yeere of our Lord six hundred sixtie seuen: and when she was fully twenty, was married vnto Ethelred king of Mercia, the twelfth Monarch of the Englismen, in the third yeere of his raigne, and of Christ six hundred seenty seuen.

(14) Alfrid, the naturall sonne of king Ofwy, did first succeed his colen Ethelwald, sonne of king Ofwald his his Vncle in part of Northumberland, and held the same by force against his Father, which afterwards hee peaceably inioied both with him and his halfe brother King Egfrid, whom lastly hee succeeded in the whole kingdom of Northumberland, as more at large in the same story we haue declared.

(15) Alkfled, the naturall daughter of king Ofwy, borne before her father was king, in the yeere of Christs incarnation six hundred fiftie three, and the eleuenth of her fathers raigne, was married to Penda the sonne of Penda, that by his permission had gouerned some part of Mercia, and by Ofwy his gift with this Alkfled, all the South of that Prouince. She was his wife three yeeres, and is of most writers taxed to be the actor of his death, being wickedly murdered in the feast of Easter, the yeere of grace six hundred fiftie fixe, and the fourteenth of her Fathers raigne.

VVLFHRE THE SIXTH KING OF THE MERCIANS, AND THE ELEVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, WIFE, AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Vulfhere, after the murder of his brother Penda, advanced against Ofwy by the Nobles of Mercia, maintained his title and kingdom for twelve yeeres continuance, in the life time of that Northumbrian Monarch, and after his death translated the Monarchy from those Kings and Country, vnto himself and his successors the Mercians, who now wore the Imperiall Diademe without reuerfement, vntill such time as great Egbert set it vpon the West-Saxons head.

He was the second sonne of Penda King of Mercia, and the sixth in succession of that kingdom, beginning his raigne the yeere of Christ his Incarnation, six hundred fiftie nine, and twelve yeeres after, Anno six hundred seenty one, entered his Monarchy ouer the Englismen, and was in number accounted the eleuenth Monarch of the Land.

(2) His entrance was with trouble against the Northumbrians, for vnto Egfrid their King hee had lost the possession of the land Linsie, and was expelled the Country: yet three yeeres after hee fought against the West-Saxons with better successe, whose Country with conquest hee passed thorow, and wan from Renwald their King the Ile of Wight, which land hee gaue to Edilwath the South-Saxons King, whom hee receiued his God-sonne at the font-foote: notwithstanding himselfe had lately beene a prophane Idolater, and most cruell Heathen, as by the Liger booke of the Monastery of Peterborow appeareth, whose story is this:

(3) King Vulfhere of Mercia remaining at his Castell in Vulferchefer in Staffordshire, and vnderstanding that Vulfald and Rufin his two sonnes, vnder pretence and colour of hunting, vsually resorted to reuerend Chad, to bee instructed in the fruitfull faith of Christ Iesus, and had at his hands receiued the Sacrament of Baptisme, at the perswasion of one Werebod, suddenly followed, and finding them in the Oratory of that holy man, in deuout contemplations, flew them there with his owne hands. Whose martyred bodies Queene Ermenbild their mother caused to be buried in a Sepulchre of stone, and thereupon a faire Church to be erected, which by reason of the many stores thither brought for that foundation, was euer after called Stones, and now is a Market Towne in the same County. But King Vulfhere repenting this his most vnhumane murder, became himselfe a Christian, and destroyed all those Temples wherein his heathen Gods had been worshipped, conuerting them all into Christian Churches, and religious Monasteries: and to redeeme so heinous an offence, vnderwent the finishing of Medfham, his brothers foundation, enriching it largely with lands and possesons: notwithstanding hee is taxed by William of Malmesbury with the fopie sinne of Symony, for selling vnto Wyná the Bishopricke of London.

(4) He raigne King ouer the Mercians the space of leuenteene yeeres, and Monarch of the Engliss fully foure, leauing his life in the yeere of our Lord six hundred seuentie foure, and his body to be buried in the Monastery of Peterborow, which was of his brothers and his owne foundation.

His Wife.

(5) Ermenhild, the Wife of King Vulfhere, was the daughter of Ercombert, the seuenth King of Kent, and sister to Egbert and Leithair, both Kings of that Coun-tie. Her mother was Sexburg, daughter to Anna, the seuenth King of the East-Angles, whose sisters were many and most of them Saints. She was married vnto him in the third yeere of his raigne, and was his wife fourteene yeeres. After his decease, she went to her mother Queene Sexburg, being then Abbess of Ely, where she continued all the rest of her life, and therein decessed and was buried.

His Issue.

(6) Kenred the son of King Vulfhere and of Queen Ermenhild, being the heire apparant of his fathers possessions, was vnder age at his fathers decease; and by reason of his minority, was withheld from the go-uernment, which Ethelred his Vncle entred into, without any contradiction of this Kenred, who held himselfe contented to liue a priuate life: notwithstanding Ethelred taking the habit of a Monke, left the Crowne to him who was the right heire.

(7) Vulfald a young Gentleman conuerted to the Christian faith by Bishop Chad, and martyred for professon of the same by King Vulfhere, is reported by Water of Wiltsey, a Monke of Peterborow, in a Register which he wrote of that Monastery, to bee the supposed son of King Vulfhere himselfe, and to haue been slaine by him in his extreme fury before he was a Christian, or could indure to heare of the Christian faith. He was buried in Stones, as we haue said, where his father build a Colledge of Canons regular, which was afterwards called S. Vulfaldes.

(8) Rufine the fellow martyr of King Vulfald, is by the same Writer reported to be his brother, and the supposed sonne also of Vulfhere the King. Their murders, as he saith, was committed the ninth Calends of August, which is with vs the foure and twenty of July, vpon which day there was yeerely celebrated a solemne memoriall of their martyrdomes in the same place, where they both suffered, and where their Monument was then remaining.

(9) Wereburg, the daughter of King Vulfhere and Queene Ermenhild, was in her childhood committed to the bringing vp of Queene Etheldrid her mothers Aunt, in the Monastery of Ely, by whose perswasion she professed virginity, and returning to her Country in the raigne of King Ethelred her Vncle, was by him made ouersier of all the Monasteries within his dominions. She decessed at Trickingham (now called Trentham) in Stafford-shire, and was buried at Han-bery. Her body was afterwards remoued to Westchester, where Leasfrick the Earle built in honour of her a goodly Church called S. wereburg, which to this day is the Cathedrall Church of that Citie.

ETHELRED THE SEVENTH KING OF MERCIA, AND TWELFTH MO- NARCH OF THE ENGLISH: HIS ACTS; WIFE, AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XXIII.

An. Do. 675.

Ethelred, the third sonne of King Penda, and brother to the last declared Vulf-here, in the yeere of Christ Iesus six hundred seuenty five, beganne his raigne in the kingdome of Mercia, and at the same time in the Monarchy of the Englishmen, being the seuenth

King among them that were their Diademe, and the twelfth person that bare the Imperiall title of the whole: his claime was not immediately nor next in succession, young Kenred his Nephew standing betwixt him and the Crowne. But himselfe a child in yeeres, and in them also addicted vnto a priuate life, he gaue his Vncle way to vndergo so publike a charge, which without contradiction was likewise accepted of the subiects.

(2) His entrance was with warre against the Kentish, Leithaire, whose Country he destroyed, sparing neither Churches nor religious Abbeyes, the King not daring

Ethelred for the wrongs to him committed, and to re-daring to appeare in field. The Citie Rochester felt also his fury, whose Citizens were ransacked, their buildings ruined, and their Bishop Pitta driuen to such distresse, that he became a Teacher of good Arts and Musicke in Mercia, to maintaine his aged yeeres from the necessity of perishing want. These stirres (saith Beda) happened in the yeere of grace six hundred seuenty seuen; and the next following, so fearefull a Blazing starre, as was wonderfull to behold, first discouered in the moneth of August, and for three mo-neths together continued rising in the morning, and giving forth a blazing pile very high, and of a glittering flame.

(3) The remorse of conscience for the blood he had spilt, and the places of Oratories by him destrui-ed, (besides his intrusions into another mans right) strucke so deepe a wound into King Ethelreds breast, that euer hee bethought him what recompence to make. First therefore building a goodly Monastery at Bradney, and that most fruitfully seated in the County of Lincolne, thought that not sufficient to wash away the scarres of his foule offence, but determined in himselfe to forsake the world, for that was the terme attributed to the monastical life: wherein notwithstanding, in lesse cares they liued, and their persons more safe from all dangers attempted, then when they publicly administred their lawes to their people, the iust executions whereof, many times breed the ouerthrow of their Princes, and their Persons neuer secure amidst their owne guards.

(4) But such was the religion then taught, and the godly zeale of the good Princes then raigning, whose works haue manifested their vertues to posterities, and faith in Christ the saluation of their soules, in whose Paradise we leaue them, and Ethelred to his de-uout intent: who to reconcile himselfe first vnto Ken-red, bequeathed the Crowne solely to him, although he had a sonne capable thereof: then putting on the habit of religion, became himselfe a Monke, in his owne Monastery of Bradney, where he liued a regular life the terme of twelue yeeres, and therein lastly died Abbat of the place, when hee had raigne thirty yeeres, the yeere of Christs natiuity, seuen hundred sixteene.

His Wife.

(5) Offryd, the wife of King Ethelred, was the daughter of Osmy, and of Lady Eangled, King and Queene of Northumberland. She was married vnto him in the yeere of our Lord six hundred seuenty seuen, being the third of his raigne, and the twentieth of her age.
Shee was his wife twenty yeeres: and passing thro-row the North parts of Mercia, she was let vpon and slaine by the people of that Country, in reuenge of the death of Penda their King, who had long before bin murdered by Alfred his wife, and her half sister, as we haue said. And thus strangely came shee to her vntimely end, the yeere of our Lord six hundred ninety seuen, the twenty three yeere of her husbands raigne and the fortieth of her owne age.

His Issue.

(6) Chelred the sonne of King Ethelred, and of Queene Offryd his wife, was the heire apparant of his fathers kingdome, and of sufficient yeeres to haue succeeded him, when he entred into religion; but that it was his fathers will to make amends to his Nephew Kenred, sonne to his elder brother King Vulfhere, that now he might raigne before his sonne, who should Kenred the sonne of *Vulf-rity at his Fathers death, was defeated of his dominions by his Vncle *Ethel-liued a priuate life, where-set his seeming ouer-heavy Crowne vpon his Ne-the same time, both ouer the Mercians and Monarchy of the Englishmen, which was the yeere of Christs

plation, after the example of his Vncle, sought a more priuate and religious life: and thereupon appointing Chelred his Cousin germane to rule in his place, in the fifth yeere of his raigne, abandoned his kingdome and Country, and departed for Rome, accompanied with Offa King of the East-Saxons, and with Eadwine Bishop of Worcester, where both these Kings were made Monks in the time of Pope Constantine the first, Iustinian the younger then wearing the Imperiall Crowne: and in a Monastery at that citie, both these penitent Conuertrs in the Coules and Orders of Monks, spent therest of their liues, and therein died and were entered; this Mercian King Kenred hauing had neither wife nor child, that I can reade of.

(3) It is not greatly to be wondered at, in that these times to much ouerhadowed with superstitious zeal, the holy acts of men, which no doubt were many, & the habit of Monks, the accounted holy garments of humility, were so meritoriously respected and reputed in the deuout hearts of the religious, when by the Clergy (that are accounted the light of the world) in a Councell at Rome held vnder Pope Constantine the first, it was decreed and commanded, that carued Images, which neither had action, nor life, nor could saue themselves from the stroke of destruction, should bee made to the memoriall of Saints, and should bee set vp in Churches, with respectiue adoration, contrary to Gods most expresse commandement, and condemned for idolatry by the warrant of sacred Scripture.

Chelred, the sonne of King Ethelred, was of sufficient yeeres, and well able of rule, at such time as his father resigned his Scepter vnto his Nephew Kenred, had not the pricke of that sinne touched his conscience, which made him to bestow the same as he did, notwithstanding the Crown being too waighty for Kenred to weare, he as freely againe gaue it the sonne, as he had receiued it of the father before, and relinquished his claime and title thereto.

(2) Chelred thus aduanced before he it expected, entred his gouernment with great applaue of the people, in whose opinions he was held the onely man worthy of their Crowne. Ouer the Mercians he reigned the ninth King, and of the English Monarchs the fourteenth in number, beginning then both in the yeere of grace seuen hundred & nine, and the fourth of Iustinian the younger, Empire.

(3) His quietnes was disturbed by Ina the West-Saxon, whole fame for his fortunes beganne then to grow great. For Kent he had forced to buy their peace with mony: the Brittaines subdued, and had enlarged his confines vpon them. And now against Chelred this new rised Monarch, he meant to try chance, whose glory he looked at with an ouer enuious eye.

(4) His greatnesse likewise Chelred suspected, who either to himselfe or successors, (by the foundation which he laid) would diuert the Monarchy from him and his Mercians, and entaile it to himselfe or his West-Saxons. Hereupon great preparation was made, and each set forward with all the powers, the one to attaine, and the other to keep, the glory and title that both of them so much thirsted after. At Wodnesbury they met, and with vndaunted spirits so fought, that the victory was doubtfull, for neither could say the battell was his, or that he departed with the lesser losse.

(5) These emulations were followed betwixt these two Princes the space of seuen yeeres, and longer had done, if Chelred had liued, or Ina not been stricke with remorse of conscience for his ouermuch spilling of blood. Of this Chelred, some Authors haue censured, that he was maruellous in prowess, and valiant of courage, but his Country milerable continuer of his History, whom we may reasonably credit in this matter, being not incredible, although the must of necessity be thought to haue been married very young, or to haue died very old, because they record her decaese to haue beene in the yeere of Christ seuen hundred eightie one, which was almost fixtie yeeres after the death of her husband, and towards the end of the long raigne of King Offa.

Ethelbald, cosen germane once remoued vnto King Chelred, succeeded him in the kingdome of the Mercians, whercof he was the tenth in number, and of the Monarchs ouer the Englishmen, the fifteenth in account. He beganne his raigne in the yeere of grace seuen hundred sixteene, and with great honour reigned ouer all the Kings on the South side of Humber, whose time for the most part was spent in peace; yet some wars he had, and those with variable euent.

(2) For in the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, hee belieged Sommerton, and wanne it; and inuading Northumberland, without proffer of resistance, returned with great riches by spoile. The Brittaines also that were joined confederates with the West-Saxons, hee molested and ouercame, for whose reuenge King Cuthred gaue him battell neere vnto Bursford, where he with his Mercians receiued the foile, and lost the Banner, wherein was portraited a Golden Dragon, the thirty seventh yeere of his raigne.

(3) The finnes of these times both in Prince and people, were many and great, as by the Epistles of Boniface an Englisman, and Archbishop of Metz, is most manifest, wherein he reprooued his aduiterous life, who refraining to marry, wallowed in filthy lecheries; by whose example the Noblemen of Mercia did the like: and their women, as well Nunnes as others, made away their children borne out of wedlocke, whereby the granes were filled with dead bodies, as heell it selfe with damned soules. And in another Epistle sent vnto Cuthbert, Archbishop of Canterbury, he complaineth of the English Nunnes, who wandring in pilgrimage vnder shew of deuotion, liued in pleasure and wanton fornications, through all the Cities of France and of Lumbardy.

(4) This his Epistle tooke so good effect, that in repentance King Ethelbald released and priuiledged the Church from all tributes to himselfe, and built the Abbey of Crowland in Lincolshire, for the pacifying of Gods wrath towards his finnes; when also it was enacted by Cuthbert and his Clergy, in a Conuocation held in his Prouince, that the sacred Scriptures should be read in their Monasteries, the Lords Prayer and Creed, taught in the English tongue: which accordingly was done. Which Councell was held in the thirty yeere of this Kings raigne, and of Christs incarnation seuen hundred forty eight.

(5) Finally, when he had ruled forty two yeeres, fighting against Cuthred the West-Saxon, in a warre not prudently undertaken, he was traiterously slaine by his owne subiects, at the procurement of Bernard a Leader of them, who affecting the kingdome by this stratagem of Treason, sought to attaine it, but was himselfe slaine by Offa the Mercian, before that this ill sowne seed could take any roote. The place of this Great Ethelbalds death, was Secundone, three miles from Tamworth, in the County of Warwicks, and of his buriall, Repton in Darbyshire, where with honourable obsequies he was entred, the yeere of Christs humanity seuen hundred fiftie eight, hauing had neither Wife nor Children.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Offa, the cosen of King Ethelbald, after some time of Inter-Regnum, succeeded him in his dominions of Mercia; a man of so high stomacke and stoutnes of mind, that he thought nothing vnpossible for him to attaine: and for vertue and vice, so equally composed, that hardly could be iudged to whither of them the seale of his carriage most inclined, although the Monke of S. Albans, and writer of his life, doth blanch out his graces with superlatiue praises.

(2) His Parents hee nameth Twinfrith and Mercella, and himselfe hee saith to haue been first named Pinedred, borne both lame, deafe, and blinde, wherein he so continued vnto his mans estate. The rage of Bernred (saith the same Author) had forced all three into a solitary place, where suddenly by miracle Pinedred was restored, and for that cause called another Offa, who presently assailed, and in a great battel manfully fought, slew the vürping Bernred. The Nobles of Mercia being rid of that Tyrant by the valour of Offa, gladly embraced & receiued him for their King, who began his raigne with greater shew of glory, then any Mercian before him had done, being in number the eleuenth that had raigned in that Prouince, and is accounted the sixteenth Monarch of the Englishmen.

(3) His neighbour Kings foreseeing whereat his eye glanced, solicited by Letters Charles the Great, then King of France, against him, who wrote vnto Offa in their behalfe, and in threatening wile commanded him to desist. But he was so farre from fearing of his threats, that to his contempt he was the more eager.

(4) The first that felt his fury, were the Kentishmen vnder Afri their King, whose ouerthrow was the lesse dishonourable (saith Malmesbury) for that they were vanquished by so great a Monarch. The place was Ottefird, vnfortunate to them, where their King was slaine by the hand of Offa himselfe, their forces quite discomitted by the losse of this field, and their Country trodden downe vnder the feet of the Mercians.

(5) From South to North King Offa then marched, and beyond Humbe made hauocke of all that stood against him; whence returning triumphant, he set vpon the West-Saxons, that had formerly fought with his enemies: the place was Bensinton, which *Ca*stell King Offa tooke, with the discomfiture of King Kemwolve, and all his West-Saxons, who sought their reuenge by the aides of the Britaines in Wales. Their King (saith mine Author) was then Marmodius, betwixt whom some intercourse by letters passed, & great presents to King Offa sent, onely to protract time, and to worke vpon aduantage.

(6) In this Interim of complements, for a further security, Offa caused a great ditch to be drawn betwixt his and the Britaines borders, which worke began at Basingwark in Linshire, and North-wales, not farre from the mouth of Dee, and ranne along the mountaines into the South, & ended neer Briflow at the fall of Wye; the tract whereof in many places is yet seene, and is called to this day Clawd Offa, or Offas ditch. Marmodius, who openly bare saile to this wind, and seemed to winke at Offas intent, secretly called a Councell of State, wherein he declared how the Act thus in working, would soone proue the bane of liberty vnto their country, and the marke of dishonor to themselves & posterity for euer; therefore his aduice was, that by some stratagem it might be staid by time.

(7) To this his Britaines consented, the truce yet lasting, and the feast of Christs Nativity euen then at hand; in the celebration whereof was held the greatest aduantage with least suspect, to put themselves in action against it; and secretly working the assistance of their allies the Saxons, both of the South, the West, and the North, vpon Saint Stephens day at night, suddenly brake downe the banke of this fortification, filling vp againe a great part of the Ditch, and in the morning most furiously rushed into Offa his Court, putting a great number to the sword, who were more intenuate and regardfull to the Feast, then to any defence from their cruell and mercilesse swords.

(8) These wrongs King Offa delayed not to requite; first making their hostages his vassals and slaues, and then with a great army entering Wales, in a bloody and fore-fought bataille hee ouercame Marmodius and all his associates in the field. Thus then as a Conquerour ouer all his enemies triumphantly after ten yeares abroad returned he to his owne Kingdome, neither puffed with pride, nor suffering his title to be enlarged according to his conquests: yet he was not neglectiue of regall state, by the report of the Ligger booke of S. Albans, which saith, that in regard of his great prerogatiue, and not of any pride, he first instituted and commanded, that euen in times of peace also, himselfe and his Successors in the Crowne, should as he passed through any Cities, haue Trumpeters going and sounding before them, to shew that the person of the King should breed both feare, and honor in all which either see him or heare him.

(9) Vnto King Charles of France he wrote in excuse of his warres, and desire of his amity; whom Charles againe congratulated with letters of gladnes, both for his victories, and the Christian pietie in his land embraced; desiring of Offa safe conduct for such his subiects, as came to his country in deuotion to God, and withall sent to him, (for a present) a Booke of the Decrees of the second Councell of Nice. Which Synodall Booke (to vñe Roger Houedens owne words) was sent vnto King Charles from Constantinople, wherein (alas for pity) by the unanimous assertion of three hundred Bishops or more congregated in that Councell, were decreed many things inconuenient, yea and quite contrary to the true faith; as is most especially the worshipping of Images, which the Church of God doth utterly detest. Against which Booke Albinus wrote an Epistle, admirably strengthened by the authority of the holy Scriptures, which together with the foresaid Booke himselfe presented in the name of the Princes & Bishops of this land, vnto the foresaid Charles King of France. Such intercourse both for State and Church had this great Offa with that great Charles.

(10) His last warres (according to mine Author) were against the Danes, whom he forced to their ships with the losse as well of their booties, as of many of their liues; and then (saith he) with the spirit of humility, both to recall himselfe from the trace of blood, and to the better establishment of his kingdomes peace, he ioined in affinity with his neighbour Princes, vpon who he bestowed his daughters in marriage.

(11) And making Egfrid his sonne a King with himselfe, in great deuotion went to Rome, where with the like zeale and example of Inas the West-Saxon, he made his Kingdome subiect to a Tribute, then called Peter-pence, afterwards Rom-sco; besides other rich gifts that he gaue to Pope Hadrian for canonizing Albane a Saint: in honour of whom, and in reparation of his finnes, at his returne (ouer against Verolanum, in the place then called Holmechursh, where that Protomartyr of Britaine, for the constant profession of Christ, lost his head) Offa built a magnifice Monastery in Anno 795. indowing it with lands and rich reuenues for the maintenance of an hundred Monks: vpon the first gate of entrance in stone standeth cut a Salter Argent in a field azure, & is assigned by the iudicious in Heraldry to bee the Armes that he bare.

(12) Also in testimony of his repentance for the blood hee had spilt, he gaue the tenth part of all his goods vnto the Churchmen, and vnto the poore. At Bathe he also built another Monastery, and in Warwickshire a Church, where the adioyning towne, from it and him, beareth the name Off-church.

(13) Finally, when hee had raigned thirty nine yeares, he died in peace at his towne Off-ley the nine and twentieth of Iuly, the yeare of Christ Iesus, seven hundred ninety foure: and with great solemnity his body was buried without the towne of Bedford in a Chappell standing vpon the Banke of Omfe, which long since was swallowed vp by the fameriuier whole Tombe of lead (as it were some phantastical thing) appeareth often (saith Roufe) to them that seek it not, but to them that seeke it, is altogether inuisible,

His wife.

(14) Quendred the wife of King Offa hath not her parentage set down by any of our Writers: notwithstanding, the recorder of this his life, saith that her name was Drida, and that shee was the kinswoman to Charles the Great King of France, and by him for some offence banished his Realme, who arriuing vpon the coasts of England in a ship without tackle, was taken thence, and relieved by Offa, being then a young Nobleman, where shee changed her name vnto Petronilla; with whom hee fell so farre in loue that hee made her his wife, contrary to the liking of his Parents. She was a woman of condition ambitious, coctious, and cruell, as appeared specially in the death of Ethelbert, King of the East Angles, that came to her husbands Court to marry their daughter; whose port shee so much enuied, that shee procured him to bee treacherously murdered: in the manner the foresaid Author declared to be by his fall into a deepe pit, purposely made in his bed-chamber, and vnder his chaire of estate. That his head was cut off, and found by a blind-man, that the well which beares his name sprung vp presently in the place where it lay, that the blood thereof gaue the blind man his sight, and that Dryda died in the same pit which shee had digged for Ethelbert, I leaue to the credite of my author, and the liking of my Reader: but certaine it is that Gods vengeance followed this heynous fact within one yeare after the fame was committed, by the death of her selfe, her husband, & her Sonne, and the translation of that Kingdome from the Mercians to the West-Saxons.

An ancient Saxon coine inscribed with her nante, CENEDRED REGIN. we haue found and here placed, which the iudicious suppose to be hers, and that not vnlikely, thee being so powerfull, proud and ambitious.

His Issue.

(15) Egfrid the onely sonne, and heire apparant of King Offa and Queene Quendred, was the onely ioy and pride of his parents, who succeeded his Father in his dominions and title, and in the same yeare also in the shades of death.

(16) Ethelburga, the eldest daughter of King Offa and Queene Quendred was married to Brithrick the sixteenth King of the West-Saxons: shee was a Lady of passing beautie, but withall of an insolent disposition, hating all whom her husband loued, and practising the deathes of them that she hated. She departed into France after the poisoning of her husband, & for that her offence, a law was enacted to the great preiudice of the West-Saxons Queenes, as in the raigne of Brithrick we haue declared.

(17) Elfred, the second daughter of King Offa, & Queene Quendred, by the report of Randolph Higden the Monke of Chester, was the second wife to Ethelred King of Northumberland, who in regard of her had put from him his former wife, for which his subiects rose in Armes against him, and slew him in the last yeare of King Offa his raigne.

(18) Elfrid the third and youngest daughter of King Offa, and Queene Quendred, being promised in marriage, and assured vnto Ethelbert King of the East Angles, after the murder of her hoped Bridegroom, with great lamentations, and prophesying threats of reuenge, abandoned the society of men, and withdrew herselfe vnto the monastery of Crowland in the Fennes, where in contemplation and solitary sadnes he spent the remainder of her life; and yet there are that suppose her to bee the wife of King Kenwolve, who was the founder of Winchcombe Monastery, & the successor of his brother Egfride.

(19) Fremund by John Capgrave is supposed to bee the sonne of King Offa, who, as he saith, was traiterously murdered by one Ofny that enuied his victories which he gat against the Danes: his body was buried at Offchurch in Warwickshire, and nere vnto the Palace of Offa; alleading for his Author one Burghard, who was at his death, and wrote his life; yet some there are that thinke him mistaken, for that hee calleth him a young man, when as those warres hapned an hundred yeares after King Offa his life.

EGFRID THE TWELFTH KING OF THE MERCIANS, AND THE SE- VENTEENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Egfrid, the sonne of King Offa, succeeded his father in the Mercians Kingdom, wherof he was the twelfth in number, and in the Monarchy of the Englishmen, ranked in account the seuenteenth. He began his raigne the thirteenth day of July, in the yeer of Christ his natiuitie, seven hundred ninety foure. The first businesse that he vnderooke after hee came to the Crowne, was the restauration of antient priuiledges to the Church, which his father had deprived them of; and great hope was conceiued of his further proceedings, had not God cut him off by vntimely death. For hauing reigned onely foure moneths, hee gaue place vnto nature, and to another successor, the fins of the people deseruing no such Prince: for whose cause, and his fathers great bloudshed, as Alewine wrote to Oshertus, he was taken away so soone.

(2) He de ceased the seuenth day of December, and in the first of his raigne, hauing had neither Wife nor Issue that we reade of. His body with all due obsequies was honourably buried in the Abbey Church of S. Albans, of his fathers foundation.

KENWOLFE THE THIRTEENTH KING OF THE MERCIANS, AND THE EIGHTEENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

CHAPTER XXX.

Kenwolve, not so nere in blood to king Egfrid, as he was like him in all vertuous conditions, by him was ordained to succeed in his Dominions, wherby hee became the thirteenth King of the Mercians, and the eighteenth Monarch of the Englishmen, in the yeere of our Lord seven hundred ninety seven. At home he was an example of piety, peace, and religion, & set the scale of Iustice without respect to all alike; abroad temperate, humble, and courteous, without vain ostentation or ambitious conceits; in warres hee was stout and victorious, in peace studious to enrich his subiects: briefly, at all times so carrying himselfe, that enuie could not touch him with her tongue.

(2) Whether vpon a new quarrell begun, or the old retained, (as inheritable to the Mercians against those of Kent) I cannot say; but true it is, that in the entrance of his raigne, he entred that Prouince with a great host of men, and in a fore fought field discomfited the Kentish, and carried away prisoner their King, whose surname was Pren. His kingdome hee gaue to Cuthred, and kept him captiue in Mercia, to his great griefe, and his subiects dishonour.

(3) But Kenwolve in peace, & minding the works of true piety, gaue himselfe to the building of a goodly Church at Winchcombe in Glostershire; where vpo the day of dedication in the presence of Cuthred (assigned his Viceroy in Kent) thirteene Bishops, ten Dukes, many Nobles, and a great concourse of people, he led Pren this Kentish captiue vp to the high Altar, and there without either his entreaty, or ranfome for Redemption, released and set him free; shewing thereby his deuotion to God, and the heroical parts of a magnanimous Prince.

(4) His raigne was twenty two yeares, and death in Anno eight hundred nineteene, beeing solemnly buried in the Church of the Monastery at Winchcombe aforesaid which himselfe had founded.

His Wife.

(5) Elfryd, the wife of King Kenwolve, hath not her parentage certainly reported by any of our Historians; yet some later vpon a likelihood of her name, the place and time agreeing, haue thought her to be the daughter of Offa, affianced to King Ethelbert, as hath beene said; but in these obscurities, coniecture may wander alway.

His Children.

(6) Kenelm the sonne of King Kenwolve, and of Queene Elfryd his wife, was very yong at his fathers death, and succeeded in the Mercians Kingdom, but not in the Monarchy of the English; King Egbert the West-Saxon King then growne too great. And in the same yeare that he beganne his raigne, by the treason of his vnnaturall sister hee was murdered, and first obscurely buried, but afterwards solemnly remoued and reposed nere to his Father in the Monastery of Winchcombe, as in the Mercian Kings successions wee haue said.

(7) Quendred the eldest daughter of King Kenwolve, and Lady Elfryd his Queene, after the de cease of her father, ambitiously aspiring to compasse the sway of the Mercian Kingdome wholly to her selfe, wickedly conspired the death of her brother King Kenelm, which was traiterously acted by Askebert her instrument, who had the charge of him: but the same turning to her reproch, for very shame of so damnable a deed, shee within short time after ended her life, but not her ignominie.

(8) Burgenhild, the yonger daughter of King Kenwolve, and of Queene Elfryd, hath not been so famous to posterity as her sister Quendred was for her infamous Act; notwithstanding, she may reasonably be supposed to haue lead a better life, and to haue died a better death, especially of vs, who find her not stained with any asperision of misdeferuing.

Ppp i EGBERT

Egbert.

EGBERT THE EIGHTEENTH KING OF THE WEST SAXONS, THE NINE- TEENTH, BUT FIRST SOLE AND ABSO- LUTE MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS ACTS, WIFE, AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XXXI.

An. Do. 800.

The Saxon Heptarchy drawing now to a period, the spring of an entire Monarchie began to shew it selfe, and the glory of the Englishmen more cleerely to arise: for though they had weakened each other by their own wars, yet stood their power strong in the possession of the whole, and the overborne Brittaines held still at the worst.

(2) But such is the dispose of the sole disposer of Empires, that they have their risings, their fells, and their falls: neuer staying in one and the same point, neither entailed to one and the same Nation, how strong, politicke or populous fouer. The prooffe whereof is apparant in all the Kingdomes of the earth, and this of ours as mutable as any; whose change of State vnto, and in, this seven-fold Government hath hitherto bene scene: the severall Kings thereof long contending to branch their own fountaines furthest and fairest, lastly let them fall into one frame, which so meeting, made a more famous confluence in this Monarchie, then the seven heads of Nilus in the Egyptian Sea.

(3) Formerly, the Kentish, South-Saxons, East-Angles, Northumbrians, and the Mercians, through no lesse then eight descents had worn the Imperiall Diademe, whose rayes shone now so bright in the West-Saxons eyes, that they againe sought to reestate themselves in so glorious a possession. For, whereas Brightrik was possessed and contented with the West-Saxon Crowne, neither that worn without ialousie and feare; yet others of the blood royall from Cherdik raied the wings of their soaring thoughts much higher, among whom Egbert was one, neither the last nor the least in the opinion of the people, or suspect of his Prince.

(4) This Egbert hauing command of some part of that Prouince, so carried himselfe, that his fame grew fearefull to Brightrik the King, and hatefull to the eniuous Ethelburg his most proud Queene, by whom he was enforced first to secure himselfe with the Merion Offa; and lastly constrained to flie into France: where vnder Charles the Great, he turned his aduersity into an occasion of his valour, by seru- ing in his warres, and learned by his politicke go- uernment, how to rule a quiet or disturbed State.

(5) But King Brightriks death acted, and his Queene the contriuer banished, Egbert is solicited to the wearing of the West-Saxon crowne, where hee be- came the eighteenth King in number, and nineteene yeares after the nineteenth Monarch of the English- men; entering his raigne the yeare of Christ Iesus, eight hundredth, being the same yeare that Charles was made Emperour of the West, and Cornwall then ruling ouer the Scots.

(6) His first warres were against the Cornish, and their associats the Welsh, both of them a remnant of the old Brittaines, who had bene oftentimes van- quished, but neuer would seeme to be subdued, and for foureene yeares continuance held side against Egbert; which their resistance so prouoked his furie that hee enacted a most seuer law against them, commanding that no Britaine should presume to passe ouer great Offas ditch, and present death to them that durst set foot vpon any English ground. Their great Cac-legion (now West-chester) hee tooke from them, and at London from their West-gate cast downe the brazen Image of Cadwalla there set vp by the Brittaines for a terrour to the Saxons, as we haue said.

(7) His warres thus prospering, his puissance grew dreadfull, and his glory much enuiied at by the other Princes, wherof Bernulfe of Mercia was the first attempter that fought to plucke the wing of this west-Saxon Eagle, but thereby wrought his owne downfall; for Egbert ioyning battaile with him at Ellenden ouerthrow his power, and in that quarrell Bernulfe was lastly slaine.

(8) Kent was the next, and fairest marke in Eg- berts

berts eye, whose king not gratus in his own subiects sight, was the easier to be subdued; him he chased ouer Thamisa, and added not onely that Countie, but also Suffex and Surrey, for Prouinces vnto his owne Kingdome: next were the East-Saxons, the East-Angles and in truth all, both vpon the North, and the South of Humber gaue him obediences, so that the bounds of his Dominion were greatly enlarged, and his royall authority by those feuerall Kings acknowledged.

(9) Then heert confirm his estate called an as- sembly vnto the City Winchester, where causing him- selfe to bee solemnly crowned, became the first Sax- ons absolute Monarch of the whole Iland; so redu- cing the Monarchiall title from the Mercians to the West-Saxons, in whole Progeny it continued with- out reuerfement vntill the Danes first got, and againe lost it, and the Saxons issue failing, the same fell to the Normans Duke by Conquest, as in continuance of our history, Christ assiting, shall be scene.

(10) His Coronation was at Winchester, and en- trance in the yeare of Grace, eight hundred and nine- teene, at which time by his Edict in that City da- ted, he caused all the South of the Iland to bee cal- led England, according to the Angles, of whom him- selfe came, and promising great felicity to his State and Successors, was therein not so happy as in his affaires he had bene fortunate.

(11) For those Saxons that by warre and blood, had made themselves Lords of other mens rights, and of one Kingdome no lesse then seuen, are now endangered to bee made seruants vnto subiection, and by warre and bloud their seuen-fold Kingdome brought againe vnto one; neither yet freed from the reuenge of bloodie violence: for that a fierce and cruell nation (the Danes) ceased not con- tinually to inuade them, till they had subdued and set the crowne thereof vpon their owne heads, who in King Brightrik dayes, and about the yeere seuen hundred eighty seuen, hauing with three vessells lan- ded in the West of England, at three feuerall times, in so many feuerall places, fought the ruine of the land in their raigne of this Egbert.

(12) The first was in his thirty third yeare, when with thirty fise ships they landed at Lindesferne vp- on the North of England, where they were met and fought with at Carham, but with such losse to the English, that two chiefe Captaines, Nudda and Of- mond, two Bishops, Herefrid of Winchester, and Vig- ferd of Shyrborne, with many Souldiers were there- in slaine, King Egbert himselfe hardly escaping by the couert of the night.

(13) Their second attempt was in the second yeare following, when in West-Wales they landed, vn- to whom the Brittaines there ioyned, and in the place called Hengistenton abode the King in field, where Egbert with prosperous fortune vanquished and slew both the Danes and the Welsh.

(14) The third place of their arriage was Shee- pie in Kent, which Iland they sacked, and with much a doe were expelled in the last of King Egberts raign, and but the new beginning of their sauage cruelties.

(15) This Egbert by Florentius of Worcester is said to be the sonne of Alkemund, who was the sonne of Eafa, and he the sonne of Eoppa, the sonne of Ingils, the brother of Ine, the eleuenth King of the West- Saxons, and both of them the sonnes of Kenred, de- scended from Cherdik the first King of that Prouince:

he was but low of stature, yet well composed and strong of limme, very valiant, wife and politicke, a skilfull souldier, and as great in mind, as fortunate in warre; he raigned ouer the West-Saxons the space of thirty six yeares and seuen monethes, and Monarch of the whole Iland twenteene: his death hapned the fourth day of February, and yeare of Christs Incar- nation eight hundred thirty six.

(16) His bodie was with all obsequies solemnly buried at Winchester, and his bones since taken vp, re- maine with others in that Cities Cathedral Church, by- stowed in Chests ser vpon the Wall of each side the Quier, with these verses neither ancient, nor elegant, thereon inscribed:

*Hic Rex Egbertus pausat cum Rege Kenulpho, Nobis egregia munera uterque tulit.
His wife.*

(17) Redburg, the wife of King Egbert, was the first of the West-Saxons, that by their new made law was deprived of title, authority, or place of a Queene; notwithstanding it seemeth here bare a great stroke with her husband, in that John Beuer the Monke of Westminster reporteth, that shee pro- cured a law to be made against the Brittaines, the pe- nalty whereof was present death for any of them to set footing within the realme of England, or to passe the Ditch that King Offa had made.

His Issue.

(18) Ethelwolve, the eldest sonne of King Eg- bert, and Lady Redburg his wife, was in his child- hood committed to the charge of Helmestane Bishop of Winchester, vnder whom hee was carefully tray- ned vp in learning and vertue, who coming to mans estate proued also a perfect Souldier, and had the leading of his fathers power against Balred King of Kent, whom he forced to flie ouer the Thamisa, and to abandon his Kingdome, which he subdued to the subiection of his father, and afterwards succeeded him in the Monarchie of the Englishmen.

(19) Ethelflane, the younger sonne of King Eg- bert, and of the Lady Redburg his wife, was by his father deputed King ouer the Kentishmen, the South- Saxons, and the East-Saxons after hee had brought them vnto his subiection; which people hee most valiantly defended against the inuasions of the Danes, defeating their forces both by sea and land, and at Sandwich gaue them a most memorable ouerthrow, in the yeare of our Lord eight hundred fifty one, be- ing the sixteenth of his brother King Ethelwolves raigne; in whose time hee decaied, and is reported to haue left a sonne named Osfride, who by reaton of his minority succeeded not in his fathers dominions, which Ethelbert the second sonne of King Ethelwolve entred vpon, and being Monarch reunited these king- domes inseparably vnto the Monarchie.

(20) Edgith, commonly called Saint Edith the daughter of King Egbert, was in her childhood by her brother Ethelwolve committed to the charge and bringing vp of a Lady in Ireland, greatly renowned for her holinesse of life, named Modewine, by whom she was afterwards recommended to a Disciple of the said Lady, named Aetha, and made Gouvernesse of a Monastery of the Ladies, by her planted in a place which the King her brother had giuen her, called Pollefworth, situated in Arden in the north verge of the County of Warwick, wherein she liued, died, and was honourably buried, and the place in regard of her afterwards called Saint Ediths of Pollefworth.

ETHELWOLFE

Ethelwolfe.

ETHELWOLFE THE NINETEENTH KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND THE TWENTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN: HIS WARRES, ACTS, WIVES, AND CHILDREN.

CHAPTER XXXII.

An. Do. 837.

Ethelwolfe, the eldest sonne of King Egbert, committed in his youth to the care of Helmestun Bishop of Winchester, and by him vnto Swithun a famous learned Monke of that time, tooke such a liking vnto the quiet and solitarie life, (onely enjoyed by men of Religion, all other degrees molested to withstand the intruding Danes) that he vnderooke the Monkish vow and profession, and was made Deacon; shortly after which degree taken, Helmestun died, in whose place Prince Ethelwolfe was consecrated, as Roger Houeden affirmeth, or at least elected, (as John Brampton Abbat of Iarnaux writeth) Bishop of Winchester. But the death of his Father King Egbert immediately following, by great intreaty of the Nobles, and partly by constraint of the Clergy, hee was made King, and was by the authority of Pope Gregory the fourth, whose creature in both professions he was, absolved and discharged of his vows.

(2) He entered his Monarchy the fourth day of February in the year of Christs Incarnation, eight hundred thirty seuen, and was the nineteenth King of the West-Saxons, and the twentieth Monarch of the Englishmen. His Bishopricke he gaue vnto Swithun his Tutor, and according to his place, combined all his powers to withstand the dangerous Danes, that attempted the vter subuersion of his faire land: whose first inuasion in his first year happened; which drew the Saxons ciuill warres vnto a constrained peace, hauing more then they could well doe to defend their liues from their slaughtering swords, or to save their vniually gotten land from the spoiles of those common enemies; who, not like Conquerors, but destroying Caterpillers, left nothing vndeouered wherefoeuer they came, and had now begunne their mercileffe depopulations in diuers places at once, so that the distracted English were to seeke where was most need first to withstand.

(3) At Hampton & Portsmouth many of these Norway Pirates had entred; at Hampton with their overthrow, at Portsmouth with victory; and the same time at Carrum, a Troupe of these Danes discomfited King Ethelwolfe's power. The next year at Mersware, Lindsey, in East-Angle, and Kent, they did much mischief, and harried all the Country before them: yet in his tenth year at Pedredemouth, the Sommerse and Dorsetshire men gaue them a memorable overthrow, vnder the conduct of Earle Enwulfe, Bishop Adelstan, and Ofred their capitaines.

(4) But in the sixteenth year of this King, the great Planet Mars seemed to predominate continually, and Fortune to cast the chance of victory euer on his side: for two hundred and fifty ships, (some reckon a hundred more) entred into Thames mouth and set on shore an infinite number of these destroying Danes. London and Canterbury they had sacked and left wast, had pierced into Mercia, and chased Berthulfe their King out of his Country, and now in Southerly had pitched their battle, as able and resolute to abide all the power of the English, whither King Ethelwolfe with his sonne prince Ethelbald repaired, and tooke the field at the place called Oeley; wherein after a long and sore fight, the victory fell to the English, with such slaughter of these Norway inuaders, as is incredible to report, and the same held as great and famous, as euer had hapned in the land before.

(5) With the like successe his Brother Athelstan King of Kent, fought with the Danes at Sandwich, where chasing them to sea, tooke nine of their ships; and in Devonshire, Earle Ceorle at Wimpleboore so ouerthrew their whole power, that in despaiere they withdrew themselves into the Ile of Thanet, where they made their abode all the winter season; and if destiny had not withstood the English, the Danes had bene expelled for euer. But the Saxons seeming seeming cleared of this common enemy, fell to their wonted quarrels with the euer depreffed Brittaines; against whom Burtred the Mercian obtained the assistance of King Ethelwolfe in his eighteenth year, whose daughter Ethelswith hee had obtained in marriage; whereby for a while was increased the fame and power of that valiant, but vnforgotten King.

(6) In this State the affaires of the land stood vnto the nineteenth year of King Ethelwolfe's reigne, who now remembering his former Ecclesiastick profession, ordained that Tithes and Lands due to holy Church should bee free from all Tributes or Regall seruices; and in great deuotion went himselfe to Rome, where hee was both honourably receiued, and entertained the space of a whole year; in which time hee new built the English Schoole, that Offa the Mercian before had there founded, and lately was fired, bearing the name of Thomas the Holy; confirming also his Grant of Peter pence, and further covenanting in lieu of his kind entertainment to pay yearly three hundred markes to Rome, thus to bee employed; one hundred to Saint Peters Church, an other hundred to Saint Pauls Light, and the third to the Pope: the Bride that euermore must be kissed and largely paid.

(7) His returne from Rome was through France, and being a Widower, hee there married Adith the most beautifull daughter of Charles the Bald then Emperour; in honour of whom in his owne Court, he euer placed her in a Chaire of Estate, with all other maiestick complements of a Queene, contrary to the law of the West-Saxons for Ethelburgas offence, formerly made. Which his doing so disliked the Nobles, that Prince Ethelbald his eldest Sonne, Adelstan Bishop of Shireborne, and Enwulfe Earle of Somerset, rose vp rebelliously in Armes and sought to depose him; yet by mediation of friends, the matter came to a compromise, and the land to be diuided betwixt the Father and Sonne, but with such partiality that the better part westward was allotted to Ethelbald: which vnequallity gaue great suspicion, that this reuolt was rather grounded vpon ambition, then any inclination they had for the defence of their lawes, which commonly is the pretence and vaile for all disloyall attempts of seditious subiects against their Soueraigne Lords.

(8) Howfoeuer it was, longer after this he liued not, but left his Monarchy vnto his eldest sonne Ethelbald: and by will appointed Ethelbert his second, to be King of Kent and Essex, which countries he had conquered. He reigned twenty years, one month, and nine dayes, and decessed at a place called Stamrige, the thirteenth day of January, in the year of our Lord, eight hundred fifty seauen, being the twenty one of his Raig. His body was first buried at the place of his decess, and afterwards removed into the Cathedral Church at Winchester.

His wives.

(9) Osburg, the first wife of King Ethelwolfe, was the daughter of a Nobleman named Ofake, who had the office of Great Butler of England, and was descended of the stocke of Stufte and Withgar two brethren, being nobleme of the people called Iutes, who were the first Princes of the Ile of Wight, and Nepheues to Cherdik, and cozen germans to Kenrik the first and second Kings of the West-Saxons, and the third and fourth Monarchs of the Englishmen. She was the second Kings wife that was debarred of the title and place of Queene. Shee decessed three years before the King her husband, in the nineteenth year of his reigne, being the year of Christs Nativity eight hundred fifty five.

(10) Adith his second wife, was the daughter of Charles the Emperour, and King of France, as wee haue said: her Mother was Queene Ermentrude, the daughter of Vodon Earle of Orlande. She was a Lady of passing beauty, and married to this King in France; and when she came into England was receiued with the title and place of a Queene, in abolishing ment of the peruerse law of the West-Saxons, made against the Kings Wives, as before was touched: She was his wife three years, and seruiced him without any issue.

His issue.

(11) Ethelbald, the eldest sonne of King Ethelwolfe, and of Lady Osburg his first wife, was brought vp in his youth in the exercise of warre, and seruiced vnder his Father in the great victory obtained against the Danes at Oeley in Surrey, in the year eight hundred fifty one: afterwards hee turned his force against his Father, and at his returne from Rome, practised to defeat him of his Kingdome, and was ready to haue giuen him battaile, had not his Father parted with him his Dominion.

(12) Ethelbert, the second son of King Ethelwolfe and Lady Osburg his first wife, was in the life time of his Father, after the decess of his vnckle Ethelstan, appointed and placed his Successor in his Kingdome ouer the South-Saxons, the Kentish, and the East-Saxons, without any mention or meaning (as it seemeth,) that hee should intermeddle further with any other part of England. Notwithstanding after the death of his brother Ethelbald, it was generally holden of all men for law, equity, and reason, that he should succeed him in the Monarchy: and so he did, with the content of his Brethren, and without resistance, or contradiction of any other.

(13) Ethelred the third sonne of King Ethelwolfe, and Lady Osburg his first wife, had by the disposition of his Father in his last will, the one halfe of his Fathers proper inheritance; which was all such land as King Egbert his Grandfather had before hee was King, and was no part of the Demaines of the Kingdome, and this was diuided betwixt him and his brother Elfred, as the kingdome was betweene their elder Brethren Ethelbald and Ethelbert: with an intent that this Ethelred should succeed his brother Ethelbald in the kingdome of the West-Saxons; notwithstanding, his brother Ethelbert, after the decess of King Ethelbald, entred into the other part, adioining it to his former kingdome, and was king of the whole, and after left it entire to this Ethelred, who succeeded him in the Monarchy.

(14) Elfred, the fourth sonne of King Ethelwolfe and of Lady Osburg his first wife, was borne at Wantage in Berkshire, in the year of our Lord God, eight hundred forty nine, and the thirteenth of his fathers raig. Being a child of five yeeres old, he was sent very honourably attended to the City of Rome, where Leo the fourth then Bishoppe confirmed him, was his Godfather at the confirmation, and appointed him to the expectation of a kingdome: growne in yeares, hee grew so in discretion, magnanimity and fauour of all men, that in the successefull raignes of his three elder Brethren, he ruled as a Vice-roy or secondary king vnder euery of them, and after them at the last succeeded in the English Monarchy.

(15) Ethelswith, the daughter of King Ethelwolfe and Lady Osburg, was married to Burtred the twentieth King of Mercia, which marriage was solemnized at the towne of Chippingham in Wiltshire, in the month of Aprill, and year of Christs Nativity eight hundred thirty five, and the fifteenth of her fathers raig: but within twenty two years after, they were both forced by the Danes to abandon their kingdome, and departed into Italy, where the King died the same year in the English Colledge at Rome: hee liued after him fifteene yeeres in the habite of a Nunne, at the City of Padua, and there died, and was honourably buried in the year of our Lord God eight hundred eighty nine, which was the eighteenth year of her brother King Elfreds raig.

(16) Neote, supposed by John Capgrave the Legend writer, to be the sonne of King Ethelwolfe, was in his youth brought vp at Glasstebury vnder Dunstan, who was afterward Archbishop of Canterbury. He proued a man of great learning, and was one of the first Readers of Divinity in the Vniuersity of Oxford, at the Flores Wigorn.

*E*thelbald, the eldest sonne of King Ethelwulf, hauing had part of the kingdom in the life time of his Father, after his death entred vpon the whole, and was the twentieth King of the West Saxons, and the twenty one Monarch of the Englishmen, beginning his raigne in the yeere of Christs incarnation eight hundred fiftie seuen.

His wars against the Danes.

(2) His youth he had spent in the exercise of war, hauing made proofe of valour in his seruice against the Danes in many battels; and likewise attempted (though not in so good a cause) to haue fought against his owne father. Which his affaies, as they seemed violent and vnnaturally, yet being in the quarrell of the West-Saxons law, enacted in preiudice of their Queenes, he was both sided and approued, as hath been said.

W. L. Malmesbury.

(3) But howsoeuer vnwilling he was this faire Queene should sit in state by his fathers side, yet contrary to all lawes either of God or man, hee laid her by his owne, and by nuptiall rites, brought her to his sinfull and incestuous bed. Which act, though foule enough, some haue made worse, in reporting his Wife to be his owne Mother, whom King Ethelwulf kept for his Concubine. And surely this his sin was not long vnpunished by the shortnesse of his raigne and life, leauing no other memory of his acts, besides this foule blot to his faire name.

(4) His raigne was onely two yeeres and an halfe, and death chanced vpon the twentieth day of December, the yeere of Christs assuming our flesh, eight hundred sixtie. His body was first buried at Shirburne in the County of Dorset, where at that time was the Cathedrall Church and Episcopall See; but afterwards was removed and entred at Salisbury, in the County of Wiltshire.

His Wife.

(5) Judith, the Wife of King Ethelbald, was the widow of his owne Father, a most vnlawfull marriage contracted against all law of God or of nature, which being both dissolved and punished by the hasty death of the King, and the returning towards her father and Country in Flanders, was rauished by Baldwin the Forester of Arden in France, and by him forcibly kept vntill shee consented to become his wife, who in regard of that marriage, when he was reconciled to the Emperor Charles her Father, was by him created the first Earle of Flanders, by whom shee had issue Baldwin the second, who espoused Lady Elfrid, the youngest daughter of Elfred King of England, from whom, through five descents lineally, Maud Queene of England, Wife to William the Conquerour descended, and from her, all our Norman English Kings vnto this day.

ETHELBERT THE TVVENTIETH ONE KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND THE TWO AND TWENTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN: HIS RAIGNE AND ISSVES.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

An. Do. 860.

*E*thelbert, the second sonne of King Ethelwulf, who had succeeded his Vnckle Ethelstan in the kingdom of the South-Saxons, Kentish, and East-Saxons, and for five yeeres continuance, ruled those Countries with great equity and valour, after the decease of his brother Ethelbald, succeeded him also both in the West-Saxons kingdom, and the whole Lands Monarchie: whereof he was the one and twentieth King, and the two and twentieth Monarch.

(2) His raigne began in the yeere after Christs nativity, eight hundred and sixtie, and was disquieted from first to last by the inuasions of the bloody Danes. For presently after his coronation, these common enemies entred the Land, ruining all before them vnto the Citie Winchester, which they sacked, and left it troden vnder their destroying feete, euen to the ground. But in their returne were encountered by the Barkshire-men, vnder the leading of Oftrik, Earle of Hampton, by whom they were vanquished, the prey recouered, and a great number of those Infidels slaine.

(3) In his first yeere also a nauie of Danes and Normans entred into the Iland Taney, and began their wonted spoiles among those people: whereupon the Kentish compounded their peace for a great sum of money giuen. Notwithstanding these miscreants, which knew not God, gaue little regard to their promised covenants, and before the daies of truce were expired, like a sudden flood ouer-bare all before them. These their irruptions to withstand, the Kentish then prepared, rather aduenturing themselves vpon the chance of battell, then to rest vpon a seeming truce, wherein their destruction was too apparant, and forthwith assembling all the powers together, set vpon those truce-breakers, and with much slaughter forced them at length out of their Country.

(4) But the date of King Ethelberts life being expired, hee yielded his body to the course of nature, and his Kingdomes to his next Brother, after he had raigned ouer the Kentish, South, and East-Saxons, the terme of ten yeeres, and had faine Monarch of the whole onely fife. He died the yeere of grace eight hundred sixty six, and was honourably buried in the Cathedrall Church of Shirburne in Dorset-shire, by his brother King Ethelbald.

His supposed Issue.

(5) Athelm, the brothers sonne of King Elfred, mentioned in the last will and testament of the same King, seemeth by all likelihood to be the eldest son of this King Ethelbert, elder brother to the same King Elfred, although hee succeeded not his father in his Kingdom. For in those daies, if the Kings sonne were vnder age, the succession went to the next brother; and if that brother left his sonne at full age, then it went vnto him; otherwife it recurred to the elder brothers sonne.

(6) Ethelwald, surnamed Clito, which is a word of addition giuen to all the Saxon Kings sonnes of England, is mentioned in King Elfreds will to be his brothers sonne, and is most likely to be the sonne of this King Ethelbert, hee proued a most deadly enemy to his cosen King Edward, the sonne of King Elfrid his Vnckle, destroying his townes in Dorset-shire, and being driuen out of England, ioined himselfe with the Danes, who made him their King in Northumberland, and vnder his leading, greuously assailed the Countries of the East-Saxons, East-Angles, and Meritians; wherein hee was lastly slaine, the yeere of our Lord nine hundred and fife, being the fourth of King Edward his cosen-germanes raigne.

ETHELRED THE TVVO AND TVVENTIETH KING OF THE WEST.

SAXONS, AND THE TWENTY THIRD MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS ACTS, AND ISSE.

CHAPTER XXXV.

An.Do.866.

Ethelred, the third sonne of King Ethelwulf, after the decease of his Brother succeeded him in his Dominions, and was in number the two and twentieth King of the West-Saxons, and the twenty third Monarch of the Englishmen; he beganne hisraigne in the year of our saluation eight hundred sixty and six, and for the time that hee was King, reigned in continuall warres against the Pagan Danes, whose numbers now were greater, and footing surer in this land then formerly had beene.

Hungar and Hubba.

(2) In the first year of his raigne, there arriued vpon the English coasts a huge Army of these Danes, whereof Hungar and Hubba, men of incredible strength and cruelty, were the Captaines: These wintred in East Anglia, made truce with the inhabitants vpon certaine conditions, and forbore a time from their wonted rauening.

The Danes march Northward.

(3) But in the next year the King being busied to put backe a fresh inroad of Danes in the South and West of the Island then entred, these deuourers tooke aduantage vpon the ciuill broiles commenced among the Northumbrians, who in these turmoiled times sought to withdraw their subiections from the West Saxons, and to set vp Kings againe of their owne. The foresaid Captaines Hungar and Hubba, hauing in time of their truce strengthened themselves with new supplies of aid, marched further into the North, where finding the people vnprovided of strength, and the two Kings Osbert and Ella of reconciled enemies to be made no sure friends, they harried the Country before them, and entering Yorke slew the two Kings, with infinite number of the English, which City they consumed with fire, and burnt therein all those that had fled thither for succour.

(4) The State thus standing, and their forces encreasing euery day, brought new feares vpon the inhabitants, when euery late victory with increase of Captiues and rich spoiles, ministred occasion & means of some other conquest to follow; which these Pagans so pursued, till lastly they set a substitute King to raigne vnder them, ouer all the North Borders beyond the riuer Tyne; and for retiring themselves out of Northumberland into Mercia, came to Nottingham, which City they wanne, and therein wintred the third of King Ethelreds raigne, who with the aid of Burtred the Mercian King, constrained the Danes to sue for peace, and a safe departure, yeelding the City, and againe retryring themselves ouer Tyne, remained in Yorke all the next winter.

(5) The Summers opportunity approching, their wonted desire for spoile was with it encreased, and to cut off long trauell these Danes by boates passed Humber, where Hungar and Hubba beganne with fire and sword to lay all wast before them, sparing neither Person, sexe nor age. The places respected for publike good, and sacred Temples consecrated onely to God, which all other Tyrants haue forborne, these sauage men as the earths destroyers cast downe and trampled vnder their prophane feet: among which for note were the goodly Monasteries of Bradney, Crowland, Peterborow, Ely, and Huntington, all laid in leuell with the ground, and their Voraries, aswell the Nunnes as the Monkes, murdered with their vnhumane and mercilesse swords; to auoid whose barbarous pollutions, the chaste Nunnes of Coldingham deformed themselves to their lasciuious eyes, by cutting off their vpper lips and noses; but to eueralasting remembrance they remain most faire, and well becoming faces of pure Virgins.

(6) These Pagans piercing further into the land, came into the territories of the East-Angles, wherein holy Edmund reigned King, whose Martyrdom in most cruell manner they wrought, he constantly calling vpon the name of Christ, whereof wee haue already spoken; and shall bee occasioned hereafter to speake.

(7) But in the last year of this Kings raigne, their raging power was most great: for with a new supply two Danish Kings Sireg, and Halden, entred into West-Saxia; and at Reading the Kings towne intrenched themselves: these forraging the Country, were encountered with at Englefeld by Ethelwulf Earle of Berkshire, and his men, who in skirmish slew one of their leaders, and chased the rest backe to their Trench.

(8) These Danes fearing lest delais would proue dangerous, and knowing that the first successe is commonly seconded with further courage of hopes; foure dayes after shewed themselves in field ready to fight: their hoast they diuided into two battalians; whereof the one was guided by two of their Kings and certaine Earles were leaders of the other; which when the English perceiued, they also diuided theirs, whereof King Ethelred had the leading of the first, and Elfred his brother was General of the second; the place was Assendon, where their Tents were pitched, and the day approached for bataille: King Ethelred in his Tent staid so long in praiers that Elfred vpon a forward courage hastened to encounter the enemy, and that with a most fierce and sharpe fight, wherein hauing spent the most of their strengthes, and ready to decline, and giue backe: Ethelred manfully entred the bataille, and so seconded his brother, and ouer-tyred Souldiers, that hee made way by dint of his sword through the thickest of their almost-conquering enemies, and with such losse of the Danish blood, drawne from the sides of one of their Kings, five Earles, and an infinite number of the common Souldiers, that the streames thereof seemed as an ouer-swelling tide, altogether to couer the face of the field, and is accounted for the noblest victory that the English till then had gotten of the Danes.

(9) Yet were not these Pagans therewith discouraged, but gathering more strengthes and supplies from other parts; foureteen dayes after, made head againe against the English, and pitching downe their standards at Basing, abode the coming of Ethelred and triall of bataille, wherein successe was altogether altered; for herein the Kings part was discomfited, and the Danes the winners of the day.

(10) Thus both sides borne vpon rage & hope, in their heat of bloud prepare for new fight. The Dane power was augmented with a further supply sent from beyond Seas, and the English confirmed with hope of successe: These meeting at Merton (two moneths after the bataille of Basing) encountered each others both boldly and bloodily; wherein at first the English preuailed, and the Danes were chased; but their numbers the greater, and fresh supply maintaining their battaile, they recouered themselves, and wonne the day; wherein King Ethelred recouied his death wound, with such slaughter of his people, that little wanted the end of all encounters; to haue been afterwards attempted any more by the English.

(11) Great was the valour and resistance of this King; for in his short time of Raigne, as Writers record, no lesse then nine set battales against the Danes he fought in one year, to the great effusion of Christian blood, and to no little losse of the Danish power; for in his raign fell of them one King, nine Earles, and of the common sort without number.

(12) He died at Wittingham of his wound receiued the three and twentieth day of April, in the year of our Lord God eight hundred seauenty two, and was buried in the Collegiat Church of Winburne in Dorsetshire, where remains his Tombe and his Armes vnto this day, with this Inscription:

In hoc loco quiescit corpus Sancti Ethelredi Regis West-Saxonum Martyris, qui Anno Domini 872. 23. die Aprilis, per manus Dacorum Paganorum occubuit.

His Issue.

Elfred, the eldest sonne of King Ethelred seemeth to be Grandfather to the noble and learned Ethelward, who being Kinsman, Counsellor and Treasurer to King Edgar, wrote an history of his Country, beginning at the first arriuall of the Saxons into England, and continuing vnto his own time; which history he dedicated to his kinswoman, and cofen germane the Lady Maud Abbess of Quedlingburg in Saxonia, being the daughter of the Emperour Otto, by Edgith his wife, daughter of King Edward the elder, and sister of Ethelstan, and Edmund Kings of England.

Oswald, a young sonne of King Ethelred, is mentioned in a Charter of his Fathers, by which he gaue lands to the Monastery of Abingdon neere Oxford; and to which this sonne of his hath his name set downe for a witnes; which Charter is yet extant, recorded in a great Legier-booke, and Register of the Euidences of the lands, sometime belonging to the said Monastery.

Thyre, the daughter of King Ethelred, is reported by the histories of Ireland to bee married to Gormon King of the Danes, and to haue had issue King Harald, which Harald, by Queene Gonhild his wife, had issue, Sweyn king of Denmarke, Iringe king of Northumberland, and Gonhild Queene of North-Wales. King Sweyn by Queene Sigred his wife, had issue Canute King of England and Denmarke, Ostryde wife of Duke Wolfe, and mother of King Sweyn the yonger, and Thyre the first wife of Earle Godwin of Kent.

CHAPTER XX XVI.

An.Do.872.

Marianus, Florentinus.

Lifred, or Alfred, the fourth sonne of King Ethelwulf, though he had beene appointed King at Rome by Pope Leo in his young years & Fathers life time; yet raigned he in no part of his dominions, before the deaths of all his Brethren, vnder whom hee serued in most of their warres, assisting them likewise in all their counsels: the land now miserably torne by the cruell incursions of the bloody Danes, was left vnto him, both to redeme, and to raigne ouer, by the death and Testament of King Ethelred his last brother.

(2) Hee beganne his raigne in the yere of his age twenty two, and of our Lord God eight hundred seventy two, being crowned in the City of Winchester, the twenty third King of the West-Saxons, and the twenty foure Monarch of the Englishmen: but of some Historians he is famous by the stile of the first absolute Monarch.

(3) His raigne beganne with troubles and wars in defence of the land which the Pagan Danes intended to destroy; and though his powers were small, yet was he forced into the field within one month after his Coronation: the place was Wilton in the County of Wiltshire, on the south-banke of the riuer Wily: where the Danes at first gaue backe and fled: but seeing the fewnes of their pursuers, reformed their battle, and got the field, with whom the West-Saxons entred league, and compounded for their departure from among them.

(4) These Rouerers then with their associates at Reading, got themselves into London, where they wintered, with whom the Mercians likewise compounded for their peace, which proued shortly to be the destruction of their princely blood; and lastly, the lands subuersion to a forraigne nation. For the Danes hauing got footing in the North, the West, and the South of this land, (vnto whose aide many new-come guests from their Easterne countries were arriued, under the leading of other three Kings, Gurthrum, Esketil, and Amund) all together set their griping tallents with such fast hold vpon Mercia, that at Ripendon they constrained Burthred the King with his Queene Elswith out of the land, and in his stead placed a King of their owne choise, vpon condition to deliuer vp the same againe vnto them when they would demaund it.

(5) In the fourth yere of King Elfred their armies diuided themselves into two parts, the one of them guided by King Halden, returned into Northumberland; where hee bestowed that Country among his followers, and therein remained for two yeres continuance, doing much harmes both to the English and Picts. The other part led by the last new-come King, came to Granabridge, whence they wintered and spoiled the Country, and there spreading themselves as Grashoppers vpon the face of the earth, eate vp all where they came; so that King Elfred was enforced to compound for their departure out of his owne kingdome in West-Saxia to which couenants they promised and swore; yet contrary to both, tooke into Deuonshire, and wintered at Excester, vnto whom a further supply by sea fought to ioine themselves, but met with such boisterous blasts, that one hundred and twenty of their ships were cast away by tempest at Swanwicke vpon our coasts, and their land-army marching towards Excester, were there welcommed with so sharpe an encounter by King Elfred, that they gaue him both pledges and oath to depart with all speed.

sently vpon the Saxons side: for now the three Kings Gurthrum, Esketil, and Amund thought it not good to let Elfred thus rest, and thereupon drew their forces westwards towards him, where at Chipingham (a Mannor of his) they wintered, and compelled the West-Saxons there, either to yeeld, or to forsake the Country.

(7) King Elfred therefore, with such strength as he had, hasted towards them, and seuentene miles from Bislaw pitched downe his tents euen in the face of the enemy, where betwixt these fierce nations a great battaile was fought, to the infinite losse of blood on both sides, and that vpon such equall departure, as neither could challenge to bee matters of the field; yet the report went, that King Elfred was discomfited, which turned greatly to his advantage; for thereupon many of the English hastened to his succour, lest the ouerthrow of him should be the bane of them all; his strengthes thus renewed with an vnexpected supply, no time was detracted to stay the Danish rage, who were now returned further into the heart of the land, and at Abington by Oxford had pitched their standers for fight.

(8) Thither the English repaired, and the next morning he ordered his Army; neither were the enemies vnprepared, but with braues flood ready to receiue the encounter. The battaile ioyned, continued with such losse of blood, that it is accounted one of the forest that euer betwixt them before had bene fought, and onely parted by the approach of the night, neither party challenging the honor of the day, the losse being so great vpon both sides.

Seuen of these battailes are reported to be fought in that yere, whereby both their strengthes were much abated, and their spile blood so cooled their liuers; that lastly they concluded vpon a peace; one article was this, that the Danes should admit no more of their nation to arrive in this land: but how soone that was broken, the sequels did shew.

(9) For in the yere eight hundred seuentie sixe, (saith Simon Dunelmensis) Rollo a nobleman of Denmarke with a great Army entred into England, with no lesse spoile and destruction then other of those Danes before him had done, notwithstanding the truce: with whom King Elfred met, and gaue him to hoat welcome, that hee liked not greatly his entertainment; and being warned (forsooth) in his sleepe, that better fortune attended him in France, hee left his countymen to tuggle with the English.

(10) The Danes then accounting the peace to be broken, like Bees from the Hiu, infect all the land, insomuch that this vndaunted King Elfred was oftentimes brought to such extremities, that he hid himselfe out of sight, and in the Fens & Marsh grounds was forced with such small companies as he had, to liue by fishing, fowling, and hunting of wild beasts for his food, hauing no more of his great Monarchy left him, but Somerset, Hamton, and Wiltshire only, neither yet them free from the incursions of the Danes.

(11) The solitary place of his most residency, was an land inclosed with the two riuers Thone and Parret, at their meeting in the County of Somerset, commonly called Edelingsay, where he in very poore attire disguised, was entertained into a Cowheards house (if not into his seruice,) where on a time as he sat by the fire in trimming of his bow and shafts, a cake of dow baking vpon the hearth before him, chanced to burn; the Cowheard seeing comming in, and seeing him mind more his bow then his bread, in a great fury cast away both his bow and arrowes, and checking him as her Groom, said, Thou fellow, dost thou see the bread burne before thy face, and wilt not turne it? and yet art thou glad to eate it before it be half baked! little suspecting him to be the man that had bene serued with more delicate cates.

(12) But this Prince, the very mirrour of Princes, more minding the wealth of his subiects, then the maiesty of State, disguised himselfe in the habit of a common Minstrell, and in person repaired to the Danes Campe, who lay like Swachbirds, wallowing in wantonnesse, and secure in their owne conceit from impeach of danger, which Elfred a most skilfull Musitian, and an excellent Poet, did nor a little egge on by his sweet musicks, and songs of their valour; so that he was suffered to passe vncontrolled into the company of their Princes, at banquets, or else where: whereby he both saw their negligent security, and by diligent obseruance learned the designs that in their counsels they intended.

(13) Returning to his comfortlesse company, he told them the condition of the hostile Campe, and how easie it was to recouer againe their decayed estates: whereupon shewing himselfe to his subiects, vnto whose sight nothing could bee more ioyous, on the suddaine let vpon the carelesse Campe of the Danes, and made thereof a very great slaughter, to the great terrour of others in other parts, that had accounted him dead long since.

(14) Hubba, that had harried the English, and now rowzed vpon the newes of King Elfreds victory and life; with thirty three ships sailed from Wales, and arriuing in the mouth of Tau, where it falleth into the Senerne Sea, assaied to take there the then strong Castle called Kimwith, vnto whom the Deuonshire men gaue battle, and slew eight hundred and eighty persons of their retinue, where died the Danish King Hubba, whose corps being there interred vnder a great heape of copped stones, gaue name to the place, and was called Hubblestone. There and then was taken the Danish much esteemed Banner, called Reafan, wherein a Rauen was portrayed wrought in needle-work, (so Asterius Menueus reporteth) by the three sisters of Hubba and Hungar the daughters of Lothbroke (that is Leather-breath) the Dane: In regard whereof, as also for the opinion of good lucke, as they tooke it, it was cuer born before them in their wars.

(15) These aduers proceedings of the Danes designs, especially falling when the game was neere wonne, made them suspect, how faire foucer the ball lay to hand, yet fortune would serue it in the end to their losse: for Elfred now flocked vnto vpon euery side, beganne to build fortresses behind his backe, and forward to march with his conquering sword: whereupon the Danes sent to him for Peace, and deliuered him hostages, vpon assurance that they meant as they spake: The conditions were, that their King should receiue Baptisme, and the great Army of the Danes quietly to depart out of the land.

(16) Whereupon Gurmund or Gurthrum the Danish King repaired to the new built Castle of Edelingsay vnto King Elfred, and in the place then called Alre, was washed in the lauer of Baptisme, whom Elfred receiued for his God-son by the name of Abshelane, and gaue him in free gift the Country of East-Angles. In the same fountaine of Grace (saith Simon Dunelmensis) thirty of the chiefe Danish Nobility were initiated: vpon whom the truly Christian King Elfred bestowed many rich gifts: And that the limites of the English might be free from their incursions, thus the confines of King Elfreds kingdome were laide forth, as we find it in the end of those Lawes that Elfred published, whose words are these: Let the boundes of our Dominion stretch from the riuer Tamesis, and from thence to the water of Lea, euen vnto the head of the same water, and so forth straight vnto Bedford: and finally, going along by the riuer of Ouse, let them end at watling street.

(17) But so farre were the Danes from performance of couenants, that in this eighth yere of King Elfreds raigne, and the eight hundred seuentie nine after Christ, this Gurmund and his company wintered at Chipnam in Wiltshire, and a new supply of these Pagans (known by the name of the Vicingis) wintered at Fulham neere London; yet after vpon better aduice, the one went into their assigned circuit, and the other other departed to the realme of France, and so to his twelfth yeare the land tooke some rest, and had been kept long waking by the loud sound of warre.

(18) In the yeare of Grace eight hundred eighty five, the last retired France finding France not fitting their purpose, returned into Kent, and put into Medway, whereon his East side they began a fierce siege vnto the City Rochester, before whose gate they built a strong Cattle: Thither King Elfred halted, before whose power these Danes could not stand, but were forced to their shippes, and backe againe into France.

An.Do.889. (19) Whereupon the King remoued his siege vnto London, whence all the Danes fled (as Voluc abide not the presence of the Lion) the inhabitants rcioicing to see the face of their King: which City hee restored to her former liberty and beauty, and committed the custody thereof vnto Ethelred Duke of Mercia, that had married his daughter the Lady Ethelred, whose title the King had maintained against Canolophus, made King thereof by the Danes. Whereupon both Kent, the South-Saxons, and West-Saxons came willingly, and submitted themselves to King Elfred. The East-Angles being gouerned, or rather spoiled by Athelstan the christened Dane, who after twelue yeares raigne there died, and was buried at Hadley in Suffolke.

An.Do.892. (20) But in the one and twentieth of his raigne, and of Christs Incarnation eight hundred ninety two: those rousing Danes returned out of France, & againe arrived in Kent in the mouth of the riuer Limeth, with two hundred and fifty shippes, which they drew foure miles into the great wood, then called Andreds wood, and there destroyed a Cattle that stood for defence, building another more strong at Apulder, wherein they kept. At the same time likewise entred one Hastings, a Nobleman of Normy, with eighty shippes; but with a fairer shew as hee entred, for he sent his oath vnto Elfred not to annoy any part of his dominions, and withall his two sonnes to be baptized: which King Elfred accepted, himselfe becoming the Godfather of the one, and Duke Ethelred of the other; and both they, and his Ambassadors returned with rich gifts. Against these Kentish invaders, King Elfred fought a great battaile at Fernham, nere vnto Aleford, wherein he wounded their King, and forced his Army to flee ouer Thamesis; in passing whereof, through ouermuch haft, and great fear many of them were drowned, and they that escaped, fled to an Island called Breklesey inclosed about by the riuer Colne.

(21) Newes then being brought into the East, that the Danes from Northumberland had infected the West, and with a strong siege begit the City Excester. Elfred left for General his sonne in law Duke Ethelred; whilst he with a strong power went to suppress their rage; who hearing of his coming, brake vp their siege, and were gone: vpon the aduantage of his absence, periuied Hastings then wrought, who out of his new built Cattle at Beamsfield, made spoile of the Kings people, and foraged all the Country before him. Whereupon Duke Ethelred assembled a power, and first assailing his wel stored Cattle, tooke thence his wife and two sonnes, with exceeding spoiles of gold, siluer and garments; all which were presented vnto King Elfred at his returne to London: who out of his princely magnanimity, sent backe to Hastings his wife and two sonnes; because (said hee) shee was no warrior, and his two sonnes were his God-children: whereupon Hastings repaired his Cattle, and ioined with the other Danes that lay at Apulder.

(22) Those then that had fled but lately from Excester, in their returne met with other their comforts, and rousing about the coast for their prey, fell lastly vpon the ancient City Chester, which presently they beganne to sicke and burne. But the country inhabitants comming to the rescue, begit them about with their host, and forestalled the passages of all supply of victuals; so that for want of food, the Danes were constrained to eate vp their horses, and vpon composition thence to depart.

(23) Thence fetching a compasse all along the coasts of Wales, in the same yeare they arrived in Essex, being the twenty four of King Elfreds raigne: and in the Winter following, drew their shippes by the Thamesis into the riuer Lea, by which they passed in those light Pinnaces twenty miles Northward into the land, and built them a forrest at the place called Weare, thither forthwith the King repaired, and pitched his tents before his enemies in the same place; who seeing their strength, and the danger of long siege, did that by policy, which power could not so dauidly do: for he diuided the riuer into fundrie streames, whereby the Chanell was made vnnauigable, and the Shippes bedded in the muddie, lay rather to their annoyance then defence; the former experience of their hunger-starued besiege made the more fearefull to fall into the like; and therefore in great haft departed their fortresse, leaving their wives and children to the mercy of the English. Neither stayed they till they came vnto the borders of Wales, when at Carbridge vpon seuerne they built another Cattle, and lay there all the next winter.

(24) Long there they stayed not, without dislike of their lodgings, and cold entertainments, but that they returned to their wonted spoiles, and diuiding themselves, some to Northumberland, and some into East-Anglia, like Locusts eate vp all as they went: whose breath as it were, so infected the aire, that for three yeares following a great mortality raigned both vpon men and beasts, and ended not much before the death of this incomparable Prince: which hapned to the great sorrow of his subjects vpon wednesday the twenty eight of October, when hee had raigned twenty nine yeares and sixe moneths, of his age fifty one, and yeare of Christ Iesus nine hundredth and one.

(25) The vertues of this Prince are matchable to any that euer raigned before him, and exceed the most that euer raigned after him, both in seruice of God, whose Substitutes they are, in defence of his Country, which charge they all beare, in providing good lawes, the finewes of Kingdomes, and care of posterities, from which no man is exempted.

The day and night containing twenty foure howers, he designed equally to three especiall vices, and them obserued by the burning of a taper set in his Chappell or Oratory; eight howers hee spent in contemplation, reading, and prayers; eight, in prouision for himselfe, his repose and health; and the other eight in the affaires of his common-wealth and state. His Kingdom hee likewise diuided into Shires, Hundreds, and Tithings, for the better ordering and administering of iustice, and for the abandoning of theues, which had formerly increased by the means of long warres; whereby, notwithstanding the multitude of souldiers continually imployed, it is reported that a Virgin might traualle alone in his daies through all his dominions, without any violence offered; and that bracelets of gold were hanged in the high waies, and no man so hardy as to take them away.

Hee was a most zealous, and studious protector and prouider for the Clergy, Widowes, and Orphans, liberal of his goods, wife, temperate and iust, valiant, patient in aduersities, and euer religious in the seruice of God. A most learned Prince, a skillfull Musition, and an excellent Poet: the best lawes befitting his Subjects he translated into the English tongue: as also the Psalter of Gregory, the history of Beda, and Basins his consolation of Philosophy, the Psalms of David (whose godly raigne hee proposed to himselfe for imitation) hee likewise began to translate, but died before hee could finish the same. And so great a desire had he vnto learning, that (as Alfredus Riuallensis witnesseth) he published this Act: We will and command, that all Freemen of our Kingdom, who sooner possessing two hides of land, shall bring vp their sons in learning till they be fifteen yeares of age at least, that so they may be trained to know God, to be men of vnderstanding, and to live happily: for of a man that is borne free, and yet illiterate, we repute no other wise then of a beast, or a brainlesse body, and a very sot. And for the furtherance of this his roiall intent, comforted with Asterius Metuensis, Grimbald, John Scot and others, neither permitted he any in office in Court, or elsewhere, vntill hee were learned, which incited his Nobles to the earnest pursuit of learned Arts, and to traine vp their children in good letters: his buildings were many, both to Gods seruice, and other publicke vse, as at Edlingseya Monastery, at Winchester a New-Minster, and at Shaftsbury a house of Nunnes, wherein hee made his daughter Ethelgeda the Abbess. But the foundation of the Vniuersity of Oxford (which hee began in the yeare of our Lord eight hundred ninety five, and whose lectures hee honoured with his owne presence) surmounteth all his others, to the continuance of posterities, a liuing spring and gracious fountaine, whence issue the streames of all knowledge, that abundantly haue watered both this and other kingdomes.

(26) His body was first buried in the Cathedral Church of S. Peters at Winchester, vnder a faire Monument of most precious Purpory, afterwards because the lewd-religious Chanons gine it out to work some feat of their vsual impotence that his Ghost did walk every night from house to house; both it and the Monument were taken vp, and by his son the Kings command (in detestation of those forceries) remoued into the Church of the new Monastery; and lastly, his body, Monument, Church and Monastery, were taken thence, and remoued without the North-gate of the City, since called Hyde.

(27) Some alledge that the malice of those Chanons against him, was for displeasure that hee placed ouer the rude Swineheard named Deneuolphus, whom hee made their Bishop, but the ground of that assertion seemeth vnwarrantable by the relation of Vigornensis, & also of Tho. Rudburne, the first of which saith, that Elfred caused him to be trained vp in learning, and the later, that after long study, hee attained to the degree of a Doctor of Diuinity in the Vniuersity of Oxford, and was afterward made Bishop of Winchester by the King. For doubtlesse at that time the Bishops of Rome had not deuested our Kings of that prerogative.

His Wife. (28) Elfwith the wife of King Elfred was the daughter of Ethelred surnamed Muchel, that is the Great, an Earle of the Mercians, who inhabited about Gainsborough in Lincolnshire: her mother was Edburg a Lady borne of the Bloud-riall of Mercia. Shee was married vnto this King in the twentieth yeare of his age, being the second of the raigne of his brother King Ethelred, and was his wife twenty eight yeares, and liuing after him foure; died in the year of grace nine hundred and foure, and was buried in the Monastery of Nunnes which hee had founded at Winchester, out of which afterwards King Henry the first took to his wife Maud the daughter of Malcolme King of Scots, by whom the roiall bloud of the ancient Kings of England became vnto the Normans, whereby hee wanne much loue of the English nation.

His Issue. Edward, the eldest sonne, and second child of King Elfred, and Queene Elfwith, was borne about the beginning of his Fathers raigne, in the yeare of our Lord eight hundred twenty one: hee was brought vp in his Fathers Court, and carefully attended, and instructed by men of great vertue and knowledge in learning, and in all other qualities, and exercised conuenient for Princes. Hee was married, and had diuers children: hee was thirty yeeres of age before his Father deceased, and then hee succeeded him in his Kingdom and Monarchy.

Ethelward, the second son, & fifth and last child of King Elfred and Queene Elfwith, was borne about the mid of his Fathers raigne, and about the yeare of our Lord eight hundred and eighty. Hee was in his youth by his Fathers appointment; and for the example of other young Nobles brought vp in the study of good Arts, at the vniuersity of Oxford, where (saith Th. Rudburne, and the Annales of Winchester) hee became a man very learned, and a great Philosopher: hee had of his Fathers gift by his last Will great liuings in the Counties of Deuon, Somerset, South-Hampton: hee poured a man of great iudgement and wisdom, and liuing vntill hee was about forty yeeres old; hee died the sixteenth day of October, in the two and twenty yeare of his brother King Edward raign, Anno ninc hundred twenty two; and was buried at Winchester.

Ethelred, the eldest daughter and first child of King Elfred, and Queene Elfwith his wife, was married to Ethelred Duke of Mercia, who in respect of this marriage was suffered to haue all roiall iurisdiction ouer that Country, in as ample manner as the Kings thereof had enioied; and after the decease of her husband, which happened in the yeare of our Lord nine hundred and twelue: shee continued the gouernement in the same fort eight yeares, with such resolution and valiant resistance of the common enemy (the Danes) that shee stood her brother Edward in great stead, as in the relation of his life shall be further shewed. Shee died the fiftenth of June nine hundred and nineteene, and was buried in S. Peters Church at Gloucester, leaving issue, a daughter, named Elfwine, whom King Edward her brother deputed of that Duchy, which her owne mother enioied; and hee his crowne by her assistance.

Ethelgeda, the second daughter and fourth child of King Elfred and Queene Elfwith, was neuer married, but tooke vpon her the profession and vow of Virginity, and was by her fathers appointment made a Nunne of Shaftsbury in the County of Dorset, in the Monastery there founded by him: who is also accounted the first of the Towne it selfe. Shee was afterward Abbess of the house, and therein spent, and ended her life, and was there also buried.

Elfrida, the yongest daughter, and child of King Elfred (and Queene Elfwith his wife, was married to Baldwin the second, surnamed the Bald, Earle of Flanders, sonne of Earle Baldwin the first, and Queene Judith his wife, the widow of King Ethelwulf her Grandfather. Shee was his wife thirty yeares and more; shee furnished him and was a widow eleuen yeeres, shee died the seventh of June, in the yeere of our Lord nine hundred twenty nine, being the fift of the raigne of King Ethelstan her Nephew. Shee is buried by her husband in the Chappell of our Lady, within the Monastery of S. Peter, at the City of Gauin. Shee had issue Arnulf the third Earle of Flanders, progenitor of all the Earles of Flanders since his time, & Adnulf Earle of Bologne and Terwin.

EDWARD SVRNAMED THE ELDER THE TWENTIE FOVRTH KING OF THE WEST SAXONS, AND TWENTY FIFT MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSE.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

An. Do. 901.

No greater were the griefs conceived for the death of worthy Elfred, then were the hopes of the people in his sonne Prince Edward, whose valour had bene often approued against the raging Danes, & whose vertues were both manly and princely; not so learned as his Father, neither so patient to vndergoe his chance; but as glorious in martiall prowesse, and as fortunate in al his fights, vnder whose hand the Danes euery where fell, and vnder his Monarchy all the English did stoope excepting the Northumbrians.

(2) He entred his raigne the yeare of Christs nativity, nine hundred and one, and at Kingston vpon Thames was crowned and anointed with holy oyle. The Danish warres continuing in a successefull manner, fell as it were hereditarily from the Father vnto the Sonne, and ripened dayly towards their wished haruest. Besides Ethelwald the sonne of Ethelbert, the vnkle to this King Edward, young at his fathers decease, and therefore perhaps held vncapable of gouernment, shewed now the blossoms of vnder-licking plants, whose fruits are neither plenteous nor pleasant in tast; for his humours euer working vpon discontents, drew his thought onely how to make the possessor fall.

(3) He then entering action of rebellion, tooke the towne of Winborne neere vnto Bathe, and besides the allegiance due to his Prince, in sacrilegious manner brake the heits of holy Church, in deflowering and taking a Votarist to wife: Edward the elder so called, (it may be in regard of this his Opposite) with a selected Army repaired to Bathe, and thence prepared for the field: whose fight was so cockatrice-like to his cofen-Germans eye, that in the night he bade his Nun and Winborne adew, posting to Northumberland; and proffering his seruice to the Danes that lay for aduantage of rapine and spoile.

(4) Him as a fitte instrument they created their King, and forward in hope of some prosperous successe, passed through the East-Saxons, the East-Angles, and the Mercians Countreies: and laden with robberies came to Crikelade in Wiltshire, whence they departed ouer Thames to Basingstoke; and harrying the land before them, with triumph returned vnto East-Anglia. Edward thus endangered by these dreadfull enemies, gaue them no aduantage by lingering delays, but followed their tract vnto Saint Edmunds Ditch, whence in his returne, the Danes gaue him bataille, and obtained the victory, though bought with the liues of Ethelwald and Cochricus their Kings, and losse of many English, which made Edward the readier to enter a truce with them about the fift of his raigne.

(5) That the English were most expert for war in these daies, is witnessed by their resistance of those sturdy Danes, against whom the Commons many times with victory fought, without either King or Capitaine to guide them: and they were likewise famous in other lands: for about this time it was, that the Englishmen at the perswasion of the Goths, besieged the great City Argilla in Barbary, which they wanne with such slaughter of the enemy, and spoile of the towne, that for thirty yeares after it lay desolate without inhabitants, whereby it was hoped that the Saracens would haue departed Europe, as Ioannes Leo Afer hath told vs, who according to the Saracens doth referre this sieg to the three hundred and foureteenth of Mahomet Begira, which meeteth with the yeare of Christs Nativity, nine hundred and siue.

(6) The

(6) The truce yet lasting, the Danes in Northumberland were nothing quiet, to stay whose irruptions King Edward lent a great power, who harried the Country before them, and with much slaughter returned victorious. These daliances of Fortune made the Danes very desperate, and therefore to stay the rowling ball before it should passe their goale, they gathered their powers & entred Mercia, where with victory and spoile they raged for a time. But Edward to aid Ethelred his brother in law, and Earle of that Prouince, mulstered his men, and at Wodnesfeld neere wolfstunne in Staffordshire gaue the bataille, wherein the English so behaued themselves that the two Pagan-Kings Cowilsu & Healdine, the two Earles Vier & Scufa, besides other Nobles & Commons innumerable they slew: and now the clouds of these distemperatures being driuen backe, King Edward Monarchy ascended the Horizon, and the Sunne of his power beganne to shine very bright, therefore he seeking to hold what he had got, set his thoughts to secure his towne with Castles and walles of defence.

(7) These his proceedings caused him to be both beloued and feared; but his mind still free from any ambitious pride, as may appeare by the intercoure betwixt Leolin Prince of Wales and himselfe, wherof Wals. Atapaus maketh mention as followeth. What time Edward the Elder (saith he) lay at Auteleine, and Leolin Prince of Wales at Bethelley, intending a Party, Leolin refused to come downe, or to crosse the Seuerne: Whereupon Edward tooke boat and entred the riuer towards him, which when Leolin saw, and knew who hee was, he cast off his rich robe wherewith he was clad, and which hee had prepared for that roiall assembly, and entred the riuer breast-hie, where clasping the boat with an imbrace, submissiue said: Most wise and sage King, thy humilitie hath overcome my insolencie, and thy wisdom triumphed ouer my folly; come, get vpon my necke which I haue (foole as I am) lifted up against thee, so shalt thou enter into that land which thy benigne mildnes hath made thine owne this day: and after he had taken him vpon his shoulders, he would needs haue him sit down vpon his roiall robe, and so putting his hands iointly into his, did him homage.

(8) In the twelfth yeare of his raigne, as Henry Huntington hath it, Ethelred Earle of Mercia, who had married Elfedda King Edward's sister, departed this life, the hauing borne him one onely daughter named Elfwen, whose trauell in childbirth was so grievous, that euer after the forbore the nuptiall imbracements of her husband, allcending that it was an ouer foolish pleasure, which brought with it so great paines; and thereupon changing the wonted affection of her sexe from the bed vnto bataille, gouerned Mercia eight yeares after her husbands decease, as another Zenobia, and did not a little assist her brother in his warres: for the Welsh he pursued as farre at Breknoke, which the tooke with their Queene: from the Danes hee wonne the Countie of Darby, and assailing the towne vpon them, put her selfe in great danger; for enterprising to enter the Gate, shee was resisted by whole multitudes of Danes, notwithstanding, she persisted, & got entrance, in which encounter many died, and foure of her chiefe men of war, being Warders of her person euen fast by her side were slaine.

The Danes in Yorkshire she constrained to bee at her deuotion, so that some of them became her subiects, some vowed to attend in her aide, and some promised to be prest at her disposal. Her policie in warre proued euer the surest; her counsell of State was regarded with the wisest, and her prouidence in building, and repairing Cities for the weale-publick, or fortifying places for munition of warre exceeded others: which shee extended vpon Chester, Tamworth, Lichfield, Stafford, Warwicke, Shrewsbury, Sedbury, Eadsbury, Finborow, Rincorne, Brimsbery, Bridge and others.

This renowned Lady giuing place vnto Nature, left the warres to bee continued by her brother, her daughter at the disposal of her vnkle, and her body to be buried at Glocester in the Monastery of S. Peter, which her husband and her selfe had formerly built.

(9) The last battaile of this King against these vnfortunate enemies, was in the Country of the East Angles, wherof Edrick the Dane was King; for hee intending new warres with the English; sought to incite other Danes to his aide, wherof Edward hauing intelligence, preuented his purpose, by his so daune approach into those parts.

Edrick therefore hauing all in a readinesse, rashly encountered with his enemy, and fought a fierce battaile to the great losse of his Army, and dammage of his life; for returning to his Court after so foule a discomforture, became odious to his owne subiects, who violently fell vpon him and murdered him; and them selues brought low by ciuill diffention were shortly made subiect to the English King Edward, and that Kingdome with Mercia, ioined vnto his West-Saxons. And now hauing raigned in great warres and honour the space of twenty foure yeares deceased at Faringdon in Berkshire, the yeare of Christs incarnation, 924. and was buried in the new Monastery of Winchester, which his Father begunne, and himselfe wholly finished.

His Wines.

(10) Eguina the first wife of King Edward, was the daughter of a meane Gentleman named Bercher, whose eye-pleasing feature and alluring beauty made her to be educated about the degree of her birth, and was brought vp by the nurse of King Edward in tender affection and great esteeme. It chanced Prince Edward in kindnes came to visite his nurse, where seeing the admirable beauty of the Maide, fell so farre in loue, that hee tooke her to his wife without the consent or knowledge of his father: In which regard she is reputed by some Writers rather his Concubine then his Queene, no other cause mouing them but her meane parentage, and secret making and keeping of this marriage, although there bee some good histories and many likelyhoods to induce that shee was his lawfull Queene.

(11) Elfedda the second wife of King Edward, was the daughter (as Mathew of Westminster reporteth) of an Earle named Ethelhelme, and after the Bishop of Sherborne maketh mention of an Earle in Wiltshire among the West-Saxons of the same name, who was in great fauour with King Elfred, the father of this King, by whom hee was sent Ambassadour to carry his Almshouses to Stephen the sixth, of that name Bishop of Rome, in the yeare of our Lord 887. and by all probable conference of name, time, and place, hee seemeth to bee the man that was father to this Queene.

(12) Edgina, the third wife of King Edward, was the daughter and heire of Earle Sigeline Lord of Atapham, Culins, and Ieanham in Kent, who was there slaine in bataille against the Danes, Anno 927. Shee was married vnto King Edward about the fourteenth yeare of his raigne, being the yeare of Grace, 916. Shee was his wife ten yeares, and after his death shee liued a widow all the times of the raignes of King Ethelstan her sonne in law, of King Edmund, and King Edred her owne sonnes, of King Edwy her Grand-child, and was liuing in the Raigne of King Edward another of her Grand-children, almost fortie yeares after the death of her husband. It is writ of her that in the yeare of Grace, 959. Shee offered her lands and euidences to Christ vpon his Altar at Canterbury. Shee deceased the twenty fift of August in the fourth yeare of the said King Edgar, and of Christ, 963.

His Children.

(13) Ethelstan, the eldest sonne of King Edward, and the Lady Eguina, was borne and growne to good yeeres in the time of the raigne of his Grandfather King Elfred, who with his owne hands gaue him the order of Knighthood, after a very honourable manner

ner of creation, as William the Monke of Malmsbury, a great observer of such things, hath left in writing: who reporteth, that he put vpon him a Purple Robe, and girt him with a girdle wrought with pearle, and a Saxon sword in a scabbard of gold, hanging at the faine. He was the Successor of his Father in the West-Saxons dominions, and the English Monarchy.

(14) Elfred, the second sonne of King Edward and the Lady Egwin, is warranted by the testimony of the story of Hyde, to haue been loued of his Father aboue all his other children, that he caused him in his owne lifetime to bee crowned King, and to sit with him in his Seat of Estate, as his Partner in the Kingdome, and that he enjoyed that great honour but for a small time, deceasing shortly after his creation, and long before his fathers death; and was buried in the New Monastery at Winchester, which afterwards was remoued to Hyde.

(15) Editha (whom the Scottish Writers call Beatrice) the daughter of King Edward and the Lady Egwin, with great honour was married to Sybrick, the Danish King of Northumberland, in the first yeere of the raigne of her brother King Ethelstan, being the yeere of grace 915. Within one yeere after her marriage, her husband deceased, and his sonne Guthfrid succeeded him in his Kingdome. Wherefore the forsaking that Country, obtained of her brothers gift, the Castell of Tamworth, in the County of Warwicke, where he began a Monastery of Nunnies, and therein liued, died, and was interred, and both the Monastery and Body afterwards was remoued from thence vnto Poleworth.

(16) Elward, the third son of King Edward, & the first of Queene Elfreda his second wife, was born, as it seemeth, about the beginning of his Fathers raigne. He was carefully brought vp in the study of Librall Arts, and in all other princely qualities; so that it was expected he should haue succeeded his Father in the Kingdome: but presently vpon his fathers decaise, he deceased himselfe in Oxford, and was buried at one time, and in one place with him in the New Monastery at Winchester, in the yeere of Christ Iesus 924.

(17) Edwine, the fourth sonne of King Edward, and the second of Queene Elfreda his second Wife, was very young when his father was buried, and his brother Ethelstan crowned. Norwithstanding a deep ielousie possessing the King, that his title was too nere the Crowne, he caused him to be put into a little Pinnesse, without either Tackle or Oares, one only page accompanying him, that his death might be imputed to the waues: whence the young Prince ouercome with griefe, and not able to master his owne passions, cast himselfe headlong into the sea, and his dead body being driuen vpon the coasts of Flanders, was taken vp by Adulphe, Earle of Boloin, his cosen-germane, and honourably buried in the Monastery of Saint Bertin, in the Towne of S. Omers. Which fact was much lamented by King Ethelstan, who greuously punished the suggestions of his owne ielousie, and the procurers of his brothers death, sending great thanks to the Earle that buried him, and rich presents to the Monastery which entombed him, and to appease the ghost of his innocent brother, built the Abbey of Maldeton in the County of Dorset.

(18) Elfreda, the second daughter of King Edward, and the first of Queene Elfreda his second Wife, entered into the orders of Religion, and tooke vpon her the profession and vow of Virginity, in the Monastery of Ramsfey, situated vpon the Riuier Teff, in the County of Southampton. In which Monastery, she was first a Nunne, and afterward Abbess during the whole time of her life, which was there spent and ended, and her body in the said Abbey buried.

(19) Egwin, the third daughter of King Edward, and the second of Queene Elfreda his second Wife, was the second Wife to Charles the third, surnamed the Simple, King of France, son to King Lewis the brother of Judith, Queene of England before mentioned. She had issue by him Lewis the third, surnamed Be- yond-sea, because he was brought vp here in England with his Vnkle King Ethelstan; and Gillet Duchesse of Normandy married to Rollo the Dane: who in regard of his marriage, was allowed to bee the first Duke of that Country. This Queene suruiued King Charles her Husband; and afterwards was remaried to Herbert, the younger Earle of Vermandoy; which marriage was taken for so great an indignity, because Earle Herbert the elder, father to this Earle, had caused the King her Husband to die in prison, that King Lewis her sonne presently pursued her, apprehended, and committed her to the strait custody of Queene Gerberge his wife: so as shee had no recourse vnto him, nor issue by him.

(20) Ethelilda, the fourth daughter of King Edward, and the third of Queene Elfreda his second Wife, followed the example of her elder sister Elfreda, and became a Nunne in the Monastery of Wilton, which was sometime the head Towne giuing name to the whole County of Wiltshire, and antiently called Ellandon.

(21) Edhild, the fifth daughter of King Edward, and the fourth of Queene Elfreda, was married to Hugh surnamed the Great, Earle of Paris, Grand-master and Constable of France, in the yeere of our Lord 926. being the third of her brother King Ethelstan his raigne. This Hugh was the sonne of Robert, brother to Endes King of France, and father of King Hugh Capet, progenitor of the Kings of France, euer thence vnto this day: but shee died before him without any issue by him.

(22) Edgith, the sixth daughter of King Edward and the fifth of Queene Elfreda, was the first wife of Otho the first, surnamed the Great, Emperour of the West, sonne to the Emperour Henry, surnamed the Falconer. By him she had issue Ludolfe, Duke of Swabe, William Arch-bishop of Metz, Ludgar married to Conrad Duke of Lorraine, and Mechild Abbess of Quedlingburg in Saxony: in which Citie she deceased the seuen and twenty of August, in the yeere of Christs Nativity 947. the eleuenth of her husbands Empire, and the first of her brother King Edred his raigne in England. She was buried at the East end of the North side of a Chapell which her selfe had founded in the same Citie.

(23) Elgina, the seuenth daughter of King Edward, and the sixth of Queene Elfreda his second Wife, was by King Ethelstan her brother, with her sister Egith sent to the Court of the Emperour, Henry the first King of the Saxons in Germany, who honourably entertained her, brought her vp with his owne daughters, and after he had married her elder sister to his eldest sonne, he placed her also in marriage with a Duke of Italy about the Alpes, who is not named of our Writers, but may easily be coniectured by the honourable disposition of the maker of the match, to haue been a Prince of note and account, worthy of her estate and parentage.

(24) Edmund, the fifth sonne of King Edward, and the first of Queene Edgina his third and last Wife, was borne in the twentieth yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of the worlds saluation 921. and at his fathers death little more then three yeeres of age, was notwithstanding by the careful prouision of his mother, brought vp with all princely education conuenient for his yeeres and estate, inasmuch as there was generally a great expectation amongst the people conceiued of him in the life of his brother King Ethelstan, vnder whom he learned some experience of seruice in warre, and after whom hee succeeded in the Kingdome of England.

(25) Edred, the sixth sonne of King Edward, and the second of Queene Edgina his third Wife, and the youngest sonne of them both, was borne about the two and twentieth yeere of his fathers raigne, and yeere of grace 923. which was not long before the death of his father, who left him a little infant in the custody of his mother, by whom hee was carefully brought vp, and prooued a Prince of so great vertue and and valour, as after the death of King Edmund his brother, in regard of the minority of his Nephews, hee was with the generall consent, and liking of the whole nation, chosen to be his brothers successor in the kingdome and government ouer them.

(26) Edburg, the eight daughter of King Edward, and the first of Queene Edgina, in her child-hood had her disposition tried, and her course of life disposed by her Father in this manner: he laid before her gorgeous apparrell, and rich Jewels, in one end of a chamber, and the new Testament and Bookes of princely instruction in the other, willing her to make her choise of which she liked best: she presently tooke vp the bookes, and hee in his armes, and kissing her said, Goe in Gods name whither God hath called thee, and thereupon placed her in a Monastery at Winche- ster, wherein shee did most vertuously spend her whole life, and in that Abbey was buried.

(27) Edgina, the ninth daughter of King Edward, and the second of his last Queene, whose name shee bare, is reported in the history of the Monastery of Hyde by Winchester, and other Writers of our Country, to haue been married to Lewis Prince of Aquitaine in France, which not long before had beene a Kingdome of it selfe, sometime allotted to the portion of Lewis the third sonne of the Emperour Charles the Great, of which house it seemeth this Lewis was; afterward it became a Dukedome, and the possession of an other Family, by whom it came to be the inheritance after the Conquest to the Kings of England, which were defended of the house of Angou.

ETHELSTAN THE TWENTIE FIFT KING OF THE WEST SAXONS, AND THE TWENTIE SIXT MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND SVPOSSED ISSUE.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Ethelstan, the eldest sonne of King Edward (as hath beene said) for the great hopes conceiued of him, was crowned with a greater solemnity then any of his ancestors euer before him. The place was Kingston vpon Thames in the County of Surrey, the yeer of Christ Iesus 924. where, in the midst of the town a high Scaffold was built, and thereon the coronation performed to the open view of all, by Athelmus Archbishop of Canterbury, with flouts of oboys as that of Salomon.

(2) His beginnings were with troubles, and that rather by reason of friends then force of foes: for it is recorded, that Elfred a nobleman, either in fauour of King Edwards other sonnes, holding Ethelstan a Bastard, or else vpon an ambitious hope blinded of himselfe, intended at Winchester to haue plucked out the eyes of his Soueraine: but his treason being knowne, before the deed could shew blade, he was apprehended & sent to Rome to purge himselfe by oath: where, before the Altar of S. Peter and Pope John the tenth, he there abured the act, and thereupon fell sodainly down to the earth, so that his seruants tooke and bare him into the English Schoole, where, within three dayes after he died: the Pope denying him christian buriall vntill he knew King Ethelstans pleasure.

(3) These stormes ouerpast, as great a cloud seemed to arise vnto Ethelstans light, whose eye of ielousie euer followed the ascent, and his care euer opened vnto the intillations of Parasites, amongst whom his Cup-bearer was a chiefe, who brought daily more and more suspicion into the Kings head, that lastly (as wee haue shewed) hee consented to young Edwines death, though with too late a sorrow hee repented the same: for besides his seauen yeares penance voluntarily vndergone, to pacifie

the ghost of his betrayed brother, hee built the two Monasteries of Mildelton and Michelineffe, as for the most part such seed-plots were euer townes in the furrowes of blood, which happened vpon this occasion: It chanced his Cup-bearer in his seruice vpon a festiual to stumble with the one foote, and recovering himselfe with the other, pleasantly to say, you see how one brother helpeth another; vpon which speech the King with griefe and touch of heart, called to mind the death of his innocent brother, and forthwith commanded execution to be done on him the procurer, to repay his fact with deferred death: & himselfe was euer after more tender and carefull towards his other brethren, with a more respectiue regard, and bestowed his sisters most honorably in marriage, as hath beene said.

(4) At his entrance of government, to discharge the expectations of his subjects, hee endeauoured both by warres and alliances to make them strong and rich. First, therefore entering friendship with Silbrik the Danish King of Northumberland, vpon whom with condition that hee should receiue Baptisme, he bestowed his sister Editha in marriage, hee bent himselfe to ordaine Lawes for the weale publique, & those to bind aswell the Clergie as the Layety, out of which first sprang the attachment of Fellons, to take hold of such as stole above twelue pence, & were aboute twelue yeares of age.

(5) But Silbrik the Northumbrian dying the first yeare of his marriage, and his Queene returning to a religious life, his sonnes Godfrey and Anlaf, offended that their Pagan-Gods were neglected, and onely by the means of this their fathers last wife, stirred the Northumbrians to diquiet the English, which occasioned Ethelstan to invade their country, and forced Anlaf into Ireland, and Godfrey into Scotland, which last he wrought with Constantine their King, that he undertooke to side in his quarrell, with whom joined Hovel King of Wales. These in a fierce battle hee overcame and constrained them to submit themselves to his will, who knowing the chance of warre to be variable, and pitying the case of these down-cast Princes, restored them presently to their former estates, adding withall this princely saying, that it was more honour to make a King then to be a King.

(6) This notwithstanding, the case of Godfrey so moued the spirit of King Constantine, that hee againe assisted him in his inroades into the English part, which drew againe King Ethelstan into the North: & coming to Yorkshire (as he was a man much deuoted to God-ward) turned aside to visite the tombe of S. John of Beuerley, where earnestly praying for his prosperous successe, for want of richer Jewels, there offered his knife, vowing that if hee returned with conquest, hee would redeeme it with a worthy price, and thus armed with hope, proceeded forward pitching downe his tents at Brimesburie, his naue waffling along those seas.

(7) To the aide of Constantine came Anlaf, called by writers King of the Irish, and of the Iet, who had married his daughter, a man no doubt both hardy and delperate, as appeared by the Action hee underwent; for it is recorded, that as Elfred the English had attempted to know the State of the Danes: so this Dane at this place did to vnderstand the English: for, disguising himselfe like a Harper, hee went from Tent to Tent, and had access euen into King Ethelstan's presence, vntill hee had learned what he most desired, and then returned againe to his Campe, which part of his was no bolder, or more wisely performed, then was kept secret, and after reuealed by a most faithfull souldier: for Anlaf departed & free from pursuit, this souldier made the act known to King Ethelstan: who being fore displeased with his enemies escape, imputed the fault vnto him the reuealer: but he replying, made him this answer: I once serued Anlaf (said he) under his pay for a souldier, and gaue him the same faith that I doe now vnto

you; if then I should haue betrayed his designs, what trust could your Grace repose in my truth: let him therefore die, but not through my treachery, and by his escape secure your royall selfe from danger; remove your Tent from the place where it stands, lest it vnawares bee happily assaile you.

(8) The King seeing the faith of his souldier, was therewith pacified, and forthwith commanded his Tent to be removed, where presently a Bishoppe new come to his Campe pitched vp his owne, and the night following both himselfe and retinue were slaine by the same Anlaf that sought the Kings life in assaulting the place; and pressing forward came to his tent, who awaked with the suddain Allarum, boldly rushed vpon his enemies, & encouraging his men, put them backe with the death of five petty Kings, twelue Dukes, and well neere of the whole Army, which Anlaf had brought.

(9) The memory of this man is made the more lasting by a peece of ancient Saxon coine of siluer, inscribed with his name, ANLAF CYNNE, which for the antiquity of the thing, and honour of the man, we haue here imprinted, & placed though in the texture of our English Saxon Kings.

(10) To leaue a memoriall of King Ethelstan's great victory, giue me leaue to write what I find; namely, that neere vnto the Castle Dunbar in Scotland, he praying that his right vnto those parts might be confirmed vnto posterities by a signe, at one blow with his sword stroke an elle deepe into a stone, which stood so clouen a long time after, and vndoubtedly was the whetstone to the first Authors knife: but this is most certaine, that hee joined Northumberland to the rest of his Monarchy, and returning to Beuerley redeemed his owne knife.

(11) From hence he turned his warres into Wales, whose Rulers and Princes hee brought to be his Tributaries, who at Hereford entered couenant to pay him yearly twenty pound weight of gold, three hundred of siluer, and twenty five hundred head of cattle, with hawks and hounds to a certaine number, towards which payment by the statutes of Horell Dha, the King of Aberfraw was charged at sixty six pounds, the Prince Dineuore, and the Prince of Powys were to pay the like summes.

(12) The Brittaines, which to his time with all equall right inhabited the City of Excester with the Saxons, hee expelled into the further promontory of Cornwal, and made Tamar the confines of his own Empire; so that his dominion was the largest that any Saxon before him had enioied, and his fame the greatest with all foraine Princes, who fought his friendship both with loue and alliance, by marching with his sisters, and presenting him with rich and rare presents; for Hugh King of France besides other vnestimable Jewels; sent him the sword of Constantine the Great, in the hilt whereof (all couered with gold) was one of the nailles that fastned Christ to his Crosse: he sent likewise the spear of Charles the Great, reputed to be the same that pierced Christ's side, as also part of the Crosse whereon hee suffered his passion, and a peece of the thorny Crowne where-with his blessed Temples were tormented, and with these came the Banner of S. Maruice so often spread by Charles the Great in his Christian warres against the Saracens: And from Ortho the Emperour, who had married his sister, was sent a vessell of precious stones artificially made, wherein were scene Lanships with vines, corne, and men, all of them seeming fo

naturally to moue, as if they had growne and retained life: And the King of Norway sent him a goodly shippe with a guilt sterne, purple sailes, and the decke garnished all with gold.

(13) Of these accounted holy reliques King Ethelstan gaue part vnto the Abbey of S. Swithen in Winchester, and the rest to the Monastery of Malmesbury, whereof Adelme was the founder, and his Tutelar Saint, in honour of whom he bestowed great immunities vpon the towne, and large endowments vpon the Abbey; hee new built the monasteries of Wilton, Michelineffe, and Mildelton, founded Saint Germans in Cornwal, Saint Petros at Bodman, the Priory of Pilton, new walled and beautified the City of Excester, and enriched euery famous Abbey in the land, either with new buildings, Jewels, Books, or Reuenewes.

(14) As also hee did certaine Cities with the Mintage of his money, whereof in London were eight houses, at Winchester fixe, at Lewis two, at Hastings two, in Hampton two, in Warham two, in Chichester one, in Rocheester three, two for the King, and one for the Bishop, at Canterbury seuen; foure for himselfe, two for the Archbishop, and one for the Abbat, although it appeareth the Archbishop had his before the rainge of this King. For among these ancient Saxon-Coines, we find one of Ceolnoth, who sae these Archbishop in the yeare 831. which both for the antiquity & authority of truth wee haue here inferred.

(15) This Prince King Ethelstan was of an indifferent stature, nor much exceeding the common sort of men, chearefull in countenance, his haire verie yellow, and somewhat slooped forward as he went; for valour inuincible, in resolution constant; and for his curtesie beloued of all; hee reigned in great honour the space of fiftene yeares and odde monethes, and deceased in the City of Gloucester, vpon wednesday the seuenteenth of October, and was buried at Malmesbury the yeere of Christs Nativity 940. hauing neuer had wife mentioned in our histories.

His supposed Issue.
(16) Leoneat, the supposed daughter of King Ethelstan, is reported by Iohn Rouse and Papulwick, writers of the mistrusted story of Guy of Warwicke to be married vnto Reynburn Earle of Warwicke, and sonne to the same Guy, whose remembrance and reputation is preferred & kept with no lesse renowne among the common people, for the liberty of England saued by his victory in single combat against Colbrand the Dane, then was Horatius the Romane for the preferatiō of Rome, whose historie I will leaue for others to enlarge that haue more leasure & better inuention.

EDMUND THE TWENTIE SIXTH KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND TWENTIE SEVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN: HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, DEATH, WIFE AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Edmund the fifth sonne of King Edward, borne vnto him by Queene Edgiva his third and last wife, at the age of nineteen yeeres succeeded his brother King Ethelstan in his kingdom, and Monarchy: hee began his rainge the yeare of the worlds saluation 940. and with great solemnity was crowned at Kingslan vpon Thames, in the fifth yeare of Ortho the first Emperour of that name, and his brother in law; his valour had often beene tried in the warres of King Ethelstan against those stout and sturdy enemies the Danes, Scottish, Irish, and Welshmen, that often had assailed to disturbe his peace.

(2) Ethelstan deceased, and the crowne scarce set vpon King Edmund's head, but that the Danes in Northumberland, disliking subiection, called againe Anlaf out of Ireland to be their King; who now in the infancy infancy of Edmunds estate, with great power of men purposed to subdue all before him; but Edmund as forward, with full resolution ment to keepe what was got, and so gathering his power, proceeded towards the North, and at Leicester encountered with the Danes: howbeit, through the interceding of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, Odo and Wolston, the matter was mitigated before it came to the uttermost.

(3) The next year of his raigne, the said Anlase (whom some hold to haue bene the King of Norway) being dead, an other Anlase, sonne to King Sithrick, of whom we haue spoken, intruded vpon the Kingdom of Northumberland. These heads, as Hidra, springing vp each after others, drew King Edmund againe into the North, who raging like a prouoked Lion, subdued, as he went, those townes where the Danes kept, and got from them Lincolne, Leicester, Darbie, Stafford, and Nottingham, compelling them to receiue Baptisme, and to become his Subiectes: so that the Country was wholly his vnto Humber. These his proceedings caused Anlase and Reinold the sonnes of the Danish Gurmo, subduers of York, to yeeld themselves wholly to his deuotion, offering him subiection, and withall to receiue the Christian faith: for performance whereof, they likewise receiued Baptisme, vnto whom King Edmund was Godfather, to Reinold at his Confirmation, and to Anlase at the Font: but how soone they fell from both, the sequell shewed; for casting off the faith and fealty thus promised, they stirred the Northumbrians to another rebellion, yet with no better success: then desert; for they were forced into a perpetuall exile, and King Edmund adioined that Country to his owne gouernment, without the admittance of any Secondary or Vice-roy to rule there vnder him.

(4) Cumberland also, which seldome was quiet, hauing bene a Kingdome entire of it selfe, and now aided by Leolin King of Southwales, he vtterly waisted: and apprehending the two sonnes of Dunm. King of that Prouince, commanded the eyes of those ouer-bold Princes to be puld out, and gaue their inheritance to Malcolme King of Scots, to hold the same by fealty from him. Thus by power and policie clearing those coasts whence the sharpest stormes had continually blowne, hee returned into the South, and there set himselfe to ordaine lawes for the good of his people, the which, lest time the consumer of all things might chance to obliterate, were by the labours of the learned Lambert translated into Latine, and imprinted in the year 1568. next, to shew his loue to God, and bounty to his Church, he gaue the towne of Saint Edmondsbury with the liberties thereof, wholly to that Martyr, and to the Monks that liued in seruing at his Altars.

(5) But as each thing hath his spring, growth, & decay; so all men their dates, howsoever eminent in degree, & the shank of their Compas so set in a center that the Circle of their lines are oftentime abrupt, before it be drawn to the full round: for so with others, we may see in this Monarch, who being safely returned from many great dangers of war, at peace in his Pallace, came to a lamentable & v unexpected end: for at his Manor of Pucle-herkes in the County of Gloucester, whiles hee interposed himselfe betwene his Sewer and one Leone to part a fray, was, with a thrust through the body, wounded to death the twenty sixt of May, in the year of our saluation 946. when hee had prosperously raigne the space of five yeares and seuen moneths, and his body, with no lesse sorrow then solemnity, was buried at Glascenbu.

His Wife.

(6) Elfgine, the onely wife of King Edmund, hath not her parents declared (for ought I find) by any of our Writers: but this is affirmed, that shee was married vnto him in the first year of his raigne, which was the year of Grace, 940. and that she was his wife foure yeeres & vpward, after whose slaughter she remained a mournfull widdow all the rest of her life, which she spent with so great vertue and opinion of the people, as by the writers of that age shee is commended to posterity by the name of a Saint.

His Issue.

(7) Edwy, the eldest sonne of King Edmund, and Queene Elfgine, his wife, was borne in the second year of his fathers raigne Anno 942. When his father died, hee was but foure yeeres of age, and in respect of his minority was not permitted to succeed him in the Kingdome, but forced to giue place to his vncl Edred, vnder whom he liued nine yeeres; and in the tenth, his vncl being dead, and himselfe then growne to the age of thirteene, was admitted to the succession of the Monarchy.

(8) Edgar the second sonne of King Edmund, and of Queen Elfgine, was borne in the third year of his fathers raigne, the year of Christ Iesus 943, and was but three yeeres old when his Father died; notwithstanding, hee proued afterward a Prince of great expectation, and in the second year of King Edwy his brothers raigne, being then but fouretee yeeres of age, he was chosen King by the Mercians and Northumbrians, both which people he gouerned vnder the title of King of Mercia, for the space of two yeeres befor his brothers death, and then succeeded him in the whole Monarchie.

EDRED THE TWENTIE SEVENTH KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND TWENTIE EIGHTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS ACTS, RAIGNE, AND ISSUE.

CHAPTER XL.

Edred, the sixth sonne of King Edward, borne vnto him by Queene Edgna his third and last wife, at the age of twenty three yeeres succeeded his brother King Edmund in the monage of his children in all his dominions, and was the twenty seuen King of the West-Saxons, and the twentieth Monarch of the Englishmen. He began his raigne in the yeere of Mans saluation 946. and was anointed, and crowned at Kingston vpon Thames in the County of Surrey vpon Sunday the seuenteenth day of August by the hands of Otho Archbishop of Canterbury.

(2) His Coronation robes scarcely put off; news was brought him that the Northumbrians had revolted and stirred a dangerous infurrection; notwithstanding the Couenants that his brother Edmund had made with Malcolme King of the Scots to secure the same. Therefore left deliaies might proue dangerous, with a great Army hee entred into the verge of Scotland, without sight of enemy, or any resistance. But peace being concluded betwixt Edred, Malcolme and the Northumbrians; yea and the same confirmed strongly by oath, yet was it little regarded of the last named lurers; for no sooner was Edred returned, but that they sent into Ireland for Anlase, the sonne of Gurmo the Dane, who had been expelled the Country as we haue said.

(3) Anlase gathering a flecte and forces accordingly, came into Northumberland, where he was with great ioy receiued and made their King, which title hee maintained for foure yeeres continuance, banding against Edred, and still holding him play, till lastly the Northumbrians disloiall to both, took their feather out of Anlase his plume, and sent him packing to the place, whence he came, electing one Her- icus King in his stead.

(4) Edred awaked with the wafts that they made, prepared a iourney into those parts, where with fire and sword hee bare downe all before him; and albeit he was a man religiously bent, yet spared he not the Abbey of Rippon from flames, but laid all vnto ashes as he went, the enemy not daring to shew the face. In his returne suspecting no perill, suddenly an hoast brake out of York, and fell vpon the Rere-ward of his Army, marching but carelessly, and broken out of their array, whereby many perished before any complete order of resistance could be made. The King seeing this bold attempt of these Rebels, stroke downe his standard, turning his face againe to the North, and threatened the reuenge, with the Countries spoile and their liues.

(5) In this plot of sedition Wolstan Archbishop of York had sowne some seed of treason, both in the assistance of action, and counsell for the enterprise, very ill becomming a man of his ranke: this Wolfe therefore hauing thus awaked the Lion from rest, was the onely man that fell in his pawes; for the Northumbrians expelling their statelesse Hericus with submisue teares and golden showers, so pacified the King, that their offences were therewith cleane washed away: but hee good man (a Saint at the last) was mued vp in prison (against whom accusations daily came, and namely, that hee had commanded sundry of the Burgeses of Thetford to bee slaine) where hee abode till he was by Edred vpon a recurent regard of his calling, released from thence; for as this King is commended for his lenity towards the vertuous; so is he no lesse for his iustice towards the vicious, and for the practise of his Religion, as forward as any, suffering not onely his manners to be reproofed and corrected, (a quality truly roiall, and best becomming Princes) but also (so much below the pitch of foueraigne Maicty) his body to bee chastised at the will and direction of Dunstan Abbot of Glafenbury, vnto whose custody, he also committed the greatest part of his treasure and richest iewels to be lockt in his chests, and vnder the keyes of this Monastery.

(6) The stately Abbey of Mieh at Abington neere Oxford built by King Inas, but destroyed by the Danes, he newly repaired, indowing it with lands & faire reuenues, and confirmed the Charters with seales of gold: hee also ordained Saint Germans in Cornwal to be a Bishops See, which there continued till by Canutus it was annexed to the Episcopall See of Kyrtin in Denon, both which Sees were afterward by King Edward the Confessor translated to the City of Excester: but sith the brightest day hath his night, and the highest tide his present ebbe, what maruaile is it, if then Edred in the middest of his strength were seized vpon by sicknesse and death, which surprised him after hee had reigned in great honour nine yeeres and odde moneths, to the great griefe of his Subjects, who solemnly interred him in the old Minster within the City of Winchester, the yeere of Christ Iesus 955. whose bones with other Kings, to this day are preferred in a guilt Coffin, fixed vpon the wall in the fourth side of the Quier.

His Issue.

(7) Elfed, the sonne of King Edred, was borne before his Father was King; neither find I mention of his Mother, or any act by him done, onely in the sixth yeere of King Edred his raigne, which was the yeere of Grace, 952. he is mentioned for a witnesse to his Fathers graunt of lands in Wittenham, to Ethelwolve a Duke of England in those daies, as appeareth by the Charter thereof, bearing date in the yeere afore said.

(8) Bertrid an other, and as it seemeth an elder sonne of King Edred, was borne before his father was King, without any mention also of his Mother, who liuing in the second yeere of his fathers raigne, namely Anno, 948. was written for a witnesse in the same yeere, to his grant of lands in Bedlaking, to Cuthred one of his Barons, the Charter whereof is extant to bee scene vnto this day.

EDVVY THE TWENTIE EIGHTH KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND TWENTIE NINTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN: HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND DEATH.

CHAPTER XLI.

An. Do. 955.

Edw, the eldest sonne of King Edmund, after the deceale of his vnclie Edred, succeeded him in his dominions, and was the twentieth eighth King of the West-Saxons, and the twentieth ninth Monarch of the Englishmen: he began his raigne in the yeere of the worlds saluation, 955. and was appointed & crowned at Kingston vpon Thames, by the hands of Otho the 22. Archbishop of Canterbury.

(2) Yong hee was in yeeres, and vitious of life, if the Monkish Story-writers of those times his deadly enemies may be credited, not past thir-

teene when he entred gouernment, and that begun with a capitall sinne: for they report, that vpon the solemne day of his Coronation, and insight of his Nobles, as they sat in Counsell, with shamelesse and vnprincelike lust, he abused a Lady of great estate, & his neere kinswoman, whose husband shortly after he slew, the more freely to possesse his incestuous pleasure: and to fill the penes of his further infamy ready to their hands, that wrote his life, hee was a great enemy vnto the Monkish orders (a sore in those dayes very tender to be touched, and may well be thought the cause of many false aspersions on him,) whom from the Monastery of Malmesbury Glasenbury and others, hee expelled, placing married Priests in their roomes: Dunstan likewise the Abbot Saint of Glafenbury hee banished the Realm, for

for his ouer-bold reprehensions; if not rather for retaining the treasure deliuered him by King Edred, and demanded againe in his sicknesse; when by the voice (forsooth) of an Angell from heauen, his journey was staid, and those rich Iewels not deliuered the King in his life; I will not say kept backe, lest Dunstan with Balaam (whose stories are not much vnlike) should bee thought to follow (as he did) the wages of deceit.

(3) Howsoever, the reuerent opinion of the Monks single life, and the conceiued holines of Abbot Dunstan in those misty times, did daily counterpoize young Edwy in esteeme, which made his best acts construed, and recorded to the worst; insomuch that his Subjects minds, ebbing as the Sea from the full, drew backe the current of their subiectiue affections, and set the eye of obedience vpon Prince Edgar his Brother: and albeit his young yeeres may seeme to cleare him from the imputation of so lustful a fact, as he is charged with, at the day of his assuming the Crowne; and the separation from his wife, (as too neere in consanguinity) wrought griefe enough in his distressed heart, yet pittilesse of his estate, and carelesse of their owne allegiance, the Mercians with the Northumbrians did vterly cast off obedience, and sweare their fealty to Edgar, not fully fourteene yeeres aged: Edwy then raigning in a still decaying estate, was held of such his subiects, in no better esteeme, then was Iehoram of Iudah, who is said to haue liued without being desired: for very griefe whereof after foure yeares raigne hee ended his life, the yeere of our Lord 959: whose body was buried in the Church of the new Abbey of Iside at Winchester, erected without the Wall in the North of that City.

His Wife.

(4) Elfgine, the wife of King Edwy, was a Lady of great beauty, and nobly descended, yea, and by some deemed somewhat too neare in the blood roiall, to bee matched with him in spousall bed: her fathers name is not recorded, but her mother was Ethelgine, whom some scandalized to haue bene his Concubine, and the onely cause of Dunstan's banishment. The subiects disliking of this vnlawfull marriage, & further instigated by the Monks, (whose humorous pleasures, or displeasures could very much sway the state in those daies,) failed by degrees to performe their duties to their King, and her they likewise enforced to a separation, in the third yeere of his regardlesse gouernment, and of Christ Iesus, 958. without other mention of her life or death.

succeeded in all his dominions, and was the thirtieth

Edgar, the second son of King Edmund hauing reigned two yeeres ouer the Mercians and Northumbrians, in the dayes of Edwy his Brother, to the great impairing of King Edwy's reputation and esteeme; after his death at sixteen yeeres of age was chosen to Monarch of the Englishmen, or rather now of whole England, all other titles of Kingdomes falling vnder his scepter, and becoming Prouinces annexed vnto his absolute Monarchie.

(2) He beganne his raigne in the yeere of Christs Nativity, 959. and was crowned (as some write) the same yeare at Kingston, vpon Thames, by Otho Archbishop of Canterbury. But Randolphus Higden in his Polychronicon, referreth it to the twelfth yeere of his raigne: William Monke of Malmesbury to the thirtieth yeere of his age, and the Saxon Chronicle of

Edgar the Peaceable.

(3) The raigne of this King is said to haue bene altogether in a calme tranquillity, and therefore hee was furnamed the Peaceable; his vertues were many, and vices nota few, the one gloriously augmented, and the other fairly excused, by those Monkish writers, vnto whose professions he was most fauourable: his Guides were Dunstan Archbishop of Canterbury, Ethelwold Abbot of Gloucestre, and Oswald Bilhop of Worcester, three stout Champions against the married Clergie, (for women in those dayes were great bugs in their eyes,) therefore the married Priests hee displaced, & brought in Monkes of singlelife to possesse their rooms, whose finnes of incontinency grew after to be great, as the world did then witness, which caused Trensis the translator of Higden, to blame King Edgar, charging him to bee lowly moued in following their counsell against married Clerkes.

(4) So doe Malmsbury and Higden taxe him with too fauourable affections towards the Danes, who dwelled alike in euery town with the English, though formerly they had fought the destruction of all, and still lay in wait attending for the spoile of his true subiects, who apt enough vnto euil, lerned the beaulty sinne of quaffing, and emptying of cups, which King Edgar was enforced to redresse, by enacting a law against excessive drinking, ordaining a fine by certaine pinnes set in the pot, with penalties to any that should presume to drinke deeper then the marke.

(5) His policie was no lesse prudent (but much more successful) for the destruction of Wolues, that in his daies did great annoiance to the land; for the tribute imposed vpon the Princes of Wales by the English King Ethelstan (as we haue said) he wholly remitted, and in lieu thereof, appointed certaine numbers of Wolues yeerely to bee paid, and Tenaf, or Iage Prince of North-Wales, did for his part pay him yeerely three hundred, which continued for three yeeres space, but in the fourth was not a Wolfe to bee found, and so the tribute ceased.

(6) His Nauieriall, containing three thousand and fixe hundred ships, he diuided into three parts, appointing euery of them to a seuerall quarter to waffe the Seas, and secure the coasts from Pirates, and forraigne enemies, wherein himselfe euery summer would saile with those in the East parts, vnto those in the West, and sending them backe to their charge, would with the West saile into the North, and with the northerne flecte compassse againe into the East, whereby the seas were scoured, and his Kingdom exceedingly strengthened.

(7) The like custome vsed he in the winter season in his ieyfts, and circuits throughout his Country, so to take account of the administration of his lawes, and the demeanour of his great men, especially of his Judges, whom seuerely he punished, so often as he found the execution of their places ballanced either with bribery or partiality; so that there was neuer lesse robbery, deceit or oppressions, the in the raigne of this worthy King.

Edgar league

Kings.

(8) His state thus flourishing in peace and prosperity, he caused diuers Princes to bind themselves vnto his allegiance, but perchance it may iustly be doubted, whether in such performance of homage and seruice, as Malmsbury, Florentius, Randolphus, Marianus, Houeden, and other writers ascribe to haue bene at the City Chester, where (they say) Kenradie King of Scots, Malcolme of Cumberland, Maxemius an Arch-Pirate, with the petty King of Wales, Duff-nall, Griffith, Humal, Iacob, and Indithil, did with oares row his Barge vpon the river Dee, from his Pallace to Saint Johns Church, and thence againe backe to his Pallace, himselfe the while steering the helme, and saying in his glory that then his successors might trulie account themselves Soueraigne Kings of England, when they enjoyed such a Prerogative of sublimity, and supreme honour: although (saith M. Fox) he might much better, and more Christianlike haue said, God forbid that I should reioice, but in the Croffe of our Lord Iesus Christ.

(9) Warres he had none in all his raignes, onely towards the end, the Welshmen moued some rebellion, which to preuent, hee assembled a mighty Army, and therewith entred into the County of Glamorgan, sharply punishing the ringleaders thereof, but his souldiers doing great harms in the country, laden with spoiles for the returne, the King out of his bounty commanded all to be againe restored, whereby hee purchased singular loue and honour of the inhabitants.

Monast. lib. by King Edgar

(10) To his magnanimity was ioined much deuotion, but most especially towards the Monks, for whom, and for Nunnes hee built and repaired forty seuen Monasteries, intending to haue continued their numbervnto fifty, as himselfe testifieth in these words of his Charter.

Ex chart. by

The Monasteries, as well of Monks as of Virgins haue bene destroyed and quite neglected throughout England, which I haue now determined to repaire to the glory of God for my soules health, and so to multiply the number of Gods seruants and handmaidens: and now already I haue set up forty seuen Monasteries with Monks and Nunnes in them, and if Christ spare me life so long, I am determined in offering my duntow munificence to God, to proceed to fifty, euen to the last number of a Libelle.

M. Fox in his Acts and Writ-
ments.

And by this his Charter did not onely approue the enlargement of S. Maries Monastrie in Worcester, and the restoring of Volaries in stead of married Priests, but himselfe either new founded or repaired many others, as the house of Ely, Gloucester, Abington, Burgh, Thorney, Ramsey, Wilton, Winton, Winchome and Thunstocke with great cost, and large endowments, hauing the Clergie in an high and reuerent esteeme, and most of all his Confessor Dunstan: but with this wheate, there were tares growing, though the late Monkish Writers bind them vp for good corne: for some men tell (saith Randolphus Higden) that Edgar in his beginning was cruell to Citizens, and lecherous to maidens, whereof these his actions ensuing beare sufficient witness.

Rom. High.

(11) The first was committed against the virgine Wolfsild, a sacred Nunne as some affirme, though others somewhat mitigating that sacrilegious offence, haue reported, that she to auoid his fleshly and lasciuious lust, was forced to take the habit of a Menichion vpon her, and in the same brought to his bed, wherein the chaste S. Edith was begot, and for whom, say they, he underwent his seuen yeeres penance without the wearing of his Crowne.

(12) A like offence hee committed against the virgine Ethelseld, the daughter of Ordmar a Duke among the East-Angles, who for her surpassing beauty was furnamed the White; on whom he begot his eldest sonne Edward, for which fact as M. Fox affirmeth, hee did his seuen yeeres penance inioined by Dunstan: and indeed by Osborne it appeareth, that Edward was not legitimate, where he writeth, that the child begotten of the harlot, hee baptized in the holy fontaine of regeneration, and so giuing his name to be called Edward, did adopt him to be his sonne. With whom agree Nicholas Trivet in his English story, written in French, Iohannes Paris in his French story, written in Latine, both of them calling Edward a sonne illegitimate; as also doth Vincenius and Antoninus, howbeit William of Malmsbury, Mathew Paris, Mathew of Westminster, Randolphus and others, will haue her his first and lawfull wife, and Edward in true matrimony to haue descended from them.

(13) An other instance of his lasciuious life is produced by the forenamed Writers, and thus both occasioned and acted. It chanced Edgar to heare a Virgine and daughter to a Westerne Duke, exceeding dingly praised for her incomparable beauty, the touch of which firing from his eare rebounded to his heart, and as a bait drew him presently into those parts; where comming to Andener, commanded the damsell to his bed: The mother tender of the Virgins honour, brought in the darke her maid, but not her daughter, who, all as well pleased the King in his sinfull dalliance: the day approaching, this late laid maid made halt to arise, but the King loth to part yet with his supposed faire Lady, demanded why she made such halt? who answered him, that her taske was great, and hardly would her worke be done, if day should preuent her ere the rose; but yet being staied about her howre, vpon her knees shee made this humble request, that shee might be freed from her shrewde dame, alleging, it was not fitting, that the woman who had tasted the pleasures of a Kings embracements, should endure a seruile ruder vnder the rule of any other. The King perceiving the deceit, and therewith moued to wrath, yet could not recall what hee had done (or rather vndone) and therefore turned his conceiued wrongs vnto a self; but so, that hee both sharply checked the deceiver, and kept this damsell, (whose night-work and pleasure had fully wonne him) for his Concubine, whereby he ruled them that lately had the command of her; and to vse the words of Malmsbury, hee loued this Concubine most entirely, keeping true faith of his bed to her alone, vntill the time hee married for his lawfull wife Elfrida the daughter of Duke Ordgarus.

(14) His last lasciuious Act, was as Dauids ioyned with blood, and wrought in manner as followeth. Fames laith report of beauteous Elfrida (the paragon of her sexe, and wonder of Nature) the only daughter of Ordgarus Duke of Deuonshire, founded so lowd in those Westerne parts, that the Echo thereof was heard into King Edgars Court, and entred his eares, which euer lay open, to giue his eyes the scope of desire, and his wanton thoughts the raines of will: to trie the truth whereof, hee secretly sent his minion or fauourite Earle Ethelwold of East-Anglia, who well could iudge of beauty, and knew the diet of the Kings with Commission, that if the Pearle proved so orient, it should be seized for Edgars owne wearing, who ment to make her his Queene, and Ordgarus the Father of a King.

Ethelwold a iolly young Gallant, posted into Deuonshire, and guest-wise visited Duke Ordgarus his Court, where seeing the Lady surpassing the report, blamed Fames ouer-sight for sounding her praise in so base and leaden a Trumpet; and wholly surprised with her loue, himselfe beganne to wooe the Virgine, yea, and with her Fathers good liking, so as the King would giue his assent. Earle Ethelwold returning, related that the maide indeed was faire, but yet her beauty much augmented by babling reports, and neither her feature or parts any wise befitting a King. Edgar mistrusting no coriuall in his loue, nor dreaming false fellowship in wooing, did with a sleight thought passe ouer Elfrida, and pitch his affections the faster another way. Earle Ethelwold following the game now a foot, desired Edgars assistance to bring it to a stand, pretending not so much for any liking to the Lady, as to raise his owne fortunes to be her fathers heire, to which the King yielded, and for this minion solicited Ordgarus, who glad to be shrowded vnder the fauours of such a fauourite, willingly consented, and his daughters destinies assured to Earle Ethelwold.

The marriage solemnized, and the fruits thereof a short time enjoyed, the fame of her beauty beganne againe to bee spread, and that with a larger Epithite then formerly it had bene: Whereupon Edgar much doubting of double dealing, laid his angle faire to take this great gull, and bearing no shew of wrong or suspect, invited himselfe to hunt in his Parks, and forthwith repairing into those parts, did not a little grace his old seruant, to the great ioy of

Ordgarus the Duke: but Ethelwold mistrusting the cause of his comming, thought by one policy to disappoint another: and therefore reucaling the truth to his wife, how in his proceedings hee had wronged her beauty, and deceived his Soueraigne, requested her louing assistance to saue now his endangered life, which lay in her power, and of the meanes he thus aduised:

"Like as (saide he) the richest Diamond rough and vn-cut, yeelds neither sparkle nor esteeme of great price, nor the gold vnburnished giues better lustre then the base brasse; so beauty and feature clad in meane aray, is either slightly looked at with an vnfix'd eye, or is wholly vnregarded, and held of no worth: for according to the Prouerbe, 'cloth is the man, and man is the wretch': then to preuent the thing that I feare, and is likely to proue my present ruine, and thy last wracke; conceale thy great beauty from King Edgars eyes, and giue him entertainment in the meane attire: let them (I pray thee) for a time bee the nightly curtaines drawne about our new-Nuptiall bed, and the dayly cloudes to hide thy splendent Sinne from his sharpe, and too too piercing sight, whose vigour & raies will soone set his waxen wings on fire, that ready are to melt at a farre softer heat. Phee (thou fleshly defileth the hand, and we are forced to giue occasion of euill: waile then thy faireness with the scarres of deformity, from his ouer-lauith and vnmastered eyes: for the fairest face draws euery gaze, if not the attempts, and natures endowments, are as the bush for the wine, which being immoderately taken doth surfeit the sense, and is a gaine cast vp with as loathing a taste. Of these dreags drunke Amnon after his fill of faire Thamar, Herod of Miriam, & Aeneas of Dido; yea, and not to seeke examples farre off, King Edgars variation in his vnstedfast motion doth easily beuayr it selfe: for could either holy Wolfsild, beautiful Ethelseld, or the wanton Wench of Andener, keepe the needle of his compassse certaine at one point, nothing lesse, but it was still led by the load-stone of his euery mutable and turning affections. But thou wilt say, hee is religious, and by founding of Monasteries hath expiated those finnes. Indeed many are built; for which time and posterities must thanke holy Dunstan, from whose deuotion those good deeds haue sprung: but is thy person holier then sacred Wolfsild; thy birth and beauty greater then Ethelseld the White, daughter also to a Duke? the former, of an holy Volary, hee made the sinke of his pollution; and the later is branded to all ages, by the hatefull name of a Concubine, and her sonne among vs esteemed for a Bastard. These should bee motives to all beauteous and vertuous Ladies, not to sell their honours at so low and too-late repented a price. Neither think (sweet Countesse) that thy husband is zealous, or suspects thy constancy, which I know is great, and thy selfe wholly complete with all honourable vertues: but yet consider I pray thee, that thou art but young, & maist easily be caught, especially of him that is so old a Master of the game: neither perswade thy selfe of such strength, as is able to hold our so great an assault; for men are mighty, but a King is much more. I know thou art wife, and enough hath been said, onely let mee adde this, that euill beginnings haue neuer good ends: and so with a kind kisse, hoping hee had wonne his Wife to his Will, prepared with the first to welcome King Edgar.

Lady Elfrida thus left to her selfe, began seriously to thinke vpon this Curtaigne Sermon, whose text shee distast, being taken out of an ouer-worne and threed-bare cloth prouerbe, as though her fortunes had been wholly residing, and altogether consisting in her parentage and apparell, but nothing at all in any parts of her selfe.

« ports, only to faue his credit, who hath impaired « mine, and belied my worth? And must I needs de-« foule my selfe, to be his only faire foule, that hath « kept me from the State and seat of a Queene? I « know the name of a Countesse is great, and the « Wife of an Earle is honourable, yet no more then « birth and endowments haue assigned for me, had « my beauty been far lesse then it is. He warnes me of « the end, when his owne beginnings were with tre-« chery: tels me the examples of others, but obserues
« none himselfe: he is not ielous, forsooth, and yet I « must not looke out; I am his faire, but others pitch « fire, wine, bush, and what not? Not so holy as Wol- « hild, nor so white as Ethelseld, and yet that must now « be made far worse then it is. I would men knew the « heate of that cheeke wherein beauty is bla« zed, then would they with lesse suspect suffer our « faces vnmaskt, to take aire of their eyes, and wee no « whit condemnable for shewing that which cannot « be hid, neither in me shall, come of it what will.

And thus resolving to bee a right woman, desired nothing more then the thing forbidden, and made preparation to put it in practise. Her body shee endured with the sweetest balmes, displayed her haire, and bespangled it with pearles, bestrewed her breasts and bosome with rubies and diamonds, rich Jewels glittering like starres depended at her necke, and her other ornaments euery way suitable. And thus, rather Angell, then Lady-like, shee attended the approach and entrance of the King, whom with such faire obsiance and seemely grace shee receiued, that Edgars greedie eye presently collecting the raies of her shining beauty, became a burning glasse to his heare, and the sparkle of her faire falling into the traine of his loue, set all his senses on fire: yet dissembling his passions, he passed on to his game, where hauing the false E- thelseld at aduantage, he ranne him through with a Iaueline, and rooke faire Elfrida to his wife.

(15) These were the vertues and vices of this King, little in personage, but great in spirit, and the first vnresisted Monarch of the whole Land, whom all the other Saxons acknowledged their supreme, without diuision of Prouinces or title. He reigned sixteen yeeres and two moneths in great tranquillity and honour, and died vpon tuesday the eighth of July, the thirty seventh of his age, and yeere of Christ 975.
whose body with all funerall solemnitie was buried in the Abbey of Glasterburie.

His Wives.

(16) Ethelseld, the first wife of King Edgar, was surnamed in the Saxon English Eneba, in Latine Can- dida, which with vs is White, because of her exceeding great beauty. Shee was the daughter of a Duke amongst the East-Angles, named Ordmar, and was married vnto him the second yeere of his raigne, and the eighteenth of his age, being the yeere of Christs Natiuitie 961. She was his wife not fully two yeeres, and died the fourth of his raigne, in Anno 962.

(17) Elfrida, the second wife of King Edgar, was the widow of slaughtered Ethelseld, of whom wee haue said. She was daughter to Ordgarus, and sister to Ordulfe, both of them Dukes of Deuonshire, and the Founders of Taufstoke Abbey in that Countie: a Ladie of pasing great beauty, and as ambitious as faire:
for after the Kings death, shee procured the murder of King Edgar her sonne in law, that her owne sonne

Ethelred might come to the Crowne: and afterwaris to pacifie his and her first husbands ghost, and to stop the peoples speeches of so wicked a fact, shee founded the Abbeyes of Ambresbery & Whorwell, in the Counties of Wiltshire and South-hampton.

His Children.

(18) Edward, the eldest sonne of King Edgar and Queene Ethelseld his first wife, was borne in the fourth yeere of his fathers raigne, and a little before his mothers death, in the yeere of Christ Iesus 962. He was a child disposed to all vertue, notwithstanding great meanes was made by his mother in law for the disin-heriting of him, and the preferment of her owne son to the succession of the Crowne; yet by prouident care taken in the life time of his father, he succeeded him after his death, as right heire both of his kingdome and conditions.

(19) Edmund, the second sonne of King Edgar, and the first of Queene Elfrida his second wife, was borne in the seventh yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of grace 965. He liued but foure yeeres, and died in his infancie, in the twelfth yeere of his fathers raigne, and was honourably enterr'd in the Monaste-rie of Nunnes, at Ramsay in Hampshire, which King Ed- gar had founded.

(20) Ethelred, the third sonne of King Edgar, and the second of Queene Elfrida his second wife, and the last of them both, was borne in the eighth yeere of his fathers raigne, and yeere of saluation 966. He was ver-tuously inclined, beautifull in complexion, and comly of stature; at the death of his father being but seuen yeeres old, and at his brothers murder ten: which deed he sore lamented, to the great discontentment of his mother, who for his aduancement had com-plotted the same, and wherein at those yeeres he vnwillingly succeeded him.

(21) Edgith, the naturall daughter of King Edgar, had to her mother a Lady named Wolhild, the daughter of Wolhelm, the sonne of Byrding, the sonne of Ne- sting, the two latter bearing in their names the memo-rie of their fortunes: the last of them being found in an Eagles nest, by King Elfredas he was on hunting.
This Edgith was a veiled Nunne in the Monastery of Wilton, and according to some Authors, made Abbesse thereof by her father at fifteene yeeres of age, saith her Legend. She died the fifteenth day of Sep- tember, the yeere of her age twenty three; the sixt of her brother King Ethelredas raigne, and of Christ Iesus 984. By all which accounts it is manifest, that she was borne before Edward, and by Master Fox proued, that for him, and not for her, King Edgar did his seuen yeeres penance. She is greatly commended for her chastitie and beauty, which later the somewhat augmented with more curious attire then to her profession was befitting: for which Bishoppe Ethelseld sharply reprov'd her; who answered him roundly, that God regarded the heart more then the garment, and that sins might bee couered as well vnder rags as robes.

This Edgith, as John Capgrave reporteth, after the slaughter of her brother Edward, the holy Archbishop Dunstan would haue aduanced to the Crowne, & inuested her against Ethelred the lawfull heire, had he not by the late experience of Edwards fall, vterly refused that title, which neither belonged to her right, nor was safe for her person to vndertake. Her body was buried at Wilton, in the Monastery and Church of Saint Denisse, which her selfe had caused to bee built.

EDWARD SURNAMED THE MARTYR THE THIRTIE ONE MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, AND DEATH.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Great were the troubles & siftings that presently ensued the death of King Ed- gar, about the election of one of his sons to succede; Queene Elfrida with Al- ferus Duke of Mercia, and many other Nobles combined for young Ethelred, disauowing Prince Edward

as illegitimate, and therefore not reputable for succession: against them and Ethelred stood Dunstan and the Monkes, holding their stances dangerous, & their new-gotten footing vnsecure, if in the nonage of the King, these their opposites should rule all vnder him; whereas Edward was altogether wrought in their mould, whose title they abetted, as being lawfully borne, and begot in the nuptial bed of Queene E- thelseld. Their claimes thus banded amongst these State-men, began to be diuerfly affected among the Commons, and had put the game to the hazard, if the wisedome of Dunstan had not seene to the chafe; for a Councell being assembled to argue their rights, the Archbishop came in with his banner and crosse, and not staying for further debating de iure, did de facto, present Prince Edward for their lawfull Kings, and the assembly consisting most of Clergy-men, persuading peace, drew the approbation of the rest, and so was the Prince admitted and proclaimed their So-ueraigne.

(2) He began his raigne at twelue yeeres of age, in the yeere of Saluation 975, and was loone after by Archbishop Dunstan crowned King at Kingston vpon Thamesis: being the thirtie one Monarch (since Henric) of the Englishmen. His beginning was miserably afflicted with barrennesse of the ground, famine amongst his people, morraine of cattle, and to their further terror, a fearefull Comet appeared:

which men thought to bee signes from heauen, as sent from God, for the finnes committed against the married Clergy, whose cause was much pittied, especially of the Nobles, & whose complaints of wrongs they instantly vrged, that without defects they were expulsed from their ancient possessions; a thing which neither God nor goodmen euer allowed, and was contrary to the prescript rule of Christ, that wils vs to doe, as wee would be done vnto: whereto the Monkes answered, that Christ respected neither the person nor place, but onely them that tooke vp the Crosse of Penance and followed him, as themselves in their single life pretended to doe. But they good men little knew the incumbrances of wiuing; for otherwise they would haue felt, that the condition of the married, was more truly a suffering of the Crosse, and enduring of Penance.

(3) These Church men thus diuided and rent, were diuersly sided as affection did moue, and that not onely of the meaner sort, but euen of the Nobles & great Ones; for the Mercian Duke Alferus fauouring the iust cause of married Priests, destroyed the Monasteries in his Prouince, cast out the Monkes, and restored againe the ancient reuencenes to them & their wiues: contrariwise, in East-Anglia the Priests went to wracke, where the Monkes were maintained by the authority of Edelwin their Duke, who in their quarrell, with the assistance of his brother Alfred, and of Brightmoth Earle of Essex, raised a mighty Army, and stood with that power for their defence.

(4) The fire thus blown from a sparke to a flame, was feared to mount higher, if not quenched in time, and therefore by mediation, armes laid aside, the cause was referred to be heard in Councell, & at Win- chester first the assembly was held, where after long dispute, and much against the Monkes, it was greatly suspected their side had gone down, but that the matter was referred from them to the Roude, placed vp-on the refectorie Wall, where the Councell sate. To this great Oracle S. Dunstan, desired them deuoutely to pray, and to giue diligent care for an answer: who, with as great bounty as they in deuotion made it not fquemish to giue them this aduice; God forbid it should be so, God forbid it should be so (said he,) you indged well once, and to change that againe is not good.

This was authority sufficient to suppress the Priests, who now with their wiues went downe the wind; and indeed too blame they were to suspect this their Iudge, who neuer was heard to giue wrong sentence before: but they vngratified men, thought once more to blow the coale, though therewith they were likely to burne their owne lips; for perswading the people, that this was but a subtile practise of the Monks, in placing behind the wall a man of their owne, who through a truncke vttered those words in the mouth of the Roode; it was therefore instantly desired, that the cause might once more come to scanning.

(5) This lastly was granted, and a great assembly congregated at Cleue in Wilshire, whither repaired the Prelates with most of the States of the land, besides Gentlemen and Commons an innumerable sort.

This Synode being set, and the controuersie propounded, a hote and sharpe disputation ensued, and a while was maintained with many bitter inuectiues, ill becomming such persons: But whether through the weakenesse of the foundation, or the ouer-press of weight, or both, the ioynts of this vpper-loft, wherein the Councell was held, suddainly brake, and downe fell the flore with all the people thereon, whereof many were hurt, and some slaine outright, onely Archbishop Dunstan then President, and mouth for the Monks remained unhurt: for the Post whereon his chaire was set (and not without miracle) stood wholly vntouched.

Thus by this fall, fel the cause of the secular Priests; and the Monkish foundations vnderpropped with more surer pillars, Dunstan vnburdened of many imputations, the peoples affections drawne to the Monks, and the Priests at liberty now to accompany their wiues without any care, though not without care; and all this was wrought by the 'prouidence of Dunstan, and his strange preferuation on the post; no lesse wonderfull then that which with the like truth is related of him, how when a huge beam of a house was suncke out of the frame, and like to ruinate the whole building, with onely making of the signe of the Crosse thereon, with his fingers hee made it returne to his former place: so wonderfully potent was he in such woodden miracles. To which, why should wee not giue credite, since the very Harpe which hee had touched could worke miracles? as when of it selfe it founded melodiously that Hymne, Gaudet in celis anima Sanctorum, &c. Yea sith the blessed virgine Mary her selfe, is said to haue come to solace him with her songs, Cantemus Domino Sicut, &c. For, as for Angels singing familiarly vnto him, and Diuels in shape of dogs, foxes and beares, whipped by him, that was but ordinary; as likewise his making the shee-diuel to roare, when comming to tempt him to dalliance, in shape of a beautifull lassie, hee caught her by the nose with hote burning pincers, and so spoilde a good face. But to leaue those figments wherewith our Monkish stories are stuffed to the deluding of their Readers, and dishonouring of those, whom thereby they thinke to magnifie; let vs looke backe to yong Prince Edward.

(6) Who in all princely parts was an imitator of his Father, and for his modest gentleness worthily fauoured of all men: but as enuy is alwaies the attendant of vertue; so had he them that much maligned his life, namely, the fauourites of Prince Ethelred, whereof Queene Elfrida his mother was chiefe, who lastly betrayed him, and that in this manner.

(7) King Edward for his disport was hunting in a forrest nere vnto the sea, vpon the south-east shore of the County Dorset, and in the Iland Purbeck; not farre off, vpon a small river, stood pleasantly seated a faire and strong Castle called Corfe, where his mother in law Queene Elfrida, with his brother Prince Ethelred, were then therein residing: Edward that euer had bene louing to both, held it a kind office, now being so nere to visite them with his presence, and thereupon either of purpose or chance singled from his attendants, hee secretly stole from them all, and came alone to the castle gate.

(8) The Queene who had long laine in wait for occasions, now tooke this as brought to her hand, and therefore with a face as meaning no guile, shee humbly and cheerefully gaue the King welcome, desiring him to grace her and her sonne with his presence for that night; but hee with thanks refused the offer, as fearing least his company would soone find him missing, and craued onely of his mother a cup of wine, that in his saddle hee might drinke to her and his brother, and so be gone. The cuppe was no sooner at his mouth, then a knife in his backe, which a seruant appointed by this trecherous Queene stroke into him; who feeling himselfe hurt, set spurs to his horse, thinking to escape to his more faithfull company.

(9) But the wound being mortall, and he fainting through losse of much blood, fell from his horse, and one foot entangled in the stirrups, hee was thereby rufully draged vpon and downe through woods and lands, and lastly left dead at Corfe-gate: which hapned the eighteenth day of May, after hee had reigned three yeares and fixe (some say eight) monethes, the yeare of his age sixteene, and of Christ Iesus 979. His body found, was first buried at Warham without all funeral pompe, but after three yeeres by Duke Aserus remoued, and with great celebrity entered in the Minster of Shaftesbury: and for this vntimely death, hee gained the surname of Martyr.

(10) Queene Elfrida sore repenting her cruell and step-motherly fact, to expiate her guilt, and pacifie the crying bloud of her slaine sonne, buik the two said Monasteries of Almsbury and Worwell in the Counties of Wiltshire and Southampton, in which latter she liued with great repentance and penance vntill the day of her death, and in the same lieth her body entered.

These and other the like foundations built vpon the occasion of rapine & blood, howeouer they may shew the sorrowfull repentance of their founders: yet their stones being laide with the simmond of murder, and the morer tempered with blood, haue felt the wrath of him, who by his Prophet hath pronounced, that from the wall the stone shall crie, and the beam out of the timber shall answere it; Woe vnto him that buildeth a towne with blood, and erecteth a City by iniquity.

ETHEL-

ETHELRED COMMONLY CALLED THE VNREADIE, THE TVVO

AND THIRTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS WARS, RAIGNE, WIVES AND ISSVES.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Ethelred the sonne of King Edgar, & brother to King Edward the Martyr, at the age of twelue yeeres entered his gouernment ouer the Englishmen, the yeere of mans saluation, 979, and was the two and thirtieth Monarch since King Hen-gist: he was crowned King

at Kingston vpon Thames the foureteenth of April, being Easter day, by the hands of Dunstan Archbishoppe of Canterbury, who did it much against his will.

(2) He was a man neither forward in action, nor fortunate in proceedings, and therefore commonly called the Vnready: his youth was spent in idleness, feeding his senses with all voluptuous baits, his middle yeeres with a careless gouernment, maintaining ciuill dissensions, and his latter end deservingly in continuall resistance of the bloud-thirsty Danes. With these imputations by writers hee is taxed, though we find no such iust cause in recording his life; but to such extreames are euen great Monarches themselves brought, that their breath and dignity once left and laid downe, they are subiect to the censures of euery affectionate and malignant reporter. And that this King lay lyable to such mens humors, the working of Dunstan euer against him, is a sufficient witness, who not onely did refuse to act his Coronation, but would haue preferred Lady Edgith a bastard before him to the Crown, as we haue said. And besides the generall quarrell of the Monks and married Priests, to which later himselfe and his Abettors were better inclined, his iust indignation conceiued against the Bishop of Rochester, and that not pacified without the Bishops submission and payment of money, was cause enough for those Monkish Writers to brand the Lords Anointed with their marks of infamie, vnto whom they impute the miseries of those times, and the destruction of the English by the intruding Danes.

(3) These Danes had kept quiet euer since the disliked raigne of King Edwy, without any notable attempts, for the space of twenty two yeeres: but now perceiving the hearts of the subiects to bee drawn from their Soueraigne, they thought it a sufficient occasion to forward their intendments; and omitting no time, in the second of his raigne with seuen ships they arriued vpon the coast of Kent, spoiling the Country; but most especially the Iland Thanet, from whence they did great hurt likewise to the towne of Southampton.

The English led in dislike of young Ethelreds gouernment, were the rather drawne to impute these and other aduersities to this vnfortunate Prince, by reason of a prediction of Dunstan, who had prophesied, That they should not be free from blood and sword, till there came a people of an vknowne tongue, that should bring them to liualdome: and that opinion was skrewed deeper into their fearefull conceit, by a cloud appearing of bloud and fire, immediately after his vnaffected Coronation.

(4) The next yeere, those rousing Danes entred the British Seas, and coasting to Cornwall destroyed there the Abbey of Saint Patrick, Portland in Devonshire, and many other places vpon those shores, the like was done vnto Cheshire by the Norway-Pirates, which broke into those parts in the same yeare.

(5) And these calamities were seconded with others as fearefull, for in the yeare 982. the City London was miserably destroyed and defaced by fire, whose beauty then chiefly extended from Ludgate westward; for, that within the walles, and where the heart of the City is now, was then neither beautiful, nor orderly built; what time also raged a sickness till then unknowne in England, which was a strong burning fever, and bloody fluxe, as also scarcity of victuals, and murraine among cattle. This hand of God thus correcting the finnes of all, was received as sent for the offences of some few, and wholly imputed to the King and his Ralliers; Dunstan still prophesying further woes to the land, when himselfe should be dead.

(6) The Danes hereupon more boldly assaulted each shore, and in so many places at once, that the English were to fecke, where first to withstand. In the West they were encountered by Goda Earle of Devonshire, as faith Simon Dunelmensis, by whom they were overthrown, though with the losse of his life, as also of Stermolda man of great esteeme and valour in those parts, who served there vnder him.

(7) In the East their leaders Tuftine and Guthmond warred with better success; for at Malden in Essex they gaue Brightnod the Earle, a great and bloody battaile, wherein himselfe with most of his people were slaine. The Danes thus prospering, more boldly went forward; and where they set their tallants, there they held fast, and lay on the land like vnto Grasshoppers. These euils King Ethelred could not redresse, his strengthes being small, and his subiects affections lesse; therefore calling to Counsell his Statesmen & Peeres, demanded their aduice what was best to be done. Some few of these proffered the King their assistance, but more of them perswaded vnto a composition, whereof Siricius Archbishop of Cantebury was chiefe; and in fine, ten thousand pounds paid to the Danes for their departure.

(8) This golden Mine once entered, was more eagerly digged into, by these still-thirsting Danes, who finding the branch so beneficiall at first, hoped the veine in following, would proue farre more bountifull, and therefore regardless of promise, the next yeere prepared themselves againe for England, and with a great fleet dispatched to sea: the newes whereof strucke such terror into the English hearts, that despairing of hope, they accounted themselves the bond-slaves of misery: The King therefore with much adoe prepared a Nauie, whereof hee made Elfrick Earle of Mercia Admirall; who setting from London vnto the seas, had power sufficient to put backe the enemy: but hee once a traitor could neuer proue true; for, hauing been banished, forgiven, and now taken into fauour, found meanes to be false, and to betray his charge; and sending the enemy intelligence of his power and intents, gaue the way to their escape; and another fleet of Danes encountering with the Kings, at first hee faintly and faintly fought against; and lastly, turned to their side; through which treason many Englishmen died, and the Kings Fleet and power was greatly weakened; but he escaping due punishment himselfe, left his sonne to answer the fault, whose eyes King Ethelred caused to be put out.

(9) About which time also another Danish Fleet entering Humber, wasted the countries of Yorkeshire and Lindsey: against these King Ethelred sent his power, vnder the charge of three valiant but trecherous Captaines, namely, Frena, Godwin and Frederic; for the battle but begun, these with their followers fled away, which was the occasion of a great overthrow of the English; notwithstanding the country people notable to digest their intollerable dealings, fell vpon the Danes, flew some, and chased the rest. At what time also other of the Danes with ninety foure ships sailed vp the riuer Thames, and laid their siege against London, giuing it a great assault; but the Citizens thereof so manfully defended themselves, that they chased the Danes thence to their shame and great losse: yet fell they so foule vpon Essex, Kent, Suffex, and Hampshire, that the King was enforced to compound a peace, with the payment of sixteene thousand pounds: for confirmation whereof, Ethelred sent to Southampton for Anlaf these Norwegians King, and honourably entertained him at Andener, where the same time he received Baptisme, King Ethelred taking him at the Font for his God-sonne, and with great gifts returned into Denmarke without any further harme done to the English.

(10) But God and destiny suffering it, (that would haue the Saxons to fall before the Danes, as formerly the Brittaines had done before them) no covenant could be so surely made, but was slackly in this performed; for albeit this Anlaf honourably kept both faith and promise, yet others of his Country continued their inuasions, and as an other Hydra shewed their still-reuiuing heads.

(11) For the nineteenth yeare of King Ethelreds most troublefome raigne, and of our saluation 997, the Danes with a great fleet sailed about Cornwall, and came into the mouth of Seuern, robbing, as they went, Devonshire, Cornwall, and South-Wales; and marching further into the Continent, consumed Lydford, and the Abby of Saint Oswald at Essingfocke, thence passing through Dorsetshire with fire & sword, found not a man in the way to resist them, and wintering in the wight liued by spoiles gotten in Hampshire and Suffex.

(12) The next Spring they put into the mouth of Thames, and so by the riuer Medway arrived at Rochester: either the Kentish with their strengthes repaired, but vnfortunately fought, and left the field to the Danes, who shortly after hoisted their sailes, & with a merry gale arrived in Normandy.

(13) King Ethelred thus rid of these vnlooked for guests, sought to remove those leigers that lay in Cumberland, whither hee repaired, and with sore warre wasted the Country, before whose sword the Danes were not able to stand; which somewhat encouraged the spirits of his people, and bettered their conceits towards him: but farre this sunne past without a cloud, nor was his successe entailed to be fortunate.

(14) For the next yeare, those Danes that departed from Kent, came now from Normandy with their full sailes, and landing in Exmouth, their first and greatest fury was against the City of Exeter, which when they fiercely besieged, they were so valiantly beaten by the Citizens, as that enraged about measure with the iniquity of that repulse, they thence as a sodaine flood bare downe all that stood in their way; and then plainly beganne to appeare the rise of the Danes, which euery where lorded it, where they had to doe, and the fall of the Saxons, whose ouertopped Monarchy, and weak wailes now wanted props to hold vp the weights; for the Captains of the English (faith Higden) wanting lore in deeds of Arms, their direction neuer prospered; if ships were made they neuer sped well, but were either chased of the enemy, or destroyed by tempest: if the Nobles euer assembled to consult of the State, that time was rather spent in whetting the spleene each against other, then jointly agreeing how to redresse their present danger, or to repress the common enemy: for most of the Nobles were allied into the Danish bloud, whereby not only the secret of those consultations were reuealed, but being employed in seruice, many of them reuolted to the enemy. The Clergy as backward as any, denied the King their assistance, pleading their exemptions from warre, and priuilege of the Church, when the land lay bleeding and deploing for helpe, and scandalized all his other proceedings for demanding their aide: to these were ioined scarcity, hunger and robberies. These miseries caused the summes of their compositions to be augmented, whose last was sixteene thousand, now twenty thousand, immediately twenty four, then thirty, and lastly, forty thousand pounds, vntill the land was emptied of all the coine; the Kingdome of her glory; the Nobles of courage; the Com-

Commons of their content, and the Soueraigne of his wroated respect and obsequence.

(15) The Danes thus prevailing, did not a little glory in their fortunes, and grieved the poore English, whose seruice they employed to eare and till the ground, whilst themselves were idle, & ate the fruit of their paines, abusing the wives and daughters of their hosts where they lay, and yet in euery place for feare and reuerence were called the Lord-Danes, (which afterwards became a word of derision to such sturdy and lazy lozels) so that the like daies of miserie the land neuer felt. To redresse which, the careful King Ethelred was farre too weak, and therefore intending to doe that by policy, which he could not by strength, he deuised a desperate stratagem that proued the destruction of the Saxons roayall bloud, and conquest of the land to another nation.

(16) For seeking to disburden the Realme of these deuouring Danes, which by open force hee could no waies doe; he attempted in a bloody massacre to destroy them, giuing a secret commission vnto euery City within his dominions, that at an appointed time they should set vpon, and kill all the Danes; the day was the thirteenth of November, being the festiual of S. Brictus, the yeare of Christ lesus 1002, and presently after his marriage with Emma, the flower of Normandy, in confidence of which affinity, hee presumed to do what he did. His command was accordingly performed, and with such rigour, that in Oxford the fearefull Danes for refuge tooke into the Church of S. Erideswyd, as into a Sanctuary of venerable antiquity and priuiledge among ancient Kings; but they in fury regarding neither place nor person, let the Church on fire, wherein were burned a great sort of those Danes with many rich ornaments, and the Library thereof vtterly defaced. At which time (if Malmesbury lay true) King Ethelred himself was in that City, and had summoned a Parliament both of Danes and English, with which euen the King was much grieved: and therefore at his very great cost beautifully repaired the Church, and all the losses accruing by the fire, endowing it with large priuiledges and donations, as appeareth by his owne Charter, mentioning the tenour of that Danish slaughter.

In this massacre, Lady Gunhild, sister to Swaine King of Denmarke, a great and continual friend to the English, with her husband and sonne, together were slaughtered, although the lay in hostage vpon conditions of peace, whose husbands name was Palingus (faith Malmesbury) an Earle of great might, & both of them Christians.

(17) Newes brought into Denmarke of this suddaine stratagem, no neede there was to urge them to reuenge, or to adde more fuel vnto that ouer kindled fire; for preparation being made, the yeere ensuing, Swaine with a great Nauy landed in the West, spoiled the Country, and gaue assault to the City of Exeter, which by the treachery of one Hugh a Norman (whom in the fauour of the Queen, King Ethelred had made Gouverneur of that City) he razed and leuelled with the ground, all along from the Eastgate to the West.

This treason and stirres great of themselves, but made much more ruffill in the relating, caused Ethelred presently to muster his men; ouer whom hee made Earle Edrik (for his countenances surname Stretton) his Generall, who bare a braue shew till it came to the path, and day of battle: but then to couer his treason, he fained himselfe sicke, and left his souldiers to shift as they could. The Danes hereupon rifled Wilton, and passing forward tooke Salisbury in their way, to which they were as welcome as water into ships; but hearing that the King himselfe in person was preparing to giue them battle, they left the land, and tooke againe to sea.

(18) The next yeare following, (which was the twenty foure of King Ethelreds raigne, and of grace, one thousand and foure,) King Swaine with a mighty fleet of ships arrived vpon the coasts of Norfolk, where landing his men, hee made spoile of all before him, and coming to Norwich lacked the City, with great slaughter of the Citizens; then tooke he Thetford, and set it on fire, notwithstanding hee had entred a truce with them: but for want of victuall which then was scarce in the land, he returned to sea, and so into Denmarke.

(19) Where making preparation for another expedition, increased his Nauie and number of men, and the next Spring arrived at Sandwich, miserably desolating the Countries along the sea side, neuer staying in any certain place; but to prevent the Kings Forces roued from coast to coast, euer carrying to their ships their booties and prayes, and to encrease the calamitie, the haruest was neglected, and in many places spoiled, both for the want of labourers, & by the feet of the souldiers which lay in field all that season, who from place to place trauailed, although in vaine.

Towards the Winter the Danes tooke into the Ile of Wight, and in the deepest time thereof, passed through Hampshire, into Barkeshire, vnto Reading, Wallingford, Colecy, and Easington, making clean worke whereouer they came, for that which they could not carry they consumed with fire, with triumphes euer returning to their ships.

(20) The King lying in Shrewsbury, vnable to resist, called to him his Councell, to consult what was best to be done; whereof Edrik was a principall, and in so high esteeme with the King, that he created him Duke of Mercia, and gaue him his daughter Egith in marriage: notwithstanding, these gluts of fauours wrought only the digestion of fallhood in him, who could taft nothing vnlesse it was saued with treason. This man, then the Kings only Achitophel, perswaded him to pay thirty thousand pounds to the Danes for their peace, whereof no doubt some fell into his owne Coffers.

(21) This intollerable imposition extorted of the Subiects especially at that time when the land was least able, made many suspect great matters against Edrik, and some did not feare to accuse him to his face, to be the onely causer of this payment; charging him as ouer-affectionated to the Danes, and to haue bewrayed the Kings secrets and designs vnto them: but hee seated in the heart of his Soueraigne, rubd off this staine with a few fawnings, and a faire shew, being a man in wit subtile, in speech eloquent, and for riches inferior to none, (as those that could turne euen great streames aside) so that these supposals of treasons (as proceeding from enuy to him for his good seruices) wanne him greater trust, and sent he was Ambassador to the Danes to mediate for peace: where revealing the weakness of the land, and the feares which the English conceived of a conquest, treacherously diffwaded them from giuing eare to any motiues of Truce.

(22) The State of the land thus standing, or rather hanging at suspence, King Ethelred gaue order, that out of euery three hundred and ten hides of land a shippe should bee built, and of euery eight hides a complete Armour furnished. These meeting at Sandwich, and furnished with souldiers, made shew of such resistance, as had not bene scene, although the euent was nothing but a shew. For Wilmot a Noble man of Suffex (banished for some offence by King Ethelred) with twenty Sailes roued vpon the coasts, and by Piracy did much hurt among the English Marchants: wherefore Brittrik the brother of Edrik to winne himselfe honour, got the Kings consent to pursue this grand-Pirate, with fourescore saile of the foresaid ships, threatening to bring in Wilmot either dead or aliue: but his sailes being spread vnder a faire wind, a violent tempest sodainly arose, and outrageously droue his shippes vpon shore, where distressed and torne, their beaten hulls lay vnable to recover themselves, or the Sea: Wilmot taking aduantage of this present mishap, fell fiercely vpon them, and after much slaughter of their their weather-beaten warders, set them all on fire; so that all this preparation proued not onely vaine, but also very hurtfull.

(23) At the receipt of the said thirty thousand pounds, the Danes departed, in semblance satisfied, and friends with the English, but how long that lasted the sequel shewed: for the next harvest, and yeere of saluation 1009, a great fleet of their ships strongly appointed landed at Sandwich, vnder the conduct of three Danish Princes, Turkil, Henning, and Anlaf: these coming to Canterbury, were compounded with by the Citizens, paying a thousand pounds for their departure, who thence in the night, Suffex and Hampshire made hauoke of all.

King Ethelred seeing no truth in their promises, nor quietnesse in State, his lande thus exhausted of prouision and coine, thought it best to adventure once for all, and to commit his cause vnto God, by the fortune of warre. To which end hee gathered his power, and comming vnlooked for, when the enemy was altogether vnprepared, and taken at disadvantage, he had made an end of the quarrell if wicked Edrick had not perswaded him from fight, and put him into a causellse feare with his forged tales. The Danes thus escaping returned to Kent, and the winter following lodged their ships in the river Thames, whence often they gaue affaires for London, though to little purpose.

(24) Then took they through the Chiltern woods vnto Oxford, which they fired, and in their returne waited all the countreys on both sides of Thames, but hearing that London was prepared against them, they crossed ouer at Stanes, passing through Surrey into Kent, where they fell to amending their ships, and thence sailing about the coasts of Suffolke, tooke Ipswich, and pitched their battle vpon Rigmer, against Wick (Governour of Norfolke) and his English, vpon the fift of May, where they wonne the day with a great slaughter made of the Suffolke, Norfolke, and Cambridge-shire men, and after harried those Countreys with the borders of Lincolne and Huntington-shires, burning Thetford and Cambridge, and rifling all the Abbies and Churches that stood in their way, and then through Essex returned vnto their ships.

(25) Neither rested they there long in quiet, ere, as people wholly deuoted to spoile, they brake into Buckingham, Bedford, and Northampton-shires, the chief Towne of which last, they fet on fire after much slaughter of the Inhabitants; and thence entring Wiltshire depopulated all before them, which was the leauenth Shire in number that they had laid wast like a solitude.

(26) And now not satisfied with spoil nor bloud-spilling, they prepare a new expedition for Canterbury, and in September beleaguered the Citie, which by treason of a Church-man they wonne, tooke Elphegus the Arch-Bishop, and slew nine hundred Monks and men of Religion, besides many Citizens, without all mercy: for they tithed the captiue multitudes after an inueterd order, slaying all by nines, and reseruing onely the tenth to liue; so that of all the Monkes in the towne there were but foure saved, and of the lay people foure thousand eight hundred, by which account M. Lambert collecteth that there died in this massacre forty three thousand and two hundred persons.

The Archbishop Elphegus, for that he refused to charge his Tenants with three thousand pounds to pay for his ranfome, they most cruelly stoned to death at Greenwich the nineteenth of April following.

Turkillus the Leader of these murtherers, tooke into his possession all Northfolke and Suffolke, ouer whom he tyrannized in most savage maner. The rest compounding with the English for eight thousand pound forsook a while quiet among them.

(27) But King Swaine hearing of the dissensions, and weaknesse of the land, in the yeare of Grace, 1013, with a great number of ships arriued in the mouth of Humber, and entring Trent landed at Gainsborough, whose terror stroke so deepe into the Northumbrians conceits, that they with them of Lyndsey yeelded themselves to the yoke of his subiection, so that now ouer all the North from Watlingstreet he reigned sole King, and exacted pledges from them for their further obedience. From the North hee sought to spread his wings further into the South, and leauing his sonne Canute to take charge of his shippes, and new conquered countreys, sped himselfe through Mercia to Oxford and Winchester, bringing all vnder the power of his command: with which gales of his fortunes, hee was so puffed vp, that thinking nothing vnpossible for him and his Danes to doe, in the heat of his courage he came vnto London, and presently begit the walles with a frait siege.

(28) In the City lay vnfortunate King Ethelred, who (as Simon Monke of Durham reporteth) had with him, and vnder his pay Turkillus the Danish Prince before spoken of, and forty five Danish ships to defend the coasts. King Swaine at his first comming fiercely assaulted the City, hoping his fortunes would haue proued as before; but the presence of the King, and London the eye of the land, made the Citizens aboue measure courageous, who beat the Danes from their walles, and falling forth of the Gates, slew them on heapes, so that Swaine himselfe was in great danger, had hee not desperately runne through the midst of his enemies, and by flight escaped their swords; marching both day and night in great feare vntill hee had entred Bath, where Ethelmer Earle of Deuonshire with his Westerne people submitted themselves vnto him. But this last ouerthrow, and want of victuals, caused him after he had receiued a certaine summe of money, to hasten into Denmarke, mingling with more power, and better advantage to prosecute the quarrell.

(29) Not long it was ere he returned, and immediately was met by the English, where betwixt them was stricke a fierce battaile, which had been with good successe, had not the treasons of some hindered it, in turning to the Danes. King Ethelred therefore seeing himselfe, and land betrayed in this manner, to those few true English that were left, he said this speech as followeth.

(30) If there wanted in me a fatherly care, either for the defence of the Kingdome, or administration of iustice in the common wealth, or in you, the courage of Souldiers for the defence of your native Country; then truly silent would I bee for euer, and beare these calamities with a more dejected mind: but as the case stands (be it as it is) I for my part am resolved to rush into the midst of the enemy, and to lose my life for my Kingdome and Crowne. And you (I am sure) hold it a worthy death that is purchased for the liberties of your selues and kindred; and therein I pray you let vs all die, for I see both God and destiny against vs, and the ruine of the English nation brought almost to the last period; for wee are overcome not by weapons and hostile warre, but by treason and domestick fallhood; our Navy betrayed into the Danes hands, our battaile weakened by the revolt of our Captaines, our designs betrayed to them by our owne Counsellors, and they also enforcing compositions of dishonourable peace, I my selfe disesteemed, and in scorn termed Ethelred the vnready; your valour and loialties betrayed by your owne leaders, and all our poverty yeerely augmented by the payment of their Dane-gilt, which how to redresse God onely knoweth, and wee are to seeke; for if we pay money for peace, yea, and that confirmed by oth, these enemies soone breake it, as a people that neither regard God nor man, contrary to equity and the lawes of warre, or of nations: and so farre off is all hope of better successe, as we haue cause

"to feare the losse of our Kingdom, and you the extinct of the English nations renowne; therefore seeing the enemies are at hand, and their hands at our throats; let vs by foresight and counsell saue our owne liues, or else by courage heare our swords in their bowels: either of which I am willing to enter into, to secure our estate and nation from an irrecoverable ruine.

(31) This lamentable Oration deliuered from the passions of a iustly-penitue King, touched the hearers to the heartes, and almost distracted their afflicted minds: to abide battaile they saw it was bootlesse, the treason of their leaders so many times defeating their victories, to yeeld themselves to the enemy, would but beginne their seruitude and misery, and to flee before them, their eternall ignominy and reproch.

Thus their opinions were canauled, but nothing put in practice, whereas meane while the Danes went forward with victories, and had got the most part of the land, yea and London also by submission; wherewith vnfortunate Ethelred more and more dejected, sent his wife Emma with his two sonnes by her, vnto her brother Richard Duke of Normandy, and for his owne safest refuge committed himselfe vnto Turkil the Dane, in whose shippes he remained a while at Greenewich, and from thence went into the Isle of Wight, where he abode most part of the winter, and thence sailed into Normandy to his wife and brother, leauing the Danes lording it in his realm.

(32) These were the daies of Englands mourning, hee being vnable to maintaine her defenders, and yet enforced to nourish and cherish her deuourers: for the Danes in two factions most cruelly afflicted the land like two milstones crushing & grinding the grain. Swaine as an absolute King, extorted of the English both victuals and pay for his souldiers; and Turkil on the other side, in defence of the English, commanded the like for his ships and men; so that the Danes had all, and the English maintained. Neither were churches free from their spoils, (whom other Conquerors haue held most impious to violate,) but either suffered the flames of their consuming fire, or were forced to purchase their standings with great summes of money. Such composition King Swaine demanded for the preferuacion of S. Edmunds Monastery in Suffolke, which becaue the Inhabitants refused to pay, he threatened spoile both to the place, & to the Martyrs bones there entred; in the midst of which iolity (saith Houeden) he suddenly cried out that he was stricken by S. Edmund with a sword, being then in the midst of his Nobles, and no man seeing from whose hand it came; and so with great horrour and torment, three daies after vpon the third of February ended his life at Thetford (others say at Gainsborough;) but with his death died not the title of the Danes, who immediately aduanced Canute his sonne for their King.

(33) The English that liked nothing lesse then bondage, especially vnder such tyrannizing intruders, thought now or neuer the time to shake off the yoke; and therefore with great ioy and hast sent into Normandy for their native King. Ethelred now not vnready for the recouering of his right, foreflew no meane either to hasten or strengthen the enterprise, and hauing the assistance of his brother of Normandy, in the Lent following landed in England, vnto whom resorted the people from all parts, accounting it their greatest ioy to see the face of their King.

(34) Canute then at Gainsborough, Souldier-like mustered and managed his men, and holding it good policie to keepe that by bounty, which his father had got by tyranny, made no spare to purchase the hearts of the English, by which meane those of Lyndsey became his Creatures, with an agreement to find him both horse and men against their owne King and Country.

Ethelred therefore now raging for reuenge, with a mighty host entered Lyndsey, where hee burnt all the Country, and put the inhabitants to the sword. Canute not able to resist this puissant Army, held the sea more safe for him, then the land; and entring Humber, sailed to Sandwich, where being stricken at the miseries of these his confederates, requited King Ethelred's friends with the like, and commanded that those pledges which had beene deliuered by the Nobles vnto his Father, should haue their noses slit, and their hands cut off, which cruelty acted, hee failed to Denmarke, as hopelesse of any good issue in England.

(35) But Turkil the Dane, retained (as we said) into King Ethelred's pay, seeing successe so suddenly altered, fore repented him of his revolt from the Danes, and knowing now the time to recouer his reputation, with nine of his shippes sailed into Denmarke, instantly importuning Canute to address againe for England, allading the feares and weaknesse of the people, the beauty and fertility of the land, an Eden, in respect of their owne barren feat, and (which did most moue) himselfe would asist, when the English least thought it: with these and the like hee spurred him on, who of himselfe was forward in a full curriere.

Canute therefore with the aide of his brother Harold, rigged forth a Naue of two hundred saile, all furnished with souldiers and abilliments of warre, whose terror landed in England before him, and his power by report made greater then it was, and to encrease the terror of this fearefull enemy, the sea with a spring-tide brake into this land, and destroyed both townes and many inhabitants, a signe foreshewing (as was thought) the successe of that fleet, borne hitherward vpon those waues; and to encrease the English miseries, thirty thousand pound was then collected by way of Tribute to pay the Danish auxiliary Naue lying before Greenewich. The States also conuening in a grand Councell at Oxford to determine vpon the great affaires of the Kingdom, were diuided into factions, and two Noblemen of the Danes there murdered by practice of Edrick the Traitor. These (I say) were accounted ominous amongst the English, that made each mole-hill to seeme a mountaine, and euery shadow the shew of an enemy.

(36) In the meane while Canute had landed at Sandwich, and given a great ouerthrow to the English; entred Kent, and by his sword had made way through the Countreys of Dorset, Somerset, and Wilton.

Ethelred lying dangerously sicke at Colham, the managing of these warres was transferred to Prince Edmund his sonne, who preparing to meete the enemy with his Army in the field, had suddenly notice that Edrick his brother in law ment to betray him into his enemies hands; which newes stricke a great astonishment vnto his heart, and caused him to reitrait his host into a place of security, wherby Edrick perceiving his trecherous purposes were disclosed, gaue more open prooffe of his intentions, flying to the enemy with forty of the Kings shippes; whereupon all the west Countreys submitted themselves vnto Canute.

(37) By this time King Ethelred had recouered his sicknesse, and minding reuenge on his most wicked sonne Edrick, with purpose to trie his last wicketunes by hazard of fight, summoned all his forces to meete him at a certaine day and place; where being assembled, he was instantly warned not to giue battaile, for that his owne subjects ment to betray him.

King Ethelred euer vnfortunate in this, to find treasons amongst them that ought him most trust, withdrew himselfe to London, whose seruice against the Danes he had lately seene, and therefore accounted his person most sure in their walles. Prince Edmund with his power posted ouer Humber, where obtaining Earle Vred to side in his quarrell, entred by vntimely death in the warres of the Danes, raging then most extremely, which was the thirthe thord of his Fathers raigne, and of Christs Natiuitie 1011.

(43) Egbert, the second sonne of King Ethelred, and Queene Elgina his first wife, seemeth to haue bene borne two yeeres after his brother Ethelstan, in the tenth yeere of his Fathers raigne, and yeere of our Lord 988, and to haue deceased in the very prime of his youth before the death of his father, or of his elder brother, and before hee had done any thing in his life worthy of remembrance after his death.

(44) Edmund, the third sonne of King Ethelred & Queene Elgina his first wife, was borne in the eleuenth yeere of his fathers raigne, and of Grace 989 and of all his fathers Children proued to be the onely man that set his helping hand to the redresse of the estate of his Country distressed by the miserable oppressions of the Danes, which hee pursued with such exceeding toile, and restlesse hazards of his body, as he was therefore named Iron-side, and when hee had followed those warres with great courage the space of seuentene yeeres vnder his Father, being come to twenty fouen of his owne age, hee succeeded him in his Kingdome and troubles, as presently shall be shewed.

(45) Edred, the fourth sonne of King Ethelred, and of Queene Elgina his first wife, was born about the foureteenth yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of Grace 992. His name is continually set downe, as a witness in the testees of his fathers Charters, vntill the thirthe fift yeere of his raigne, by which it appeareth that hee liued vnto the two and twentieth yeere of his owne age, although I find no mention of him, or of any thing done by him in any of our histories, and it seemeth he died at that time, because his name is left out of the Charters after that yeere.

(46) Edwy, the fift sonne of King Ethelred, and Queene Elgina his first wife, suruiued his father and all his brethren, and liued in the raigne of Cannut the Dane, who being iealous of his new-gotten estate, and fearefull of the dangers that might accrew vnto him by this Edwy, and such others of the English blood roiall, practised to haue him murdered, which was accordingly done by them, whom hee most fauoured, and least suspected, the yeere of our saluation, 1017.

(47) Edgar, the sixt sonne of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgina his first wife, was borne about the twentieth yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of our Lord God nine hundred ninctie and eight. He seemeth by the Testees of his fathers Charters, to haue bene liuing in the one and twentieth of his raigne, but being no more found in any of them after, may be supposed by all coniectures, to haue died in, or about the same yeere, being but the eleuenth after his owne birth, and the seuenth before his fathers death.

(48) The eldest daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgina his first wife, although her name bee not to bee found in any writer of those times, appeareth notwithstanding, to be married to one Ethelstan, a Noble man of England, who was the principall Commander of Cambridge-shire men, at the great battle fought betweene them and the Danes, wherein the English-men had the ouerthrow; and this sonne in law of King Ethelred, with the rest of the chiefe Leaders, were slaine in the yeere of Christs Natiuitie 1010, being the two and thirtieth of his father in lawes raigne.

(49) Edgith, the second daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgina his first wife, was married to Edrik Duke of Mercia, who for his courteousnesse in getting was surnamed Streathstone: This Edrik was the sonne of one Egelrik surnamed Leofwin, an elder brother to Egelmere the grandfather of Goodwin Duke of the West-Saxons; and being but meanelly borne, was thus highly aduanced by this King; notwithstanding he

he was euer a traitor to his Countre, and a fauourer of the Danes, betraying both him, and King Edmund his sonne to King Cannut, that he thereby might gette new preferments by him, who worthily rewarded him as a traitor and put him to death.

(50) Elfsine, the third daughter of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgina his first wife, was the second wife of Vred surnamed the Bold, sonne of Earle Waldefe the elder, Earle of Northumberland, by whom shee had one onely child, a daughter, named Alagith, married to a Noble-man called Maldred, the sonne of Cinan; shee was mother of Coppatricke, who was Earle of Northumberland in the time of William the Conquerour, and forced by his displeasure to fly into Scotland, where hee abode and was ancestor to the Earles of Dunbar and of March in that Countre.

(51) Gode, the fourth and youngest daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgina his first wife, was first married to one Walter de Maigne a Noble-man of Normandy, greatly fauoured by King Edward her brother, who liued not long after the marriage, and left issue by her a sonne named Rodulfe, whom King Edward his vncle created Earle of Hereford. This Earle Rodulfe, died the one and twentieth of December, in the thirteenth yeere of his vnclcs raigne, and was buried at Peterborough; leaving issue a young sonne named Harald, created afterwards by King William the Conqueror, Baron of Sudeley in the Countie of Gloucester, and Ancestor to the Barons of that place succeeding, and of the Lord Chandois of Sudeley now being. This Lady Gode, after the decease of the said Water de Maigne, was remarried to Euface the elder,

Earle of Bulbigne in Picardy, a man of great valour in those parts of France, and a most faithfull friend to King Edward her brother; which Earle was grand-father to Godfrey of Bulbigne, King of Ierusalem; albeit it seemeth he had no issue by this Lady.

(52) Edward, the seuenth sonne of King Ethelred, and his first by Queene Emme his second wife, was borne at Islupe in the Countie of Oxford, and brought vp in France all the time of his youth; with his vnclc Richard the third of that name, Duke of Normandy, mistrusting his safety in England vnder King Cannut the Dane, although hee had married his mother; but hee found the time more dangerous by the vlage of his brother Elfred, at his being heere in the raigne of King Harald (sonne of the Dane). Notwithstanding hee returned home, when Hardiknut the other sonne (being his halfe brother) was King, and was honourably receiued and entertained by him, and after his death succeeded him in the Kingdom of England.

CHAPTER XLV.

Edmund, the third sonne of King Ethelred, and the eldest liuing at his Fathers death, succeeded him both in his dominions, & in his troubled estate against the Danes; entering his gouernement in the moneth of April, and crowned at Kingston vp on Thamesis, by Liuingus Archbishop of Canterbury, the yeere of mans saluation 1016. Notwithstanding, a great part of the English, considering the pusill-fance of the Danes, both feared and fauoured Cannut, especially, a great part of the Clergy, who at Southampton ordained him their King, swearing to him the fealty of true subiection; but the Londoners stood most firme to Prince Edmund, and were principall Actors for his election.

ged the Citie before the death of King Ethelred, caused his ships now to be towed, and drawne vp the Thames vnto the west side of the bridge, and from the river with a deepe and large Trench encompassed the City, shutting vp all entrance or egress of any: but the Citizens manfully stood in resistance, whereto the comming of their new King for their succour, did not a little encourage them, and daunted the Danes, who now thought it best to breake vp their siege and be gone: and the rather (saith the Author of Encomium Emmae) for that King Edmund sent Canute a peremptory challenge of single combat, which he neither accepted, nor yet staied the siege to trie his chance; but waying his anchors failed along the Coast to the Ile of Sheepie, where he wintred with his Naue and men.

(3) But loth to lose opportunity, when time serued for warres, on the fodeine he assailed the west of England, and brought much of those parts vnder his command: to meet whom the restlesse Ironside prepared, and with such small power as his leasure would admit to leaue, he halted into Dorsetshire, where Canute was forwarding his owne fortunes, and at Penham neere Gillingham, each met other in the field, wherein a fore battaile was fought, and bloody to the Danes, where many of them were put to the sword, and the rest to flight.

(4) Canute immediately tooke into Winchester, to secure himselfe from danger, and the rest elcaped towards Salisbury, and there begit the Citie with a strait siege. King Edmund as ready to faue, as they to destroy, made presently thitherward with his small and ouercured company, whom Canute, waiting for aduantage, followed with a great host, and in Worcestershire, at a place called Sherston, in the fight of his enemy pitched his battaile. To the aide of Edmund came many of the English, so that his Army was greatly encreased, and their courages inhaunted, which made the Danish souldiers somewhat droope.

(5) Notwithstanding, vpon the twentieth of June, 1016. their battailes ioined, and with equall fortune continued all the day, vntill the night constrained them to part.

(6) But their blood not cold, the next day they buckled together againe with no lesse courage then before, till at length the Danes were going down, & the English in great forwardnes of victory: which when the Traitor Edrik perceived, he cut off the head of a souldier, whose name was Osmear, like vnto King Edmund both in haire and countenance, and shaking his bloody sword with the halfe-galping head, cried vnto the host of the English: Flie yee wretches, flie, and get away for your King is slaine, behold here is his head, therefore seeke now to saue your owne liues.

(7) But Edmund hauing present notice of this treacherous stratageme, and seeing his men ready to giue ouer the fight, hastened himselfe where he might be best seene, encouraging his Army to stand to it like true Englishmen, and posting from ranke to ranke, both performed the parts of a wise General, and vnderwent the dangers of the meanest souldier: his men seeing his presence, & the apparant treachery of Duke Edrik, bent their bows against the traitour, and had shot him to death, had he not presently auoided to the enemy: but the night approaching, parted againe the battaile of this second day: Duke Edrik excusing his fact, as being meerely mistaken in the countenance of the man, and thirsting to faue the blood of the English, was taken againe into fauour, and bare himselfe outwardly faire for his Country.

(8) The third day appearing, both the Armies prepared for battaile, but yet stood still without any attempt, onely refreshing their wearied, and almost tired bodies, and burying the dead slaine in the two daies fights before.

(9) The night following, Canute in great silence brake vp his Campe, and marched very fast towards London, against whose Citizens he carried great spleene, and most earnestly desired the conquest of the Citie, which in a fort was still besieged by the Danish ships.

(10) The Centinels the next morning certified King Edmund (who was addressing himselfe for the battaile) of the luddaine departure of his enemies, whereupon he was ready to prevent their designs, followed them by tract euen vnto London: where with small adoe, hee removed their siege, and entered the City in manner of triumph. The Danes thus discomfited, great hope was conceiued, that these faire proceedings would haue a prosperous end.

(11) Edmund, therefore following the aduantage of their discouragements, two dayes after at Brentford bad them their battaile, and that with their great ouerthrow, notwithstanding, in passing the Thames at the same place, he lost many of his men, who were drowned before they could recouer the shore: vpon which losse the Traitor Edrik plaied, who earlt had much feared the downfall of the Danes. For hereupon hee perfwaded his brother in law King Edmund to come to truce with Canute, which as he confidently affirmed, should be to the great benefite and contentment of Edmund: Canute himselfe so plotting it, that by his meanes hee might continue his hopes, and bring his enemy into his danger.

(12) The affaires thus standing, King Edmund returned into the West, and Canute with spoiles vnto his shippes that were in Medway, not far from Rochester, where hea while lay still to learne what Edmund meant to doe; who contrariwise louing nothing lesse then to linger his businesse, made preparation against those truce-breakers that had waited the Country in their returne, and with a great Army entred Kent, where he pitched down his tents neere vnto Oxford.

Canute, who had prepared himselfe in most warlike array to meete his approach, beganne the battaile in a furious manner, which continued verie bloody for foure howres space, vntill the foot of his vaward beganne to shrink, which when hee perceived, he drew his horsemen for their aide: but whilest the one gaue hastily back, & the other made as slowly forward, the array of the whole army was broken, and the Danes slaine on all hands: for it is reported that Canute lost foure thousand five hundred men, and King Edmund onely fix hundred; the rest of these Danes trusting to their legs, whom if Edmund had pursued in chase, it is thought, that day had ended the warres betwixt those two Nations for euer: but Destiny, that would haue the Saxons downe, who had raised themselves by the fals of the Britaines, made Edrik her instrument, & mall of the English, who kept King Edmunds hasty foot from following his enemies, by guilefull vrging the danger of ambush, and the ouer-wearied bodies of his souldiers, so that Canute thereby had leasure in safety to passe ouer into Essex.

(13) Where beginning againe, with the increase of his power to depouile all the Country before him, brought feare to the inhabitants, and to himselfe submission of many English. King Edmund therefore made preparation thitherward, and at Asldone three miles from Saffron-Walden, gaue battaile to Canute, wherein a bloody slaughter ensued, though a while with equal chance of foile or of victory, vntill lastly the Danes beganne to giue backe, which when the euer-treacherous Edrik perceived, he went with his strength, vnto their side, and maintained their battaile, which otherwise was at point to be lost, whereby the Danes regained the day, and the betrayed English, the ouerthrow. There died of Edmunds Nobility, Duke Alfred, Duke Godwin, Duke Athelward, Duke Athelwin, and Earle Vrechell, with Cadnoth Bishop of Lincolne, and Wolfe Abbot of of Ramsay, besides other of the Clergy that were come thither to pray for the preservation of the King and his Army. The remembrance of which field is retained vnto this day, by certain small hills there remaining, whence haue bene digged the bones of men, Armour, and the water-chaines of horse-brides.

(14) King Edmund thus traitorously forced to retire from the field, on foot marched vnto Gloucester with a very small Army, leaving Canute ouer-swollen in conceit for this his great victorie, vnto whom then the Londoners submitted, and so did many other great townes of Name; after which hee followed Edmund into the West; who now like a Tygar robbed of her Whelpes, seeking the reuenge of his lost day, gathered a most puissant Army, meaning to trie the vttermost chance of Fate, or Battaille. Their hostes meete at Dearhurst neere vnto the river Seuerne, where they were resolutely bent to establish the ones title with the others downefall; and now being ready to ioyne, a certaine Captaine of vncertaine name, stept forth (as is reported) betwixt the two Armies, and vttered in effect this speech.

"(15) Many battailes haue bene fought, and too much blood already spilt for the foueraignie of this Land, betwixt these two fierce Nations, and the valours of the Generals, Captaines and Souldiers sufficiently tried; wherein euen fortune her selfe seemeth to haue bene conquered; for if one Battaille were wonne, it was not long kept, neither the loser so weakened, but that hee had both courage and power to winne the next: what is the marke then that you aime at? is it honour and fame? Titles indeed which accompany war; but neither long enjoyed, nor much attained vnto by the common Souldiers, by whose valours and blood it is for the most part wonne. Let him therefore that would weare the Diademe, beare the hazard himselfe, without the confusi-on of so many men, and either trie the fortune of a single combat, who shall command, and who obey, or diuide betwixt them the Kingdome, which may suffice two, that hath main-tained seuen.

(16) Some affirme that this speech was Duke Edriks, but I hardly beleue so good a motion should proceede from so bad a man; by whom so euer vttered, it was acceptably received by Edmund and Canute, who thereupon in sight of their Armies, entred into a small Island, embraced about with the armes of Seuern, called Aney, adioyning vnto the City Gloucester, where those princes in complete Armour at first assailed each other most dangerously on horsebacke, and after as valiantly on foot. The Ironside was strong, and fought for his Kingdome; the Dane not so tall, but euer-y way as stout, fought for his honour, and so the combat continued with an absolute resolution, till at length Canute hauing received a dangerous wound and seeing himselfe overmatched in strength, wished a compromise, and thus spake to Edmund with a loud voice.

"What necessity should thus moue vs most valiant Prince, that for the obtaining of a Title, we should thus endanger our liues? better it were to lay ma-tice and Armour aside, and to condescend to a lo-ving agreement: let vs therefore now become sworn brothers, and diuide the Kingdome betwixt vs, and in such league of amity, that each of vs may vse the o-thers part as his owne; so shall this land be peace-ably governed; and we jointly assistant to each others necessity.

Whereupon they both cast downe their swords, embracing as friends with the great ioy and shou-ting of both their Armies, who stood before doubt-fully waivering betwixt hope and feare, and looking for their owne fortunes, according to the successe of their Champions.

Thus was the Kingdome diuided betwixt those two Princes; Edmund enioying that part that lay coasted vpon France, and Canute entring vpon the rest.

(17) Thus then the Saxon Monarchy spent to the last period, and their tottering crowne fast grasped with a hard Danish hand, was suddenly yorne from the Ironside helmet, by his plotted and hastned death. For Duke Edrick a very compound of treachons, glutted with the fauours of both the Kings, to strue himselfe deeper into Canute his conceit, continued the end of renowned Edmund: who being retired to a place for natures necessity, was thrust from vnder the draught into his body with a sharpe speare; which done, the treacherous Edrick cutting off his Soueraignes head, presented it to Canute with these fawning salutations. All hail, thou now sole Monarch of England; for, here behold the head of thy Copartner, which for thy sake I haue adu-entured to cut off.

Canute, though ambitious inough of soueraignie-ty, yet of princely disposition, abashed, & fore grie-ued at so vnworthy and disloyall an attempt, repli-ed, and vowed, that in reward of that seruice, the brin-gers owne head should be aduanced about all the peeres of his kingdome. Which high honour whiles this pro-digious wretch greedily expected, (and indeed for atime, saith Malmesbury, hee found some shew of fa-our with the King:) soone after, by the Kings com-mand, his head bad his shoulders farewell, and was placed vpon the highest Gate to ouerlook London.

(18) The traitorous death of this worthy Prince, as some affirme, was acted at Oxford; yet the Au-thor that wrote Encomium Emmae, and liued the same time, blancheth the matter, saying that hee died of a naturall death in London: God minding his owne doctrine, that a Kingdome diuided in it selfe, cannot long stand, and pitying the English, tooke away Edmund, lest if the Kings had continued long together, they should both haue liued in danger, and the Realme in continuall trouble.

That hee died in London, Simon the Monke of Durham agreeeth, and saith further, it chanced a-bout the Feast of S. Andrew: and Marianus is of the same opinion, being the yeere of Christ, 1016. When soeuer, or howe soeuer, his Raigne was but se-uen monethes, and his body buried at Glastebury; neere vnto his Grandfather King Edgar.

(19) He was of personage tall, for courage, har-dy, strong of limmes, and well could endure the trauels of warre, in so much that some deeme the surname Ironside, giuen him onely vpon that occa-sion. With him fell the glory of the English, and the aged body of their fore bruiued Monarchy seemed to bee buried with him in the same Sepul-chre.

His wife.

(20) Algoth, the wife of King Edmund, was the widow of Sigeferth, the sonne of Engin a Danish Nobleman of Northumberland; which Sigeferth, with his brother Morcar, was murdered at Oxford by the treason of the neuer-faithfull Edrik: & this Lady being of great beauty, and noble parentage after the death of her husband, and the seizure of his lands, was by King Ethelred, committed in charge to the Monastery of Malmesbury, where Edmund seeing her, grew in great loue, and there married her a-gainst the liking of his father, in Anno. 1015.

His issue.

(21) Edward the eldest son of King Edmund, and Queen Algoth his wife, was surnamed the Outlaw, be-cause hee liued out of England in Hungary as a bani-shed man, through the raigne of Canute, and of his sonnes the Danes. But when his vncle King Ed-ward the Confessor, had obtained the English crown, hee he was by him recalled, and most honourably in his Court enterained, till lastly, hee was taken away by death in the City of London, the yeere of Christ, 1057. He married Agatha sister to Queene Sophia, wife to Salomon King of Hungary, and daughter to the Emperour Henrie the second; by whom hee had Edgar, surnamed Etheling, confirmed heire apparant by Edward Confessor, his great Vncle; which title notwithstanding, proceeded no further, for that hee was depriued thereof by Harold his Protector.

His daughters.

The daughters of this Edward, as after shall be said, were Margaret and Christina, the younger of which became a valed Nunne at Ramsay in Hampshire, where shee in that deuotion spent her life, and was there interred.

Margaret the elder, and afterward sole heire vnto the Saxon Monarchy, married Malcolme the third of that name, King of Scotland, and commonly called Canmore: from which princely bed in a lineall descent, our high and mighty Monarch, King JAMES the first, doth in his most roiall person vnite the Britaines, Saxons, English, Normans, and Scot- tish imperiall Crownes in one.

(22) Edmund, the second and yongest sonne of King Edmund, and of Queene Algeith his wife, after his fathers decease being a Child, was with his brother Edward, sent by Canute to Olave King of Sweden his halfe brother, to the intent, that he by murder should make them both away: but this King taking pittie on the innocent Childrens estate, sent them to Salomon King of Hungarie, to the intent to haue them saued, where they were receiued with great fauour and honour: and Mathew of Westminster reporteth, that this Prince married the daughter of the same King; and other Writers of these times, that he died in the same Country without any issue of his body.

(23) These two sonnes of the Ironside thus posted away, and the crowne already set vpon the Danes head, had not the meanes of themselves to displace it, nor the English, hearts to assit them to their right: so that they rather secured themselves from violent deaths in this their exile, then made claime to that which was vnrrecoverable, and left the Danes quietly to possesse the land, which so long they had molested with their sturdy Armes.

THE ORIGINALL OF THE DANES. THEIR MANNERS. RELIGION, AND INVASIONS OF ENGLAND, THE RAIGNES OF THEIR KINGS HERE, VNTILL THE CROWNE REVERTED AGAINE TO THE SAXONS; WORNE BY KING EDWARD THE CONFESSOR, AND AFTER HIM BY HAROLD THE LAST KING OF THEIR RACE.

CHAPTER I.

The Spirit of God in his sacred writings, to shew his all-commanding power ouer Kingdomes and Nations, compareth the transmigrations of people from country to country, vnto the transfusion of wine from vessel to vessel: and those that are at rest with sinne, to the settling vpon their lees, as Noah did, against whom hee cursed that hand that was negligent in his worke of reuenge, and the sword that was not sheathed in their blood. Euen so the sinnes of the Saxons growne now to the full, and their dregs as it were suncke vnto the bottome, they were emptied by the Danes from their owne vessels, and their bottles broken that had vented their red & bloody wines: in lieu whereof, the Lord then gaue them the cuppe of his wrath, whose dregs hee had formerly (by their own hands) wrung out vpon other nations.

(2) For these Saxons that had enlarged their kingdomes by the blood of the Britaines, and built their nests high vpon the Cedars of others, (as the Prophet speaketh) committed an euill couerousnesse vnto their owne habitations, and were stricken by the same measure that they had measured vnto others. When as the Danes often attempting the lands inuasion; and the subuersion of the English estate, made way with their swords through all the Prouinces in the realme; and lastly advanced the crowne vpon their owne helmets; which whiles it so stood, was worne with great honour, especially of Canute the first and their greatest.

(3) Astonishing this Nations originall, and first place of residing, seeing themselves know nothing at all, we cannot determine, but supposing them with Franciscus Irenicus, to be a branch of the ancient Germans, and knowing them by the testimonies of al others, to inhabit in the same Country among them, we need not to doubt, but that their conditions and customes were much alike. Of the former, what we haue obserued, is already set downe, where we spake of our Saxons; & now of these later, what is supposed for truth shall be produced.

(4) These Danes so often mentioned by our historians, for the great afflictors of the English state and peace, were a people descended from the Seythians, as Andrew Velleius a learned Danish Writer reporteth: but Dudo of S. Quintin (an ancient Author) will haue them to come from Scandia, an Iland situated north-ward, not farre from the continent of Denmarke: which his opinion seemeth vnto some to be strengthened by Ptolemie the Alexandrian, who in his Geography placeth the people Dauciones (the supposed Ancestors of those Danes) in this Iland Scandia, at such time as himselfe wrote, which was in the raigne of Hadrian the Emperour, and about the yeere of Christs natiuitie 133. But whereof the root had beginning, the branches did farre spread themselves into the vpper Germany, and parts of Normay, and Sweyden, whose faire fruit more particularly filled that promontory, which tongue-like lieth into the Ocean on the north, being anciently called of the learned, Cimbria Chersonesus, where, (as Tacitus saith) was the uttermost end of Nature, and of the world; a strange conceit indeed; and yet more strange was their opinion, who were persuaded that the sound and noise of the Sunne was there heard at his daile rising and setting in those seas. But from more warrantable witnesses it is reported, that this was the very place which the Tutes and Angles abandoned, when they removed their Colonies for Britaine.

(5) In this place then the Danes laid first the foundation of their Kingdom; which, from the word Mare, signifying not a limit, but a region, was named Den-marck. But touching the former part of that compounded name, the truth and original occasion is not so soone found out: for the searching eye of truth hath long since scene into the receiued fable of Danm their first King, and Giant-like sonne of Humblus, though though Verfegem of late holds it more certaine in the fearch of originals, to follow the grounded opinion that ancient Tradition hath held, then at random to feeke them elfe-where: as thefe Danes (faith he) from Dan, and the Britaines from Brute; which truly for truth I hold much alike, and will herein make doubt as many more of riper judgement before me haue done.

Some others from Protonie haue thought, that from his Danciones placed in Scandia, and corruptly fo written for Danciones, the name of thefe Danes hath bene deriued; whereto the necceffity of the place induceth much.

(7) For Nations Originals may well bee compared vnto a fpring, whose current furcharged with continuall fupply of more, firft filleth the neere Channells; which done, they paffe further, and at length are (oftentimes) diuided into many and great ftreames: and euen fo thefe Danes, (faith Dudo of S. Quintins) after they had in heat, and lafciuious luft ingendred an innumerable offspring, fwarmed out of Scandia like bees out of their hives, & that both on diuers occasions, and in very barbarous manner; for growne to ripenefle of yeeres, & falling at ftrife with their Fathers and Grand-fires, yea, and moft commonly, among themfelues for lands and liuely-hood, neceffity compelled them to difburden the land thus ouerflowed, for the better maintenance of the refidue, and to banifh by lot (after their ancient cuftome) a multitude of their youth, that might conquire by their fwords, in forraigne Realmes, places to liue in.

Thefe then thrust out of their owne, fell vpon other lands with no leffe danger then the falling of a fword out of the fheath, or rather, as the breaking in of a tempeftuous fea vpon the neighbouring grounds, fore diftreffing their neighbour nations, & among them England not the leaft, as fhall be faid.

(8) And yet their name was not much notified to the world before the raigne of Iuftinian the Emperour, about the yeere of mans faluation, 570, but then rousing vpon the coasts of England, & France, in exercifing Piracies, were noted by writers by the name Wiccings, for that Wiccings in the Saxon tongue, as Africius witneffeth doth fignifie a Pirate; they were alfo called Pagani, for that they were not Christians; but by the English Denifcan, and alfo Heathen-mon, as being Ethnickes.

(9) The manner of their Religion, or rather fuperftition and Idolatry, was much like vnto the other Germans and Saxons, whose principall God and Nationall reputed-Patron, was Thur, vnto whom the fourth day of the weeke for his feruice was afsigned, whereof as yet it beareth his name Thursday; who in his robes was fet vpon a fumptuous bed, the Canopie whereof was befpanned with ftarres of gold; vnto him they performed their chiefe deuotions, and afcribed al their fortunes in their affaires; as the forefaid Dudo doth more particularly relate.

They (faith he) facrificed vnto Thur, whom they worfhipped in old time as their Lord, for whom they killed not many fheepe, oxen, or other cattle, but offered vnto him mens blond, thinking that to be the moft pretious oblation of all others; whom, when the Priest by cafting of lots had deftinated to death, they were all at once deadlie fmitten vpon the head with oxe-yokes; and euerie one thus choften for lot, hauing as one ftoke his braines dafhed out, was laid along on the ground, and there with a narrow prying was fought out the Fibra, or veine of the heart on the left fide, whence drawing the blond, as their cuftome was, and therewith befmeared the heads of their deereft friends, forthwith they boife failes, thinking their Gods well pleafed with fuch facrifices, and fore-deeming happie fucceffe to their intended voiage.

(10) Diemar the Bifhop (fomewhat ancienter then Dudo) recordeth another deteftable fuperftition vied by the Danes to purchafe the fauour of their Gods. Because (faith he) I haue heard wonderfull reports of the ancient facrifices which the Danes and Normans vfed, I will not let them paffe untouched. In thofe parts there is a place, and the chiefe it is of that Kingdome, called Lederum, in a Province named Selon, where euerie ninth yeare, in the month of January, after the time in which we celebrate the Natiuitie of our Lord, they all afsemble together, and there they kill and facrifice vnto their Gods ninety and nine men, and as many horfes, with dogs, and alfo cocks, in ftead of hawkes, afjuring themfelues that hereby their Gods are fully pleafed and pacified. And thus much may ferue for a taft and view of their cuftoms, names and originals.

THE DANES FIRST ATTEMPTS AGAINST ENGLAND.

CHAPTER II.

Hough many were the Piracies of the Danes on the coasts of France and this our Island in former times; yet their arriual heere, which gaue firft breath to their enfuing conquefts, was not till the wane of the Saxon Monarchie, about the yeere of Christs Incarnation feuen hundred eighty feuen, in the raigne of Brightrik King of the West-Saxons: in whose dominions, after fome proffer at Portland, they firft came to land at Teigne-mouth in Devon-shire; being lent then with three Ships onely, to efpie the wealth of this Countie, the forces of the Inhabitants, the commodities of the Hauens, and aduantage of arriual for a greater power, which was to follow them. The Kings Lieutenants and Prefect for that place, vnderftanding of their landing, went himfelfe to demand the reafon thereof; and attempting to lay hands on fome to carrie them to the Kings prefence, hee was there flaine; which they tooke as a fortunate prefage of the victories wherewith they afterward ouerran this Kingdome; though for the prefent the inhabitants enraged with the loffe of their Chiefe, addreffing them in great numbers to reuenge, forced fome to lofe their liues by the fword, the reft to fawe them by flight to their fhips.

(2) Norwithftanding their former preparations, they were contented to deferre their returne till the dayes of King Egbert, whose raigne (as elfewhere we haue touched) they diquieted with three feuerall inuafions; the firft in the North, the fecond in Wales, the laft in Kent; in all which, the King though with many loffes, and hazards of his owne perion, yet with great refolutions perfifted, till hee had difburdened his land of fo dangerous guefts. But thofe Flefh-flies hauing once taftef the fweet, though often beaten off, would not long bee kept away, but could eafily take, or make occasions of freft attempts; infomuch that after their firft footing they continued here their cruelties, rapine and fpoile the fpace of two hundred and eightene yeeres, neuer intermitting, till they had got the garland vpon their owne heads. The way whereunto was made vpon this enfuing occafion.

(3) Osbright a Northumbrian Viceroy, deputed by the West-Saxons, by chance, as hee followed his difport in Hunting, came to the houfe of a Noble man, named Beorn-Bocador, whose Lady of paffing feature (in his abfence) gaue him honourable entertainment, and intertained both himfelfe and traine, to repofe themfelues there a while, after their wearifome delights. The Vice-roy already enflamed with her beauty, accepted her courteous offer, not fo much to tafte her meates, as to fufcite his eyes with her rare beauty, and lafciuiously to dore in his owne affections. The dinner ended, and all ready to depart, as though fome weighty matters were to be handled, he commanded an auoidance from the Prefence, and taking the Lady into a withdrawing Chamber, vnder pretence of fecret conference, greatly tending to the aduancement of her Lord & felfe, moft vnobably, being not able to preuaile by finooth perfuafions, did by force violate her conftant chaftity. Which difhonour thus recieued, and her minde diftracted like to Thamar, at her husbands returne, all afhamed to behold his face whose bed had fo benee wronged, with floods of teares fhee thus fet open the fluces of her paffions.

(4) Had thy fortunes accorded to thine owne defert, or thy choise proceeded as by vow was obliged, then had no ftaine of blemifh touched thine honour, nor caufe of fufpition once approched thy thought: or had my felfe benee my felfe, thefe blufhing cheekes had not inuited thy fharp piercing eye to looke into my guilty and defiled breaft, which now thou maift fee diftornifhed of honour, and the clofet of pure chaftity broken vp; onely the heart and foule is cleane, yet feares the tainture of this polluted caske, and would haue paffage (by thy reuenging hand) from this loathfome pri- fon and filthy trunket. I muft confeffe our fexe is weake, and accompanied with many faults, yet none excufable, how fmall fouer; much leffe the greateft, which fhame doth follow, and inward guilt continually attendeth; yours, is created more inuolable and firme, both againft allurements and enforcements: by whose conftancy as our flexible weakenes is guarded, fo our true honours by your iuft Armes fhould bee protected. O Beorn, Beorn, (for husband I dare not call thee) reuenge therefore my wrongs, that am now made thy fhame and fcanale of my fexe, vpon that monfter, nay Diuell, Osbright, (O that very name corrupts my breath, and I want words to deplore my grieve) who hath no law but his luft, nor meafure of his actions but his power, nor pruiledge for his loathfome life, but his greatneffe, whiles we with a felfe-feare, and feruile flatterie make our balenefle with crouching obedience, & beare the wrongs of his moft vile adulteries. Thou yet art free from fuch diiected and degenerate thoughts, nor haft thou fmoothed him in his wicked and cuer-working vices: be fil thy felf then, and truly Noble as thou art. It may be for his place thou oweft him refpect; but what therewith the loffe of honour thine affection, but not thy bed; thy Loue but not thy beloued, yet haft thou loft at once all thefe, and he thy only becauer: thou wafte my ftay whileft I ftayed by thee; and now being downe, reuenge

"venge my fall: the instinct of nature doth pittie our weaknesse, the law of Nations doth maintaine our honour, and the sword of Knighthood is sworn by to be vntilheathed for our iust defence; much more the linke of wedlocke claimes it, which hath lockt two hearts in one; but alas, that ward is broken, and I am thy shame, who might haue bene thine honour. Reuenge thy selfe therefore both on him and mee, else shall this hand let out the Ghost that shall still attend thee with acclamations, till thou reuenge my stained blood.

(5) Born vnwonted thus to bee welcommed, much amazed at his wiles maladies, with gentle words drew from her the particulars of her inward griefe, who reuealed (as well as shame, and teares, and sobs, would suffer) the manner of the deed, still vrging reuenge for the wrong. Born touched thus to the quick, to pacifie his distressed wife, did not a litle dissemble his wrath, and excusing the fact, with the power of a Prince that might command, and her owne weaknesse vnable to resist the strength of a man: Commended much her loue and constancy; and alledging his wrongs to bee equal with hers, if not greater, in regard of their sexe, willed her to set her string to his tune till fitt opportunity would serue to strike: but shee distasting that sweet comfort, wrested her passion into so high a strain, that nothing could be heard but reuenge & blood.

(6) Born thus instigated by the continuall cries of his wife, whose rape already of it selfe had giuen sufficient cause of wrath: first consulting with his neerest friends, was offered their assistance against that wicked and libidinous Prince, and then repairing to his Court, in presence of them all, made knowne his vnufferable wrongs, and with viter defiance departed, threatening his death.

This Nobleman in his youth had been brought vp in Denmarke, and is reported to haue been allied into the Danish roiall blood. Hee therefore accounted this nation the surest vnto himselfe, and the fittest in will and power to enter his quarrell: so comming to Gaderick King of that Country, made his case knowne, instantly desiring his aide against the villanie of Osbright.

Gadericke glad to haue some quartell to enter Britaine, leuied an Armie with all speed, and preparation made for all things necessarie, sendeth forth Inguar and Hubba two brethren to command in chiefe, ouer an innumerable multitude of his Danes: which two hee thought at this time the fittest for the attempt, not onely for their well approued resolution and valour, but also for that hee knew them to bee, on particular motives (which vually more affect then doth a common cause) implacably enraged against the English, on an occasion vnfortunately happening, but most lamentably pursued: which it will not bee amisse here to annexe.

(7) A certaine Danish Nobleman of the roiall lineage named * Lothbroke, Father to this Inguar & Hubba, being vpon the shore, his Hawke in flying, the game fell into the Sea, which to recouer, hee entred a little Schiffe or Cock-boat, nothing foreseeing the danger that immediately did ensue: for a sodaine tempest arising, carried the boat into the deepe, and droue him vpon the coast of Norffolke, where hee came to land at the Port called Redham, and was no sooner scene, but hee was taken for a spie, and presently sent to Edmund, King then of that prouince, who in his answeres sufficiently cleared that suspicion, when also declaring his birth & misfortune, he was honourably entertained in the Court of the East-Angles: to whom the King much esteemed for his other good parts; but for his dexterity and expertnesse in hawking, held him in a speciall regard; in somuch that the Kings Falconer named Berieke, conceiued both such secret enuie and deadly hatred thereat, that hauing him alone in a wood, he cowardly murdered him, & hid his dead body in a Bush.

(8) Lothbroke in the Kings presence and Court was soone mist and diligent inquisition made could not bee found vntill his Spaniell, which would not forsake his dead Masters corps, came fawninglie vnto the King, as seeming to begger reuenge on so bloody an Act, which he did more then once, & at length being obserued, and followed by the trace, the dead body was found; and Berieke conuicted for the murder, his iudgement was to bee put into Lothbrokes boat, and that without either tackle or Oare, as he therein arrived, and so left to the seas mercy to be saued by destiny, or swallowed vp by iust desert.

But behold the event; the Boat returned to the same place, and vpon the same coast arrived from whence it had bene driuen, even in Denmarke, where Berieke being known, and hands laid on him, to free himselfe from the punishment of his butcherly fact, he added treason to murder, laying it to the charge of innocent King Edmund.

(9) In reuenge whereof, and likewise in Gadericks quarrell, Inguar and Hubba, sons to the murdered Prince, being now made Generals of the Army of the Danes, first arriving at Holdernes, burnt vp the Country, and without mercy massacred all before them, sparing neither sexe, nor calling, nor age; and surprizing Torke, which Osbright had taken for his refuge, there slew that lustfull Prince with all his forces, and possessed that City; and afterwards burling into Norffolke, sent this message vnto King Edmund. That Inguar the most victorious Prince, dread both by sea and land, hauing subdued diuers Countries vnto his subiection, and now arrived in those parts where hee meant to winter, charged Edmund to divide with him his riches, and to become his vassalle and seruant.

The King astoned at this strange and vnexpected Ambassage, consulted with his Councell, where one of his Bishops (then his Secretary, and a principall man) vied persuasions to him to yeeld, for preventing greater mischief; who notwithstanding returned this answer: God tell your Lord, that Edmund the Christian King, for the loue of this temporall life, will not subiect himselfe to a Heathen and Pagan Duke. Whereupon Inguar and Hubba, with the furious troupes of their Danes, pursued the King to Thetford; and (as Fabian saith) to Framingham, others to Halesdon; where hee pittying the terrible slaughter of his people, yeelded himselfe to their persecutions; and for that hee would not deny Christ, and his Christian faith, was bound to a tree or Stake, and with their arrowes so shot to death: whose body was afterward there buried, and thereupon tooke the name of S. Edmunds-bury; as wee haue formerly touched in his raigne, Lib. 7. cap. 11.

(10) Whether these were the very true causes, or some other, which drew these Danes hither, most certaine it is and too lamentable experience shewed, that hither they came (by Writers account) about the yeere of Christ eight hundred, and in the daies of King Brightick. Neither want there Authors who alcribe certain predictions to haue fore-runne the yeere 800. made vnfortunate by their first attempts; fore-shewed seuen yeeres before, by showers of blood falling from heauen, and bloody Croffes markt therewith vpon the garments of men, reported by the learned Alcuinus, who was instructor to Charles the Great, and borne in the county of Torke, where this wonder happened: which himselfe saw & testified vnto Ethelbert King of that Prouince, as Malmibury hath written, and was thought by Houeden, Higden, Fabian and others, to haue bene sent for signes before their bloody assaults, which beganne at the day-spring of the Saxons Monarchy, when it promised a most faire ascent to their heires succeeding, but mounted to the highest, againe declined as the setting Sunne, and fell vnder the cloudes of their owne ruines, so carried by the iust reuenging hand of God: for those Saxons hauing by blood and warre vnto the Brit- names of their land and right, by blood and warre, were by these Pagan-Danes so vicesantly molested, that no place was freed from their tyranny, nor any state sure, long to hold that, which they enioyed, nor their liues secured from a daily expectation of their sauage swords.

(11) Whose many inuasions and cruell proceedings against this land and nation, are already shewed in the raignes of these Saxon Kings, who then felt their heavy strokes in warre, hauing nothing almost memorable otherwise, to enlarge their fames and stories with, besides these their valours in resisting so mighty and almost vnrepugnable an enemy. Therefore omitting to repeat such things as in their successions are handled, we will fall neerer the time of the wished harvest of their full Conquests: some what remembering the Reader here, of those bloudie affaires, which the English at seuerall times felt and endured.

(12) Such was the murder of holy Edmund King of the East-Angles, with Danish arrowes martyred to death as hee stoode bound vnto a stake, euer-calling on the name of Iesus: Of Ella and Osbright Gouvernours of Northumberland by them slaine, and that Prouince for a long time after by them enioyed, and made subiect to their furies: Of Burdred King of Mercia, by them expelled, who with his Queene Ethelswith, were forced to abandon their Kingdome, leaving it to the possession of these Pagan intruders, and to seeke their securities in forreine Countries, where at Rome in Italy hee died, and at Padua his wife, as hath bene said: Of Ethelred King of the West-Saxons, that in one yeeres continuance fought nine bloudie battles against them, in the last whereof at Asteten hee receiued his death wound, and this Kingdome an vncurable blow: Of Elfred that most famous and learned King of the West-Saxons also, driuen by them to such distress, that hee was forced to leaue his Princely Court, and to remaine secret in a poore Cow-herds house vnknowne and disguised, in the Isle of Eshelingsy in the County of Sommerfet; and thence to aduenteure himselfe among the Danish host, as a base Mintrell and Contemprible make-sport; till hee had perfectly learned their secrets, and after with his sword through the thickest of those Enemies, made a way to his owne most glorious Monarchie.

(13) To speake nothing of the desolations left in euerie Prouince, Towne, and Place, where they came, laying all leauell with the ground, as prints of their foote-steppe where they had troden: Their cruell and mercilesse dealings towards holy and religious persons, with the ruination of Churches, and other places for Oratorie, is most lamentable to bee rehearsed or remembred: and among many others, the faire & beautifull Monasteries of Braauey, Crowland, Peterborough, Ely, and Coldingham, were made subiect to their desolations: In the last whereof, Lady Ebbe with her chaste Nunnies, to auoid their language and filthie pollutions, cutte off their owne noses and vpper-lippes, least the baite of their beauties should prouee the bane of their honours & honestie.

The most greuous tribute and exactions laied vpon the poore Inhabitants in general, and great sums of money, paid in such afflicted & vnseasonable times, imposed by the name of Dane-gilt, did from ten thousand, arise to forty thousand pounds, yearly gathered for them in England. Their sturdy behauiour and Lord-like carriage against the English, in all places where euer they sojourned, was with such subiection of the poore Owners, that they abused both wife, daughter, and maide, and were of all called the Lord-Danes, till lastly they were Lords in deede of the Land, and swaied the Scepter at their owne pleasures; which how it was attained vnto, wee haue before declared, and how it was worne and continued, wee are now presently to speake.

CHAPTER III.

An.D. 1017.

He failes of the Danes thus ouer-filled with the gales of their swelling fortunes, and themselves arrived at the Port of their long sought souerainety, cast anchor as it were at the haven of their wished desire, and prepared themselves to a settled rest: for Polychr. li. 6. c. 18.

Canutus possesse of halfe the Kingdome by composition with Edmund, now after his death seized vpon the whole; and that all things (as was pretended) might proceed with iustice, and concord, he called a Councell of the English Nobility at London; wherein was propounded, whether, in the agreement betwixt Edmund and him, any claime of title to the Crowne, had bene referred, for King Edmunds brethren or sonnes. The English that had paid a very deere rate for their ouerbold resistance before, nor daring now to buy, with too late repentance, the wrath of this Dane, absolutely answered, No; and hauing learned to appease Princes with flattery, offered their swords against any such claimes, and tooke themselves the Oath of allegiance vnto Canutus; who beeing a very wife and politike Prince, thought neuer the better of them for such their doings; whose truths thus failing towards their naturall Princes, could neuer (hee well knew) stand firme for him or his forreine posteritie.

(2) But being thus cleared of all other opposites, hee prepared with great royalty for his Coronation, which was performed at London, by the hands of Lyningus surnamed Elflane, Archbishop of Canterburie, in the yere of Christ Iesus 1017. beeing the second King of Denmarke of that Name, the first of England, and the thirty fourth Monarch of this Land. His first designs for the establishment of the Crowne to himselfe and Danish issue, was a care to preuent others neere vnto the claime, and therefore, taking counsell with Edrike, banished Edwin, who for his melancholy and regardlesse deportment, was commonly called, the King of Churles, son of King Ethelred, and brother of Edmund; notwithstanding, hee was guilefully recalled, and treacherously murdered by his owne men, whose bodie they buried at Tauelstocke in Deuon-shire.

(3) One cloud thus ouer-blowne, two others appeared, far more dangerous in Canutus sight; namely Edward and Edmund the sonnes of the Iron-side, whom albeit their yongue yeeres might haue freed from suspition of conspiracies, and their gentle dispositions from enuying his glory, yet the bright raies of a Diadem to dazle his ielous eie, that euer he saw (to his owne seeming) the reflection thereof shine from their faces: but ashamed (saith Higden) to lay hand on them himselfe, sent them to his halfe brother of Sweden, to be made away, as we haue said. In the doubtfull times betwixt Edmund and Canutus, when the scale of warre was held of either hands alike, Queene Emma had sent Edward, and Alfred (her sonnes by King Ethelred) vnto her brother Duke Richard of Normandy; whereby (we see) the Land was emptied of the English blood Roiall, and the Crowne left for the Dane without competition.

(4) Who now seeking to hold fast the Scepter thus grasped, sought the alliance of the Norman Duke by the espousing of his sister, faire Emma; a suite founding but harshly in the eares of the English, yea and most of all vnto her selfe, as deeming the linke of loue verie slender, that might bee broken by the same hand, which was the death of her Husband: Notwithstanding, withstanding, after good deliberation, knowing him childlesse of any lawfull successor, vpon couenants agreed, that the issue of her body by him, should inherite the English Crowne: the suit was granted; hoping also, if that failed betwixt them, to establish her other sonnes by King Ethelred.

This prouident respect so pleased the subiects, that it both drew the hearts of the English vnto Canutus, and their loue vnto Emma in a surpassing measure, as the booke penned to her praise, and written in that age, intitled Encomium Emmae, sufficiently doth shew.

(5) Neither was her louing care limited onlie to her sonnes, but further extended towards the Common-wealth, being much pestered then with his Danes, that lay lazie and idle as drones in the hute: who at her instigations were sent into Denmarke; & left they should through discontents make any stirres either here or there, had a largesse (to buy their contentment) of fourescore and two thousand pounds.

(6) Canutus his next care for the maintenance of his owne safety, and the continuance of his new got Empire, was the establishment of good lawes (which if duly executed, are the very sinewes and strongest guards of all States) to be administred and practised both on the English and Dane alike: wherefore calling a Parliament of his Peeres vnto Oxford, there established many wholsom Acts both for the Clergy and Laitie to obserue; some of which were diuulged by the praise-worthy care of a studious Antiquarie, and a few as touching Religion, as a reliquie of the rest, we thinke it not amisse to giue the Reader a tast of.

(7) And first, for the celebration of Gods most diuine seruice it was ordained, that all decent ceremonies tending to the encrease of reuerence and deuotion, should be vsed, as need required.

That vpon the Lords Sabbath, publike Faires, Markets, Synods, Conuenticles, Huntings, & all secular actions should not bee exercised, vnlesse some weighty and vrgent necessity required it.

That every Christian should thrice in the yere adressed himselfe to the receiuing of the blessed sacrament of the Lords Supper.

That if a Minister of the Altar killed a man, or else committed any notorious crime, hee should be deprived both from his order and dignity.

That the married woman convicted for adultery should haue her nose and eares cut off.

That a widow marrying within the space of twelue moneths after her husbands decease should lose her iointer.

(8) These & many other were made, whereby sinne was much restrained, and this realme peaceably and iustly gouerned. As likewise sundry other Countries were by his godly and roiall care; as in especiall is recorded of a yong Gentleman of the Danish roiall blood, named Odin, whom King Canute brought ouer with him into England, to be here trained vp in learning, where he profited so well, as also by his traualle through France (whereby hee much encreased both his knowledge and experience) that he attained the surname of Sapient, and the Philosopher, and therefore was called Odin-char, for the deere esteeme wherein all men held him. This man by his preaching in Finland, Zeland, Scandia, and Swenland, conuerted great multitudes to the faith of Christ.

(9) But in Denmarke things proceeded not so well, for in the absence of Canutus, and yere of Christs humanity 1019, the Vandals sore annoyed his subiects: hee therefore, in the third of his raigne, with a great host of the English passed ouer the seas, and bad his enemies battaile, which as Mathew of Westminster writeth, went fore against him the first day; and preparing againe for the next, Earle Goodwine, who was General of the English, attempted a great enterprize: for in the dead of the night, hee with his souldiers set vpon the Campe of the Vandals, and with a great slaughter of their souldiers, made the two Princes, Vissus and Anlaue to flie the field.

Canute ignorant of this acted enterprize, had notice in the morning that the English were fled, for that their station was left, and not a man found: wherefore following the track, euen to the enemies campe; by streames of blood, and dead bodies of the Vandals; hee saw the great ouerthrow that the English had giuen them, for which hee euer after held them in great estimation.

(10) Albertus Krantius, the Danish historian, reporteth that Olafus King of Sweden, hauing assailed Canute against Edmund the Ironside, and seeing himselfe to be neglected in the composition betwixt them, moued such stirres in Denmarke, that Canutus was forced thither againe; where by the prowesse of his English hee repulsed Olafus, who lastly was slaine by his owne subiects.

(11) William of Malmesbury and Mathew of Westminster record, that in the yere 1032, hee vnderooke an expedition into Scotland, with prosperous successe against Malcolm the King thereof, with two other Princes called Melbeath and Lehmare. But being at length ouerburdened as it were with his owne greatnesse, and forfeited with glory, which sometimes he had so greedily desired (as euen the greatest earthly delights haue their fulnes) hee resolved on a more peaceable course of life, and to affect a higher and heavenly glory, which hath neuer satiety or end. And therefore his deuotion being great vnto Godward, on a zealous intent, (such a zeale as S. Paul commended in the deuout Isaiahs) hee tooke a journey to Rome, to visite the sepulchres of S. Peter and Paul in the fifteenth yere of his raig; & thence sent his letters to his English Bishops and Nobility, beginning thus.

(12) Canute King of all England, Denmarke, Norway and Sweden, to Alnothus Metropolitan, &c. Wherein hauing first set downe the reason of his pilgrimage to Rome, which was especially to honour S. Peter, as hee had bene taught by Wisemen, that S. Peter had receiued from Christ the great power of binding and loosing, and was also the Key-bearer of heauen-gates, for which cause (left S. Peter should not open the same vnto him when hee should come thither) he held it most behouefull for him to procure his Patronage more then all the rest of Saints; then making relation of his honourable entertainment with the Emperour, Pope, and other forreine Princes, sheweth what complaint hee had made against the excesiue exactions and huge summes of money extorted by the Pope from the English Arch-Bishops, at such time as they receiued their Palles from Rome; for redresse whereof, and of other abulcs, the Pope in a solemn assembly of foure Arch-Bishops, twenty Bishops, and an innumerable multitude of Princes and Nobles obliged himselfe: And thence proceedeth in vowing the whole remainder of his life and reign, to the onely seruice of God, and due administration of Iustice to his people; to which end, hee first giues command to his Counsellours, that thence forward they dare not, for whatsoever respect, to giue way or conniueance to any the least iniustice in his Kingdom; and next to his Officers of Iustice, that as they tender his roiall fauour and their owne liues, they sweare not from Equity in execution of their places, in respect of any man whatsoever, no not, for the enriching of the Kings owne Coffers, because (saith hee) I hold it not needefull, that treasure should be heaped together for mee, by any vnjust exactions: and so concludeth with a strict charge to all his Bishops and Iustices, vpon their allegiance both to God and himselfe, to take order in his absence, that Gods Church, and his Ministers, bee not defrauded of their Tithes and rights, whereof hee vowes at his returne to take a most seuer account.

(13) By this his great care of his owne saluation, and his peoples tranquillity, we may see the zeale of those darke daies, to haue bene accompanied with the workes of true pietie; whose carnall applications of the spirituall texts, may well condemne these cleerer times, and daies of more brightnes, wherein wee know, that this Key-keeper of heauen, is no other but the verie Christ, who hath the Key of David, which openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth. And that this Kings zeale might bee further scene, by his magnificke works, he beganne to manifest it euen at Rome, where giuing many large gifts vnto S. Peters Church, hee also made free the Saxons Schoole from all tributes.

(14) In Essex hee built the Church of Ashdon, where hee had the victory against King Edmund. In Norfolk the Abbey of S. Benets, which saint he greatly reuerenced; and in Suffolke with an especial deuotion built and endowed the Monastery of S. Edmund, which Saint he most dreadly feared: for it is reported, that the seeming-ghost of Edmund often affrighted him; for which cause, as also to expiate the finnes of his father, who had done great damage to his possession, hee inuerged the same with a deepe ditch, and offered vp his Crowne vpon the Martyrs Tombe. Most rich and roiall leuels hee gaue the Church of Winchester, wherof one, is recorded to bee a Crosse, worth as much as the whole reuenue of England amounted to in one yeare: vnto Coventry hee gaue the Arme of S. Augustine the great Doctor, which he bought at Papia in his returne from Rome, and for which hee paid an hundred talents of siluer, and one of gold.

(15) The magnificent greatnes of this glorious King, so ouerflowed in the mouthes of his flatterers, that they extolled him, with Alexander, Cyrus, and Caesar, and to be possessed with power, more then humane: to conuict these his fawning ouerprizers, being then at Southampton, he commanded (saith Henry of Huntington) that his chaire should be set on the shore, when the sea beganne to flow, and then in the presence of his many attendants, spake "thus to that Element. Thou art part of my dominion, and the ground whereon I sit is mine, neither was there euer any that durst disobey my command, or breaking it, escaped unpunished, I charge thee therefore presume not into my land, neither wet thou these robes of thy Lord: but the Sea (which obeyeth only one Lord) giuing no heed to his threats, kept on the vsuall course of tide, first wetting his skirts, and after his thighs; when suddenly rising to giue way for the still approaching waues, he thus spake in the hearing of all: Let the worlds inhabitants know, that vaine and weak is the power of their Kings; and that none is worthy the name of King, but he that keeps both heauen, earth and sea in obedience, and bindeth them in the euertlasting law of subiection. After which time he would neuer suffer the Crowne to bee set vpon his head, but presently crowned therewith, the picture of our Sauour on the Crosse at Winchester: vnto such strong illusions were those godly Princes lead, by the guides that euer made gaine of their deuotions.

(16) From the example of this Canutus (saith Peter Picautensis Chancellor of Paris) arose the custome to hang vp the Armor of worthy men in Churches, as offerings consecrated vnto Him, in whose battails they had purchased renowne, either by victory and life, or in their Countries seruice attained to an honourable death. And surely, howeouer this King is taxed of ambition, pride and vaine-glory, for which some haue not flucked to say, that he made his iourney to Rome, rather to shew his pompe and riches, then for any humble deuotion or religious intent, yet by many his intercurrent actions and lawes of piety enacted, hee may iustly bee cleared of that imputation; as also by the testimony of Simon Monk of Dunham, who reporteth his humility to be such, that with his owne hands he did helpe to remoue the body of S. Alphegu at the translation of it from London vnto Canterbury, whom the Danes (notwithstanding his Archiepiscopall & sacred calling) before had martyred at Greenwich: and by the testimony of Gaido, Polydore, Languet, and others, he was a Prince of such temperance and iustice, that no other in this West of the World was so highly renowned, or might bee compared vnto him in heroicall vertues, or true humility.

(17) Saxo Grammaticus, & Albertus Krantius the Writers of the Danish histories, deduce Canutus by a lineall succession through the line of their Kings in this manner: Hee was (say they) the sonne of King Swaine (surnamed Ting-kay) by Sigred his wife, the widow of Erick, by whom he had Olaf Scotenning King of Sweiden: vnto which Swaine the bare also Oftrid a daughter, the mother of Thira, the mother of King Swyne the younger. The elder Swyne was the sonne of King Harold, surnamed Blaaland, by Gunhild his Queene, who bare him also Iring King of Northumberland, and Gunhild Queene of North-Wales. The father of Harold was King Gormund, whose Queene was Thira the daughter of King Ethelred, the twenty third Monarch of England, who bare vnto him the said Harold, and another Canute both most valiant Princes; which two Gallants inuading this land, were (for their brauer resolutions) by their Grandfather proclaimed heires apparant to all his dominions: the credite of which relations I leaue to my forenamed Authors; but Canute (the elder brother) died very soone after, being deadly wounded in the siege of Dublin in Ireland; where perceiuing death at hand, hee gaue strict charge to his attendants, to keepe the same verie secret till the City were taken, that so neither his owne Army should bee daunted, nor the enemy encouraged by the losse of the Generall. Gormund, his aged Father, (to digresse but in a word) so incredibly loved him, that hee had vowed to kill with his owne hands any person who should tell him the newes of his sonnes death: which when Thira his mother now heard of, shee vied this policie to make it known to the King her husband. Shee prepared mourning apparel for him, and all other things fitting for funerall exequies, laying aside all Regall robes, and ceremonies of princely state, without intimating any cause of this sad solemnity; which the old King no sooner perceiued, but he lamentably cried out, woe is me, I know my sonne is dead; and with exccesive griefe he presently died. But to returne from that Canutus, to close vp the raigne of this our Monarch in hand.

(18) In whom the Danish glories haue ascended to the highest, beganne now againe to decline towards their wane by the death of this great King; who, after hee had in great glory reigned aboue nineteen yeeres, deceased at Shaftesbury in the county of Dorset the twelfth of November, the yeere of Christs Incarnation, 1035, and was buried in the Church of the old Monastery at Winchester, which being after new built, his bones with many other English Saxon Kings were taken vp, and are preserved in gult coffers fixed vpon the wals of the Quire in that Cathedrall Church.

His Wines.

(19) Algiue, by most writers, a concubine to King Canutus, was the daughter of a Mercian Duke named Elfbelme, who is said to haue bene Earle of Northampton; and her Mothers name was Vfrune, Inheriatrix of the Towne Hampton in Staffordshire, from her called Vfrun-Hampton, now Waller-hampton: This Lady Algiue to make Canutus more firme to her loue, her selfe being barren, is reported to haue fained Child-birth and to haue laid in her bed the sonne of a Priest, whom Canute tooke to be his owne, and named him Swaine; him afterwards hee created King of Norway, which lately hee had conquered from Olaf called the Martyr. The like policie, saith Higden and others, others, hee vied in bringing forth Harold her second sonne, who was (say they) the sonne of a Sowter; notwithstanding I thinke the condition of the mother, who liued in disdaine, and died in disgrace, rather caused this report to be blazed, then any such balenes of birth in the sonnes.

(20) Emma, the second wife of King Canute, was the widow of King Ethelred the Pious; and from the time of her first marriage was called in England, Elfgine, after the name of most of the former Queens, which had succeeded Saint Elfgine. Shee was married vnto him in the moneth of Iuly, and yeere of Christs Iesus one thousand and seuentene, being the first yeere of his raigne: whose wife shee was eightene yeeres, and furiuing, kept still at Winchester, vnto which Church shee gaue nine Manours, according to the number of those fyre Plow-shares that shee was forced to goe vpon, for her purgation, in the raigne of Edward her sonne, as shall bee said. This Church shee adorned with many goodly vestures, and verie rich Iewelles: and deceasing in this City the fixt of March, the yeere of Grace one thousand fiftie and two and ninth of her sonne King Edwards raigne, was buried in the Church of S. Swythine neere vnto Canutus her husband.

His Issue.

(21) Swyne, the eldest sonne of Canute by Lady Alfgine, was borne before his father was King of England; and before his fathers death, was constituted King of Norway, lately conquered from King Olaf the Martyr; where hee beganne his Raigne, in the yeere of mans saluation one thousand thirty and fise, being the eighteenth of his fathers Raigne in England; and after he had with dislikes ruled that Realme, the space of fise yeeres hee was reiected of the Norwegians his subiects, and deceasing without heire of his body, left the Kingdom to the native heire, Magnus, the sonne of Olaf, who had bene wrongfully dispossessed by Canute.

(22) Harold, the second sonne of King Canute and of Lady Alfgine, was also borne before his father obtained the English Crown, & for his exceeding swiftnes was surnamed Hare-foote. He remained with his father in England, after he had disposed of Denmark to Hardi-canute, and Norway to Swyne, his brethren, expecting something in reuerfion. But perceiuing at his fathers death, that England was also appointed to his brother Hardi-canute, hee tooke the aduantage of his absence, and assumed the Souerainety of this Kingdome to himselfe.

(23) Hardi-canute, the third sonne of King Canute, and his first by Queene Emma his wife, was borne about the beginning of his fathers Raigne, and towards the end of the same, was constituted King of the Danes, and deligned to succcede him after his death in the Kingdome of England: But being absent then in Denmark, was disappointed by his brother Harold, who succeeded his father, after whose death he also succceeded him.

(24) Gunhilda, the daughter of King Canute, and of Emma his Queene, was the first wife of Henrie the Third, Romane Emperour, sonne of the Emperour Conrad, the second of that name surnamed Salike: shee was a Lady of a surpassing beauty, which either moued her husbands mind vnto iclouffe, or the ouer-lauish report thereof to breede surmize of incontinencie; for accused shee was of adulterie, and to defend her cause by combat, none could be found, till lastly her Page, brought with her from England, seeing no other would aduenture for her innocencie, entred the list, himselfe but a youth, in regard of the other Combatant being a Giant-like man; yet in fight at one blow, cutting the sinewes of his enemies legge, with another hee feld him to the ground, where presently with his sword, hee tooke his head from the shoulders, and so redeemed his Ladies life. After which hard vifage, the Empreffe Gunhilda forsooke her husbands bed, and by no meanes could bee brought againe vnto the same, but tooke the holy vail of a Nunne in the Town of Burges in Flanders; where she spent the rest of her life, and after her death was buried in the Collegiate Church of S. Donatian, being the principall of that town, where her Monument remaineth besides the north dore of the same Church vnto this day.

(25) Another Lady of the like sanctity, is reported to be the daughter of King Canute, and the second wife of Godefricke Prince of the Vandals; by whom he had Henry King of that Nation. They both are said to haue suffered Martyrdom for the faith of Christ; he first at the City of Lenzim, and the after at Michelenburg, being most cruelly tortured to death with whips. This Lady vpon sundry strong inducements cannot be reputed legitimate, which moued Andrew Vellej, a Danish Writer in our time, to be therein of a diuers opinion from Adam of Brene, and Helmolde, who liued fise hundred yeeres before him,

ANYTYS being dead, & Hardicanute his sonne by Queene Emma then in Denmarke; Harold his elder (but base brother) forefollowed not the opportunity offered; for seeing himselfe in his fathers life time neglected, and by will at his death, England with that of Denmarke heaped vpon Hardicanute: as quicke in apprehension, as hee was of footman-shippe (whereof arose the surname Hare-foot,) made strong his side by the Londoners, and Danes, Mercians, & Northumbrians very many, yea and some great Personages amongst them, affecting his claime: but Goodwin of Kent who had the Queene and her treasure in keeping, stood in his way, pretending himselfe Guardian of her Children, & the will of Canutus, who appointed his sonne by her to succede.

(2) The opposition grew strong, and the factions ripened, euen ready to secede, onely the lingering of Hardicanute gaue leaue vnto Harold to better his side by daily supplics, and the feares of ciuill sedition moued the Nobility to argue with wordes and not weapons, the title depending betwixt these two brethren. At Oxford they met, where the presence of the one, downe-peized the absence of the other, so that their voices went onely with Harold, and presently proclaimed and consecrated him King.

(3) He beganne his raigne the yeere of Christs humanity, 1036. and was very solemnly crowned at Oxford by Ethelthus Archbishoppe of Canterbury, though for a time, hee was very unwilling to performe that seruice; for it is reported, that hee hauing the regall scepter and Crowne in his custody, with an oath refused to consecrate any other for King, so long as the Queenes children were liuing; For (said he) Canutus committed them to my trust and assurance, and to them will I giue my faith and allegiance. This Scepter and Crowne therefore I here lay downe vpon this Altar; neither doe I denie, nor deliuer them to you; but I require by the Apostolike authority, all Bishops, that none of them presume to take the same away, neither therewith that they consecrate you for King: as for your selfe if you dare, you may vsurpe that which I haue committed to God on this his Table.

Notwithstanding that great thunderclappe was allaid with the shoures of golden promils, of his iust and religious Gouernment intended, though present experience manifested the contrary.

(4) For faith the auncient Writer of the booke called Encomium Emma: Harold no sooner was established King, but that he sought means how to rid Queene Emma out of the way, and that secretly, for openly hee durst not attempt any thing against her: Shee in silence kept her selfe quiet, looking for the issue of his designs. But Harold maliciously purposing, to take counsell how hee might traine into his Hays the sonnes of Queene Emma, that so all occasion of dangers against him might at once for all bee cut off: many proiects propounded, this lastly tooke effect: that a letter should be counterfeited in Queene Emma's name, vnto her sonnes Edward and Alfred, to instigate them to attempt the crowne vsurped by Harold, against their right, the tenure whereof we haue thought good here to insert.

(5) Emma, Queene onely in name, to Edward and Alfred her sonnes, sendeth motherly greetings. Whilest feuerally wee bewaile the death of our Soueraigne, my Lord and your Father, and your selues (deare sonnes) still more and more dispossessed from the Kingdome, your lawfull inheritance, I greatly maruaile what you determine to do, Edm.

Emma.

"doe, sith you know, that the delay of attempts giues the vürper more leasure to lay his foundation, and more safely to set thereon his intended buildings; for incessantly hee posteth from towne to towne, and from City to City, to make the Lords and Rulers thereof his, either by threats, prayers, or present rewards. But this in priuate they signifie, that they had rather one of you their Natiues should raigne ouer them, then this vürper & Danish stranger. Wherefore my desire is, that either of you secretly, and with all speed come vnto mee, whereby wee may aduise together what is to be done in this so great an enterprise: then whose good successe, I desire nothing more. Falle not therefore to send word by this my messenger, how you meane to proceed: and so fare yee well, my dearest bowels, & very inwards of my heart.

(6) These letters thus carried and cunningly deliuered, were digested as fauouring of no falsehood; and by the bringers, others returned, that Alfred should come shortly ouer to attend his mothers designs: these, brought vnto Harold, the coastes were fore-laid, and longing expectation attended the prey. Alfred as forward to set on his voyage, made Baldwin Earle of Flanders his; and some few Bulloggers increasing his Fleet, hee tooke the seas for England: where comming to shore, Earle Goodwin met him, and binding his assurance with his corporal oath, became his liege-man, and guide to Queene Emma; but being wrought firme for Harold, treacherously led these strangers a contrary way, and at Guisford lodged them in seuerall companies, making knowne to the King what he had done: who forthwith apprehended them euen in their beds, and in the morning as chained prisoners, committing them to laughter, contrary to the wonted manner of military decimation, did spare and exempt onely euery tenth man for seruice or sale: Prince Alfred himselfe was sent prisoner to the Isle of Ely, where hauing his eyes inhumanly put out, liued not long after in torment and griefe.

(7) Some adde vnto the former, an other, much more horrible kind of cruelty, as that his belly was opened, and one end of his bowels drawn out, and fastned to a stake, his body pricked with sharpe needles, or poinards, was forced about till all his entrails were extraisted, in which most sauage torture hee ended his innocent life.

(8) Harold thus freed from one, the other hee thought would no further attempt; and therefore the more boldly set himselfe against their mother Queene Emma, whose goods he confiscated, and banished her out of the Realme: who thus distressed, was honourably receiued, and for three yeeres space maintained by Baldwin Earle of Flanders.

(9) The Dane then seeing his hazards thus prevented, sought so to secure himselfe, and with fixe-teen shippes of the Danish Fleet kept the seas, which continued euer in readinesse, and waded from Port to Port; to the maintenance whereof, he charged the English with great paines, to their no little grudge & repining; whereby he lost the loue of his subiects before it had well taken root in their hearts.

(10) Neither yet held hee on long in these disroiall courtes, for that his speedy death did cut off the infancy of a longer life; and is said to haue died at Oxford in the month of April, the yeere of Christs Iesus, 1040, after hee had raigned foure yeeres & some moneths: whose body was at first interred at Westminster, hauing bene neither in warres so hardy, nor in government so prosperous, as his Father Canut before him had bene, nor left behind him eyther wife or children, to suruiue his person, or reuiue his name.

HARDICANUTE

Hardi-Canute.

HARDICANUTE, THE THIRD DANISH KING THAT RAIGNED IN ENGLAND, AND THE THIRTIE SIXT MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, AND DEATH.

CHAPTER V.

An.D. 1040.

Simon Daniel.
Blat. Westm. Monaster.

LHe States of the land, as well English as Danes, that had stood for Harold, both in obtaining and keeping the Crowne, now seeing him fallen, thought it best to make way for their peace, before Hardicanute by his sword should purchase their subiection; therefore with all hast they sent into Denmarke, with proffers of the scepter, and their forward allegiance only vnto him. Those parts beyond seas, were not then so subiective, as to build his hopes there vpon any sure ground; for the Norwegians had thrust out his halfe-brother Sweyne, and had elected Magnus the son of Olaffe for their King; so that small assurance could he perceiue of any quiet common-weale amongst them: and therefore fore-slowing not the offer, immediately imbarke his men of warre, and with so fauourable a wind tooke seas; that he arriued vpon the coast of Kent, the first day after hee had set saile out of Denmarke; and with great pompe conueied to London, was there proclaimed Englands King.

(2) Hee beganne his Raigne in the yeere of Grace one thousand and forty, and was crowned in London by Elnothus Arch-bishoppe of Canterbury; beeing the thirty sixt Monarch of the English-men: his raigne was spent in doing nothing, vnlesse you will say, in doing cuill hee did something.

(3) For no sooner had he a power to command, but he forthwith commanded the body of his halfe-brother the deceased King, to bee digged vp, and with spitefull disgrace to bee throwne into Thames, where it remained vntill a Fisherman found it, and buried it in the Church-yard of S. Clement without

Temple-Barre, commonly called Saint Clement-Danes, for that (saith Stow) it was the burying place of the Danes: this crueltie shewed, was pretended for the hard vsage of Queene Emma his mother, though partly spiced with reuenge for his vsurpation of the Crowne against him.

(4) Yet is worthily to be commended, for the reuerent regard hee bare to his Mother, and louing affection to his Brother; for no sooner was hee risen out of the throne of his Coronation, but that hee sent honorable Embassage vnto Earle Baldwine, with many thanks to him, for her princely vsage, and for herto returne into England to her former estate, and place of Queene. His brother Prince Edward comming ouer to visite them both, was most honourably receiued, retained, and dismissed; and these are the vertues regardable in this King.

(5) But his vices were more, and concerned more personnes; for a great Epicure hee was, and giuen much vnto Cuppes, whereby hee trained the body to belly cheere, and sense to be subiect to sloth and drunkenness; foure times euery day were his tables spread, and plenteously with all Cates furnished, euery commanding that his courtiers, guests, and seruants, should rather leaue, for superfluity, then call, for lack: which howsoeuer it was in him accounted for Roiall bounty, yet it caused in the people (who vse to praise the Soueraignes vertues, but imitate his vices) a riotous loosenesse, and the Common-weale to lie sicke of consumptions, bred by such excess of those grosse humours in her body.

(6) This wrought in him a carelesse neglect of government in State, so that the whole managing thereof was committed to his mother Queene Emma, a woman extremely couetous, and to Goodwin, the rich and politicke Earle of Kent, who seeing the present state carried wholly away with present pleasures asures, thought that a fitt subiect for him to worke vpon; for the King not married (vnlesse it were to his lewd will) and Edward likely to succede, of an ouer soft temperance, hee thought these both might proue aduantageous to his ambition, and therefore berought him, how the crowne might bee worne by him or his.

(7) Therefore, to separate the hearts of the subiects from the Prince (then which, there can bee no greater a wound vnto both,) hee caused the King to impose heavy tributes vpon the English, onely to pay the Danes in his Fleet, appointing euery common Souldier and Mariner, to receiue eight markes in money, & euery officer and Markster twelue; which amounted to the summe of thirty two thousand, one hundred forty seven pounds: for the payment whereof, there was so great a grudge, that two of the Collectors, Thurslane and Feader were slaine by the Citizens of Worcester, which caused their City to be burnt, and part of the country spoiled by the Kings commaund, and their Bishop Alfred expelled the See, till with money hee had purchased his peace. This Bishops hands (as was said) were deepe in the murder of Prince Alfred, the Kings halfe brother, whom we spake of; yea, and Goodwin himselfe was put to his purgation by oath, for the clearing of his suspicions in that treacherous and brutish fact: which oath was the lighter vrged, and the easier receiued for his rich and bounteous gifts, immediately before presented to the King, and that was a shippe, whose sterne was of gold, with fourescore souldiers therein placed, all vniformely and richlie suited. On their heads they all wore guilt Burgenets, and on their bodies a triple guilt habergion, a sword with guilt hilts girded to their waistes, a battaile-axe (after the manner of the Danes) on their left shoulders, a target with guilt bosses borne in their left hands, a dart in the right, their armes bound about with two bracelets of gold, containing fixteene ounces in weight.

(8) Aimundus Bremenfis writing the Stories of those times; sheweth, that the three sonnes of Canute were possessed of the three Kingdomes, England, Denmarke, and Norway, though the father by Will, had disposed of the first otherwise; which moued Hardi-Canute much to maligne the roialtie of Harold, whose Crowne by birth and couenant belonged to him; and therefore with great preparation, intending to recouer his right, hee entered the Sea, and came into Flanders, where hauing notice of the vsurpers death, his rage was staied, and he peaceably came in, and receiued the Crowne.

(9) And that Swein (called the Younger) King of Denmarke, to assit his vnkle Hardi-Canute against Harold the vsurper of Englands Crowne, with a great Armie prepared thitherward; and taking the Seas, were by tempest driuen vpon the coasts of Hadeloe, where his Armie doing some hurt, was set vpon and discomfited by the souldiers of the Arch-bishoppe: himselfe amongst them being taken prisoner, and brought into the presence of the Arch-bishop, was by him most honourably receiued, and conueied vnto Breme, who there entered a league with him, and with gifts and other complements; after a few daies; suffered him to depart; who likewise hearing of the death of King Harold, returned backe to his owne Countrey, where shortly after he was much molested by Magnus the sonne of Oluf, then raigning King ouer the Norwegians.

(10) Hardi-Canute in England, hearing of those stirres, thought it his part to aid his Nephew King Sweyn, against the inuasions of Magnus; and therefore hee lent one Saene his kinsman, with an Armie of the English, to reestabliish King Sweyn in his Throne. These entred Norway, and the Field against the Norwegians, but by them were so ouerlaid, that hee left Magnus the vanquisher, and returned againe for England; but before hee could arriue the Shore, King Hardi-Canute was dead, with whom dyed the issue of that warre; whose death was suddaine; and after this manner.

(11) At the celebration of a great marriage, contracted betwixt a Danish Lord, called Canut-Prudan, and Lady Githa, the daughter of a Noble-man, whose name was Ofgot Clappa; in a solemne assembly, & banquet at Lambeth the eight of Iune, reuelling and carousing amidst his cups, hee suddainly fel down without speech or breath: whose losse was the lesse lamented for his excess, riotousnesse, and vnwonted exactions: but chiefly because a much better was then to succede him; hauing himselfe had neither wife nor child that is read off. Yea, so farre were all sorts from bewailing him, that in regard of the freedome from the Danish yoke, which they attained by his decease, euery since among the common people; the day of his death is annually celebrated with open pastimes in the streets (as the old Romanes kept their fugalia, for chaffing out of their Kings,) which time is now called Hof tide or Hux-tide, signifying a time of fornie or contempt, which fell vpon the Danes by his death.

His body with all due obsequies was interred at Winchester by his fathers, after hee had voluptuously raigned two yeeres lacking ten daies, and departed his life and kingdom the yeere of Christ Iesus, 1042.

(12) With the death of this King died all rule of the Danes in this land, and the sacred sparke of the Saxons fire (through three of their successions) buried in their owne ashes, beganne now to take flame and to burne most bright, which was Prince Edward (now commonly called the Confessor) the sonne of King Ethelred, and albeit there were others betwixt him and the crowne, as namely, Edward and Edmund the sonnes of the Iron-side, yet the one dying in Hungarie without issue of body, the other there liuing as a banished man (by surname the Out-law) was neither so well regarded, nor thought so worthy of gouernement, as this other Edward was, whom therefore they sent for, and with so great applause and acclamations proclaimed, that the present ioy seemed to prognosticate a perpetual happinesse to the English, who had beene most miserably afflicted by the Danes, for the space of two hundred forty two yeeres; though this line againe failed, before it was well begunne.

EDVARD THE CONFESSOR.
SONNE OF KING ETHELRED, THE THIRTIE SEVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN: HIS RAIGNE, VER-TVES, AND MAR-RIAGE.

CHAPTER VI.

An.D. 1042.
Henry I. standing.

Edward, the Third of that Name before the Conquest, half-brother to the deceased Harold Canute, and sonne to King Ethelred by Queene Emma his wife, was by the proud care of a Mothers affection, (when the variable successe of Warre, doubt-fully depended betwixt Edmund the English, and Canutus the Dane) sent into Normandy to Duke Richard her Brother, there to be secured from all domesticall stirres: and now, before the dead corps could be entered, with a generall consent of the Nobles was elected their King.

(2) I know well that in the legend of this holy mans life, more things are recorded, then with facie of truth may be either belueed, or deliuered; as that he was chosen King by consent of Parliament, when as yet he was in his mothers wombe, Ethelred his Father at the same time hauing many other sonnes alieue; as also when the destroying Danes had extinguished by their warres almost the whole Royall issue of the English, the holy Monke Brightwold, of Glasterbury deploring their losse, and the Lands miserable estate, had in vision this Edward, then an Exile, presented vnto him by the Apostle S. Peter himselfe, who then anointing him King in his sight, telling him that his Raigne should be peaceable, and twenty three yeeres for continuance; Brightwold yet vnatisfied who should next succede, demanded the resolution, and was answered by Peter, that the Kingdome of England was Gods owne Kingdome; for whose successors himselfe would provide. With such vaine predictions our otherwife true Stories are ouer-charged; which moued Comincus the worthy French Historian, to tax the English with ouer much credulitie that way.

(3) But

(3) But most true it is, that the English Nobilitie disclaiming all Danish subiection, presently vpon the death of King Harold, enacted, That none of their blood should any more raigne ouer them: putting this their decree in execution by cashiering all Danes from the Castles, Forts, and Garrison Townes throughout all the Land, whence some euen of their Blood Royall were forced to depart. Then sending securitie into Normandy, with proffer of the Crowne vnto Prince Edward, had his consent, and assistance of Duke William his colen germane.

(4) This Edward (as elsewhere hath been said) was borne at Slip neere vnto Oxford, and tenderly educated by Queene Emma his Mother; and after his Fathers death, for safety sent into France; where, by his sweet conuersation hee gained the loue of all, and as much himselfe affected those strangers, which was some blemish of policie in the face of his gouernment, when he had got the Diadem, as being of disposition ouer-soft, and euer too pliant (an imperfection in a Soueraigne) to take the impress of any stamp. In which mould, the aspiring Goodwin Earle of Kent, doth cast the fabrick of his owne designs; who had made away Alfred, his younger, but of a more resolute spirit, that so the basis of his owne pillar (whose top in time he hoped to crowne) might be set, if not vpon, yet with the neereft to the Throne.

(5) Hee therefore, the formost both in will and power, vied both to establish Prince Edward in his right, being seconded by Leofrick Earle of Chester, and Lyungus Bishop of Worcester, and indeed with the generall assistance of all the English, who now were so ialous of all forraigne powers, that they forbade an ouergreat traine of Normans, (though coming for his aid) to attend their new-chosen King.

(6) His Coronation was at Winchester, with great concourse of people, and the celebration performed by Edine, Archbishop of Canterbury, vpon the very day of Christ his resurrection, (being also a new-rising day to the English Nation) the yeere of grace 1042. himselfe being aged then towards forty, and was in number the thirtieth Monarch of England, where he reigned with such Iustice & Piety, that he obtained the venerable name of Saint, and vnto posterities is distinguished from the other Edwards, by the adiectiue Confessor.

(7) In the entrance of his gouernement, to witnes his loue to his people, hee fought euery way the furtherance of their wealth, and afterwards remitted the most heauy Tribute of forty thousand pounds yearly gathered by the name of Dane-gilt, which had bin imposed by his Father, and payed for forty yeeres continuance, out of the lands of all, except only the Clergie, because, (say our ancient lawes,) the Kings reposed more confidence in the prayers of holy Church, then in the power of Armies. Then, from the diuers Lawes of the Mercians, West-Saxons, Danes, and Northumbrians, he selected the best, and made of them one body certaine, and written in Latin, (that all men of anie learning might know wheron to rely) to be the touch of his Common-wealths Pleas, and the squire by which he would haue euery right to be measured; being (in a sort) the fountaine of those, which at this day we terme the Common Lawes, though the formes of pleading & proceffe therein, were afterward brought in by the Conquest.

(8) The raigne of this King by most writers records, was more spent in peace & works of true piety, then in warres, and blood, though some dissensions happened both domestically, and forreine: for about the yeare one thousand forty five, and third of his Raig, a royal Navy was rigged in Sandwich hauen, against Magnus King of Norway, who then intended to invade England, and indeed had so done, if the wars of Sweyn King of Denmark had not diuerted his purpose.

(9) This Sweyn was the sonne of Duke Wolfe by Ostryth his Duchesse, sister to Harold Canut, who as I find written in the manuscript of Atmundus Bremenensis, being in possession of two kingdomes, prepared his Na-uy for the conquest of England also. But, (saith hee) King Edward gouerning that Kingdome with great Iustice and Loue, chose rather his peace with proffers of Tribute, and promises that after his death the Crowne should be his, yea though himselfe should haue children: howbeit this seemeth not to sound for truth; For Sweyn sending his Ambassadors vnto Edward to craue ayde against Magnus (his grievous and mortall Enemy, could obtain none, and Harold Harfager, the successor of Magnus, and enemy to Sweyn, presently thereupon sent vnto Edward for a league of amity, which was ratified firmly betwixt them.

(10) Neither may wee thinke that euer hee meant his Crowne that way; for that besides the decree enacted against all Danish claims, his desire to establish it in the English blood is most manifest, by sending for Edward his Nephew, the sonne of Edmund Iron-side, remaining in Hungary, and that so long out of England that hee was called the Outlawe; who coming ouer, brought with him his wife Agatha, and children, Edgar a sonne, and Margaret and Christian his daughters; him Edward meant to haue made heire to the Crowne, had he not beene precluded by hasty death, whereupon the King deligned young Edgar, his sonne, the heire apparent, and gaue him the surname of Adeling, a name of great honor appropriated to the Princes of the blood, and men capable of the Crowne.

(11) Besides these former attempts, certaine Danish Pirates entred the Port of Sandwich, which with all the Sea-Coats of Essex they spoiled, and in Flaunders made Marchandize of their prey. The Irish likewise with thirty fixe shippes entred Seuern, and with the assistance of Griffith King of South-Wales burnt or slew all that they found, against whom Alfred Bishop of Worcester went and fought, but with such success, that many of his Souldiers were slaine, and the rest put to flight; which made the Welshmen far more bold, and Reese, the brother of Griffith, make many incursions to fetch preyes out of England, till at length he was slaine at Bulenden, and his head presented to King Edward at Glooucester.

(12) His domestical molestations, were chiefly by Earle Goodwin and his sonnes; and those first springing vpon this following occasion. Enflame the elder, Earle of Bulloigne, who had married Goda, sister by the fathers side to King Edward, came into England to visite him then lying at Glooucester, and returning homeward, at Canterbury his Herberger dealing roughlie with a Burgeisse for lodgings, caused his owne death; which when his Lord heard of, thirsting for reuenge, he slew eigheteene Citizens in the heat of his furie: the Canterburians in as great a rage gotte them to armour, and slew twenty of his retinue, wounding many more, and made the Earle to recoil; whose greuous complaint comming to the King, he commanded Goodwin to see execution done vpon the offenders. Earle Goodwin not hasty to follow his commission, aduised the King to examining the cause before he massacred his true subiects at the instigation of Strangers; whereat King Edward was highly offended, and Goodwin thereby gained great loue of the Commons. This occasioned Robert Gometicensis a Norman, first made Bishop of London, and after Arch-bishop of Canterbury, to spread the Curtaine of disfauour betwixt Goodwin and the King, virging his refusal as an Act of Contempt, wherein more dangers might lie hid then were to be suffered; whereupon Edward called an assembly of Estates, appointing a day of meeting at Glooucester.

(13) The Commons (whose common guile is deadly to hate all strangers, though many times well deseruing) now seeing Earle Goodwin in danger for their good, were easily drawne to assist him and his cause, and in warlike manner garded his person, at Reuerstane not farre from the King. The Estates assembled, and Goodwin sent for, he refused to come, pretending seruice against the Welsh, then ready to make inroades, and that his presence was more need-full there, then at Court; albeit the Welsh-men cleared themselves by sending their Ambassadors vnto the King. The suspitions increasing, great preparation on both sides was made; to assit the King came Leofricke the worthy Earle of Chester, Sigward the stout Earle of Northumberland, and Rodulfe Earle of Hereford his silter Godas sonne, by her first husband walter de Maigne.

(14) To Goodwin repaired his people of Southerie and Kent, and to him were brought by Swaine his sonne, the men of Oxford, Sommerfet, Hereford, Gloucester, and Berk-shires; vnto whom, Harold his other sonne, ioined those of Essex, Norfolke, Suffolke, Cambridge, and Huntingdon-shires, so that his host was exceedingly great, and his mind thereby so inflated, that from Langton, where hee lay, hee sent a bold and Traiterous demand to the King, to haue Earle Eustace of Bulloigne with all his French and Normans (that kept then in the Cattle of Douer) to bee deliuered vnto him, and his sonnes: which beeing (as good reason was) refused, the Battle was prepared, and brought to the verie point of hazard and ruine of all: For in that quarrell were assembled the greatest Peeres, and Lords of the Land, the Kings loue faying very much with many, but yet the hatred towards Strangers possesing the hearts of more. The beginning thus doubtfull, and the end like to prooue dangerous; the matter both with great foresight and prouidence was referred vnto Parliament, to bee holden at London with all conuenient haif, whereunto pledges were both giuen and receiued on either parts.

(15) King Edward strongly guarded with an Army of the Mercians and Northumbrians, entred London, and Goodwin with his sonnes in warlike manner came into Southwarke to his owne house. But his Army wauering, and (as bad caufes & confidences make men doe) suspecting the worst, by little and little thrunk away from him: which knowne to the King, he presently pronounced sentence of banishment vnto Goodwin and his sue sonnes, without further proceeding by way of Parliament, as was determined. Goodwin therefore with great riches and his three sonnes, Swaine, Tostie, and Girib, sailed into Flanders, and Harold with his brother Leofwine, from Bristow passed into Ireland; who were no sooner gone, but the King proclaimed them Out-lawes, and gaue the Earldome of Harold vnto Algar, the son of Leofricke, Earle of Chester. This Leofricke is he, which at his Counteies request freed the Citie Couentrie of their importable tribute imposed, as we haue elsewhere said.

(16) In the second yeere of Goodwins banishment, both himselfe and those his sonnes with him, hauing gotten ships conuenient for warre, in manner of Pirates came vpon the coasts of Kent and Suffex, doing much harme, and returning with spoiles: the like did Harold and Leofwin from Scotland, vpon the westerne coasts of Sommerfet and Denonshires, who thence coasting about the point of Cornwall, ioined their Fleet with their Fathers, in the Ile of Wight.

(17) Against them King Edward prepared, & himselfe, though aged, with a Naue of fixtie ships well furnished for warre, meant to haue made an end of that businesse, by the destruction of his aduersaries: but the Nauies ready to ioine battell, God rooke the cause into his owne hand, and with a thicke fogge so ouer-spread the seas, that one Fleet could not thereby see another; in which, Goodwin and his complices by contrary windes were driuen to the place from whence they came. King Edward till in iacalouse of Goodwins returne, rigged forth forty tall ships to secure the seas, which kept not so strong a watch, but that Goodwin got by them, soliciting the people of Kent, Suffex, and Surrey vnto his aid, and entring Thames, did the like vnto them in London, who accepted of his arriuage, though King Edward lay there: so that without disturbance his Nauie fell vp with the tide, through the south Arch of the Bridge, & a mighty army to his aid mustered vpon the same side of the riuer.

(18) The Nobilitie then seeing side against side, and all of them mere English, ready to hazard their blood in the quarrels of Strangers, wrought so with Edward and Goodwin, that they came vnto peace, and pledges were againe deliuered for the performance, whereof Wilmo the sonne of Earle Goodwin, and Hacum the sonne of Swaine his eldest, were sent to Duke William of Normandy: so great a trust hee euer reposed in Strangers. This Swaine, vpon a remorse of conscience for the blood he had spilt, and especially for the slaughter of Beorne his cofen & intercessor, who fled to the King for his peace, vnderooke a pilgrimage to Ierusalem, and in his returne died in Licia, whether through an extremity of cold, or by the hands of Saracens, that spoiled all they met, it is vncertaine.

(19) Goodwin now restored, and in great credit with the King, cast the eye of disdaine vpon the Arch-Bishop Robert (as common fauorites emulate each others), and himselfe being a man eloquent and politike, so possessed the King both against him and his Normans, that he requited his owne banishment, with all theirs out of England, some few excepted, that were fauoured by the English: and now promising himselfe much honour and authority, was suddenly cut off by the stroke of death, surprizing him as hee sat at Table with the King vpon Monday in the Easter weeke, but died not till the Thursday following, which happened at Winchefer, where hee was buried.

(20) Besides these former forraine and ciuil molestations, other calamities happened to the Land; for in the yeare of Grace 1047. and moneth of January, there fell so great a Snow, which couered the ground vnto the middle of March, that Cattle & Fowles perished abundantly: and on the first day of that Month the yere following, a strange and terrible Earth-quake happened, which seemed to rent the ground afunder, and withall such Lightnings, as burnt vp the Cornes, growing in the fields, wherby an excessive Dearth followed: so that his raigne was neither so peaceable nor prosperous, as Brighwald the Monke dreamed it should be. But as all these were scourges sent from God vpon the Land for sin, so both Prince, Pastors, and people, had all generally their part thereof, as being ioinely the causers of the same.

(21) For the King, in case of these Strangers, put the Land more then once in danger to bee lost: and himselfe refraining the bed of his vertuous wife committed thereby the offence forbidden by the Apostle, and caused her his Queene, either to commit or be accused to haue committed adultery. The Clergie likewise altogether vnlearned, wanton, and vicious: for the Prelats neglecting the offices of Episcopall function, which was to tender the affaires of the Church, and to feed the flocke of Christ, liued themselves idle, and couetous, addicted wholly to the pomp of the world, and voluptuous life, little caring for the Churches & soules committed to their charge: and if any told them (saith Higden) that their liues ought to be holy, & their conuersation without Couetousnes, according to the sacred prescript, and vertuous examples of their Elders, they would scoffingly put them off with, Nunc aliud tempus, alii pro tempore mores; Times haue mutations, Somus mens falsions: and thus, (saith he,) they plained the roughnes of their doings with smoothnes of their answers. Briefly, the whole people were so loose and riotous, that as Gervasius Dorobornensis recordeth, they fell so fast to commit wickednes, as to bee ignorant of sinfull crimes, was then held to be a great crime in itselfe. And by the testimony of Alamesbury, the finnes of those times euidently foreshowed a generall destruction: for the Englishmen (saith hee) transformed themselves into the strange manners of the French, and that not only in speech and behaviour, but in their deeds, and Charters: their vse was then to goe fantastically appointed, their garments reaching but to the mid knee: their heads borne, and their beards shauen all but the upper lippe, which grew with long mustaches; continually wearing maske bracelets of gold about their armes, carrying markes vpon their skinnie pouncies in sundry Colours; and the Clergie contenting themselves with triuall literature, could scarcely hacke and hew out the words of the Sacrament. These then were Englands dolorous times both of blindness & lewdnesse, drawing downe Gods wrath for their destruction.

(22) But howsoeuer this King is reported to bee louing and facile towards Strangers, (which in it selfe is a princely vertue if it be opportunely and warily vsed): yet to his owne Mother, and Wife, vnaturally ouer rigorous, imprisoning and bereauing them both all Prince-like honour. Against Queene Emma, his Mother, were instigators Robert Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, and Earle Goodwin of Kent, the two greatest fauorites of the King. The causes objected were, her marriagewith Canut the Capitall enemy of England; her regardlesse of succouring himselfe and his brother in their exiles, whome (as was alleged) shee continued to haue made away, and that vnder colour of priuate deuotions, shee had vled the company of Alwine Bishop of Winchefer ouer familiarly, to her great dishonour and the Kings disgrace: for these and the like, hee tooke away all her Jewels, and other substance, and committed her to safe custody in the Abbey of Werwell.

(23) Indeede Malmisbury doth tax her to haue beene intariably couetous, and that shee was more tenderly affectionate to her Danish, then English children, wherby her loue was measured to their fathers. But for the imputation of her incontinencie, the washed it off with as sharpe a triall as any that is recorded for truth, by vndergoing that ouer-hard law Ordaliu, when in presence of the King her Son, & many of his Peeres, shee passed ouer betweene nine plough-shares glowing red hot, bare-footed & blind-folded, without any hurt; vling this speech to her leaders, as not knowing hee was past all danger, O Lord when shall I come to the place of my purgation: but hauing her eyes vncovered and seeing her selfe cleerly escaped, fell vpon her knees, and with teares gaue thanks to her Deliuerer, wherby shee recouered, both the loue and her former estate of the King, with the good esteeme and applause of the people: in memory wherof shee gaue nine Mannors (according to the number of plough-shares) to the Minister of Winchefer, (wherin shee had that triall), and adorned the same with many rich ornaments; as likewise the King, repenting the wrong hee did her, bestowed on the same place the Island (so then it was) called Portland in Dorsetshire, being about seven miles in compasse: for so the chance, in those daies, was set, that whosoever lost, the monks did winne.

(24) Neither were this Kings proceedings better with his owne Wife, howsoeuer some haue cloaked that Fraud (so the Apostle tearmes it) vnder the faire robe of Chastity. For hee marrying Editha, a Lady incomparable both for beauty and vertue, in whose breast (saith Alamesbury) there was a Schoole of all Liberal sciences, refused her Bed: but whether it were for his debility, or hatred to Goodwin her father, or loue of Virginitie, I determine not; but am fully perswaded, that the accusation of Adultery wherewith Robert the Arch-bishop did charge her, was more vpon enuy to her father, then truth of so foule a fact in her, whose vertues were so many, and so memorabile, by report of Authors, that were euen witness themselves; for Ingulphus that had oftentimes conference with her, doth thus of her relate.

There was giuen (saith hee) vnto King Edward for his Queene and wife, the daughter of Goodwin, a most beautifull Damosell, Egitha by name, excellent well learned; in her demeanure, and whole course of life a Virgine most chait, humble, and vncincedly holy, no way sauouring of her Fathers, or Brethrens barbarousnesse, but mild, modest, faithfull, and innocent, nor euer hurtfull to any; in somuch, that this verue was applied to her:

Sicut Spina Rosam, genuit Godwinus Egicham.
From prickled stake, as sweetest Rose:
So Egith faire, from Goodwin growes.

All these notwithstanding, the King expelled her his Court and Bed, and that with no little disgrace; for taking all her goods from her, euen to the vttermost farthing, committed her prisoner to the Monasterie of Wilton, attended onely with one maid, where shee, for a whole yeeres space almost, in teares and prayers expected the day of her release and comfort: All which vnprincelie, and vn-Spouslike vlage, as the King pretended, and said, was, because shee only should not lue in comfort, when as her Parents and Brethren were banished the Realme: an vniust sentence surely, and vn-befitting a Saint, thus to punish the finnes of the fathers vpon their children, contrary to the prescript rule of God, who by his Prophet complaineth against such iniustice, and regulateth it with this iust verdict, T has soule that sinneth shall die: and for her pure and vn-violated chaity, himselfe on his death-bed spake, saying, that openly shee was his wife, but in secret embracing as his owne sister.

(25) Yet behold the blindness, and partiality of those times, wherein for this his only refusal of nuptiall duties, the penciles of those that should haue shewed his true face to posterities, haue so embellished the portraiture and lineaments, that vnto the beholder hee seemeth now no mortall creature; his miracles and forelayings answerable to most of the Prophets. Which here to infern in so worthy a subiect and holy Kings life, were both to fill vp with a needlesse surcharge, whole leaues of Times waste abuses, and to breed a suspicion of those other things in him, which we know for found truth; as was his gift from God, through his holy inuocations, and touch of the place affected, to cure the disease called Struma, now the Kings Evil, which vnto this day in his successors, hath been experienced vpon many such healings, by the touch of those gracious hands who haue held the Scepter, as Gods Vicegerents of this most blessed and happy Kingdome. That hee had the spirit of Prophecie, many haue thought, as also the notice of his owne death, some constantly affirme; by a King sent him from Ierusalem, the same that hee long time before had giuen to a pilgrime: but these with his other miraculous cures, his sight of the Danes destruction, and the Seven Sleepers in the Mount Cellion besides Ephesus, with infinite others, I leaue to his Legend-writers, and Aluredus Riualensis to relate, who haue writen his many miracles with no sparing pen. Most true it is that of a little Monastery dedicated to S. Peter in the west of London by the riuer of Thames, hee made a most beautifull and faire Church, where hee likewise provided for his owne Sepulcher, and another dedicated to S. Margaret, standing without the Abbey: this of Westminster hee endowed with very rich reuenues, and confirmed their Charters vnder his Broad Seale, being the first of the Kings of England, who vied that large and stately impression in their Royall Charters and Patents: the very true form wherof, according to the rude sculpture of those elder times, we haue portraited in the front of this Chapter, as we intend likewise to doe in the rest succeeding; wherof this vlt at least, (if no other) may be made, that by benefit of those patterns, men may know from what Princes they first received the Charters of their ancient possessions, and Patents of their honours, which the Princes stile (many beeing of one name) cannot sufficiently make knowne.

The said Church of Westminster hee built for the discharge of his vowed pilgrimage to Ierusalem, & that in such sumptuous manner, that it was in those daies the Patern to all other stately buildings. Hee founded also the Colledge of S. Mary Ouerie in the county of Devon, and gaue vnto it the Village of Otereg, and remoued the Bishoppes See from Cridington to Excester, as a place of farre more dignity; where the King taking the right hand, and the Queene the left, led Leofricke from the high Altar, and installed him the first Bishop of that See: Finally, when hee had reigned the space of twentie yeeres, six moneths, and twenty seuen daies; hee died the fourth of January, the yeere of had

King Edward the founder of S. Mary Overy Colledge. Stow 114.

Christ Iesus one thousand sixtie six, and was with great lamentations and solemnitie buried in his Church at Westminster, the morrow after the feast of the Epiphanie.

Hee was of perſon well proportioned, of countenance lober, and of complexion faire ; naturally courteous and gentle to all (and thereby too prone and credulous to ſuggeſtions) loving to his ſubiects, and over-loving unto Strangers. A Prince of much vertue and integritie of life, notwithstanding which, had not beene vailed vnder ſe faire-ſhew of Chariſtie, he had not ſo eaſily beene canonized for a Saint ; wherein yet the ſeeming wilſt taxed his wiſdome, whileſt vnder a goodly pretext of Religion and vowed Virginitie, hee callt off all care of hauing iſſue, and exposed the kingdom for a prey to the greedy desires of ambitious humours.

His wife.

Editha, the wife of King Edward, was the daughter of Goodwin, Duke of the West-Saxons, and Earle of Kent: her mother was Gith the sister of Sweyne the younger, King of Denmarke, she was married vnto him the yeere of Christs humanity, 1045. and fourth of his raigne. She was his wife eighteene yeeres; and suruiuing him liued a widow eight more, and in the eight yeere of King William the Conquerours raigne, died in December, the yeere of Christs birth, 1074, and was buried by her husband in S. Peters Church at Westminster.

HAROLD THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, THE SONNE OF EARLE GOOD-WINE, AND THIRTIE EIGHT MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS LIFE, RAIGNE, ACTS, WIVES, AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER VII.

THe people sorrowing for the death of their King, and the State-men perplexed for choice of a new, Edgar Atheling's title was worthy of more vnpartial respect then it found: for him they held too young for government: besides, a stranger borne, scarce speaking English: and withall, the pro-phacies of Edward touching the alienation of the Crown, the Interest of the Danes, and the claim that Duke William made, (both by gift and consanguinity, ,) bred great distraction of desires, and opinions;

but nothing concluded for settling the State; no man either assuming or profering the Monarchiall diadem, because none had the power, or right to adorne therewith his owne head. In this Calme conference a sudden gale arose, which blew all the sails spread for that wande into one Port. And that was Harold sonne to Earle Goodwine, a man (duly prizing his many worthy parts) not vntmeet for a kingdom, who first succeeding his father in his Dukedome, and next Edward (his brother in Law) in his Kingdom, in patience, clemency, & affability bare himselfe most approuedly towards the vertuous, but with a Lions courage, and fierce countenance chastised the disordered, and indeede became another Maccabeus vnto the distressed Land. Whose kingly state before we touch, it shall not bee amisse to lengthen his shorie raigne with his Acts and Life, as hee was a Subject, both with and against his Lord and Predecessor.

(2) That hee tooke part with his Father against Enflace of Bullioigne, and King Edwards hally commiffion, wee haue shewed; himfelfe then enioying the Earldome of Oxford, and affected by thofe of Effex, Suffolke and Norfolke, Cambridge & Huntington-shire, that they fided in his caufe againft the King; But thefe delignes failing, (as commonly it is fene all attempts of Subjects againft their Soueraignes doe) hee learned by baniishment, what was the loffe of true honour, and by forbearance of battell (when halfe the Kingdome ftood for him,) his dutie obliged vnto the Common-wealth. And growne againe into fauour with the King, carried himfelfe anfwerably vnto both.

(3) Some ieniously conceiued, Edward without any cause, banished Algar the son of Leofricke Earle of Chester, who with the helpe of the Irish and Welshmen, vnder the conduct of Gruffith ap Llewelyn Prince of North-Wales (who had married his daughter,) did much hurt to the English, putting Rodulph Earle of Hereford to flight, with the slaughter of fue hundred men, spoiled the City, burnt the Minster and became Masters of mil-rule in those parts. Against these was Harold sent, and with such manhood pursued his flying enemies, that passing through North-Wales, vpon the Snow-downes he pitched his Field: The Earle, and Prince Gruffith, not daring to abide his presence, fled thence vnto South-Wales, and again tooke into Hereford; whereof Harold hauing intelligence hastied thitherward (leaving sufficient in the Snow-downes to mate the Welsh), and recovering the City, with a deepe trench and high rampire fortified it about, where for the sauing of more bloud (and not vngratefull to Algar, who without grudge had resigned to him his Earldome, and whole *R*enueues at his returne from exile) a peace was concluded, and at *Harold*s request, Earle Algar and Prince Gruffith were pardoned.

(4) But Algar being again accused, & again aided by his old associate Gruffith, recovered his Earldome by force, whereto King Edward was highly displeased, but most against Gruffith, who euer was ready to assist any against him: whereupon Harold the second time appointed Generall, with a great host entred North-Wales, without sight of enemy, where he only burnt downe the stately Palace of Prince Gruffith, & so returned to the King. But long the welsh were not quiet, nor the Prince pleased of the harms to him done. Wherefore making his forces verie strong he againe molested the English.

(5) To refrain from any more was Harold set forth, who with such terror burst into Wales, that Prince Gruffith, in secret stole from his Campe, leaving his Souldiers (if they would) to fight for themselves, whereupon his whole army yielded themselves to Harold's mercy, and having Prince Gruffith in their hands, cut off his head, and sent it to Harold, giving him pledges for assurance of peace, and the payment of the ancient tribute which for a time had been retained: yet ever after he carried so heavy a hand on the Welsh, that as John of Salisbury in his Policraticon writeth, he ordained a law, that what Welsh-man soever, should with weapon pass over offes ditch, should have his right hand cutt off by the Kings officer.

(6) All now in quiet, and Harold withdrawne to his Mannor of Bosham vpon the riuaige of the sea in the confines of Sussex, there for his recreation, one day he tooke into a Fishers boate with small attendants, neither those very skillfull Mariners, when no sooner were they lanced into the deepe, but a contrary wind came about, and droue the boat vpon the coast of Ponthieu in France, where hee was taken by the Country people, and presented to Guido their Earle, who a while retained him his prisoner, in hope of gaine by his ransom, but Duke William requiring it, he was conuied into Normandy, where he cunningly perswaded the Duke, that his secret coming out of England, was purposely to enter a league of amity with him. The Duke then hauing present was with the Brittaines in France, tooke this his new friend and guest with him for his companion at Armes; whose ready policies followed with forward practise, wan him great estimation with the Duke; whereupon betwixt them a couenant was made for the reueration of the English Crowne to the Norman, if it chanced King Edward to die without children; and the same ratified by Harolds corporall oath, with the affiancing of Lady Adeliza, the Dukes fifth daughter, then a child and Harold a widower; which afterwards fell to his owne destruction, and the lands subversion, as shall be said.

(7) His last imprisonment by holy King Edward, was against the tumultuous Northumbrians which had expelled Tofto their Earle, and Harolds owne brother, where a peace was concluded without shedding blood, but with condition that Tofto should lose his Earledome: whereupō in great difpleafure, he with his wife & children fled into Flanders, and euer after hated the perfon, and emulated the glory of Harold. The original of thefe two bretherns quarrels beganne at Windfor, where in the prefence of the King they fell from words vnto blowes, and that in fuch manner, as if refcue had not come, Tofto had died; for which difgrace, hee fecretly hied him into the Marches of Wales, and nere the City Hereford at Perffayth, where Harold had a houfe, then in preparing to entertaine the King, he flew all his brothers feruants, and them cutting peccemeale into gobbets, falfed fome of their limmes, and caft the refidue into veffels of the meath and wines, fending his brother word, that hee had furnifhed him with powdered meats againft the Kings comming thither, which barbarous act caufed deferuently his name to be odious vnto his Northumbrians, and was laftly repayed with his owne death.

(8) Now albeit some Heralds make Harold by birth but a Gentleman of one, and the first descent, which, were it so, should no whit blemish him who was more truly enobled with princely vertues; yet therein also it may seeme hee is mis-esteemed, seeing his Father was Godwin a Duke by degree, the son of Wolnoth, and he the sonne of Egelmar, who was the sonne of Egrieke, furnished Cæswine, and brother of Eadric Duke of Mercia, that married the daughter of King Ethelred of England, of whom wee haue spoken.

The mother of Harold was Githa the daughter of Duke Wolfe, and sister to Sweyne the younger King of Denmarke, by Estrich his wife, who was sister to Canute the great King of England; and himselfe the second sonne of her borne; whose elder brother was Sweyne, that died on pilgrimage in his returne from Ierusalem, and his younger were Tost, Wilmod, Grith, and Leofrick.

(29) A former wife Earle Goodwin had, whose name was Thira, the sister of Canute, a woman fold vnto wickednesse for making merchandize of Englands beauteous virgins into Denmarke; shee sold them there at deare rates, to satisfie her owne vnlituate auarice, and the lusts of the lacinious Danes, till a iust reward of Gods wrath fell on her by a thunderbolt falling from heauen, wherewith shee was slaine, to the great terrour of the beholders. One sonne by her Earle Goodwin had, who when hee was past childes age, riding vpon a horse (the gift of his Grandfather the King,) proudly giuing him the reine and spurte, was violently borne into the river Thamesis, and so suddenly drowned. Thus much being premised of Harold before hee was King, his raigine, life and death, wee will now address to declare.

(10) Edwards life ended, and nothing determined touching his successor, Harold the second day after, being the day of his buriall, made himselfe King, none of the Nobility disliking what hee had done; for courteous hee was of speech and behaviour, and in martiall prowesse the onely man, as Wales well witnessed, more then once; friended by affinity with many of the Nobles, and by his new marriage with Edgitha the daughter of Algar (sister of the Earles Morcar and Edwin, and late wife to Gruffith ap Ithelwyn Prince of Wales) hee expected to bee both sided and assisted, if his cause came either to trial or voice.

(11) And the time hee well saw fitted his entrance, for Sweyne King of Denmarke (most dread by the English) was entangled with the Swedes wars; and William the Norman (that made claime from King Edward) at variance with Philip the French King; the friends of Edgar in Hungarie, and himselfe a stranger, over young for rule: all which concurrents made Harold without deliberation, or order from the state, to set the Crowne on his owne head, regardless of all ceremony and solemn celebration; for which his act, as a violator of holy rites, hee too too much offended the Clergy.

(12) The day of his Coronation was vpon Friday, the fifth of January, being the feast of the Epiphany, and yeere of Saluation 1066: none either greatly applauding, or disapproving his presumption, except onely for the omission of manner and forme; to redeeme which, and to re-gaine the good will of all; no sooner attained hee the feat roiall, but he remitted or diminished the grieuous customes and tributes which his predecessors had raised, a course cure powerfull to winne the hearts of the Commons; to Church-men hee was verie munificent and careful of their advancements; and to grow more deeply into their venerable esteeme, hee repaired their Monasteries; but most especially that at Waltham in Essex, which hee most sumptuously new built, and richly endowed, giving it the name of Holy Crosse; vpon occasion that such a Crosse found farre westward, was brought thither by miracle, or tradrant: and therefore hee chose out this place to powre forth his supplications, before hee marched to meete Duke William in the field. Moreover, to satisfie such Nobles as affected young Edgars iust title, hee created him Earle of Oxford, and held him in speciall fauour: in briefe, vnto the poore, his hand was euer open, vnto the oppressed he ministred iustice, and vnto all men was affable, and mecke: and all to hold that vpright which on his head hee had set with an vn-cuen hand: and deprieved him of, vnto whom hee was Protector.

(13) Three feuerall reports are affirmed of Edwards dispose of the Crowne: the first was to the Norman Duke, who made that the anker-hold of his claime; the second was to young Edgar, vnto whom hee was great vncle; and the last vnto this Harold himselfe: for so faith Edmerus, and also Marianus, who liued at the very same time, and writeth that Harold thereupon was sacred and crowned by Aldredus Archbishop of York; so that hereby hee is freed by some from the imputation of intrusion and wrong.

(14) His State thus standing, and his subiects contentment daily increasing, presently it was somewhat perplexed by an Ambassage sent from the Norman, putting him in mind of his couenant, and oath, as well for the custody of the Crowne to his behoofe, as for the solemnization of the mariage contracted betwixt his daughter and him.

(15) Harold, who thought himselfe now surely seated in the hearts of his Subiects, and therefore also sure in his Kingdome, answered the Ambassadors, That he held their Masters demand vniust, for that an oath extorted in time of extremity, cannot bind the maker in conscience to performe it; for that were to ioyne one sinne with another; and that this oath was taken for feare of death or imprisonment, the Duke himselfe well knew: but admit it was voluntarily, and without feare, could I (saide he) then a subiect, without the allowance of the King, and the whole State, giue away the Crownes succession to the preiudice of both? surely a Kingdome is of a better account then to bee so determined in private onely betwixt two. With which kind of answers he sent the messengers away.

(16) The Norman, who till then thought England sure to be his, and had deuoted his hopes from a Duke to a King, stormed to see himselfe thus frustrated on the sudden, and in stead of a Crowne to haue scornes heaped on his head; therefore nothing contented with this sleight answer, returned his Ambassadors againe vnto Harold, by whom hee laid his claime more at large; as that King Edward in the Court of France had faithfully promised the succession vnto him, and againe afterwards ratified the same to him at his being in England, and that not done without consent of the State, but confirmed by Stigandus Archbishop of Canterbury, the Earles Goodwin and Syward, yea and by Harold himselfe, and so formally assured that his Brother and Nephew were delivered for pledges, and so that end sent vnto him into Normandy: that hee had no way beene constrained, hee appealed to Harolds owne conscience, who besides his voluntary offer to swear, contracted himselfe to Adeliza his daughter (then but young, and now departed life) vpon which foundation the oath was willingly taken.

(17) But Harold who thought his owne head as fit for a crowne as any others, meant nothing lesse then to lay it downe vpon parley; and therefore told them flatly, that howsoever Edward and hee had tampered for the Kingdome, yet Edward himselfe coming in by election, and not by any title of inheritance, his promise was of no validity; for how could hee giue that whereof hee was not interefered, nor in the Danes time was euer like to be? And tell your Duke (saide he) that our kingdome is now brought to a seiled estate, and with such love and liking of the English, as that they will neuer admit any more a stranger to rule over them. And as touching the contract with his younger daughter, hee well seeth that God hath taken away that occasion of alienating the Crowne, and surely his Law hath likewise provided remedy against such rash vows; whose precepts I mean to follow: and therefore (saide he) will your Duke to weigh my estate with his own, both his and mine now in quiet, sufficient for two, and either of them, employment enough for one mans Government, and therefore both of them too much to bee well gouerned by one, seeing that God himselfe had set a sea betwixt them. With these and the like speeches hee shifted of the Dukes Ambassadors; without all princely entertainements, or courteous regard.

(18) The messengers returned, and Harolds answers declared, William lion-like enraged, casteth his thoughts about plotting reuenge, and making some oddes euen that might impeach his designs, prepared all things for open warre. Harold likewise not sleeping his businesse, made ready his Fleet, mustered his souldiers, and planted his Garrisons along the Sea-coast. But in these his proceedings, behold a great and fearfull Comete appeared (scldom a signe to Princes of fortunate successe) vpon the twenty fourth of Aprill, and lasted onely feuen dayes, which drew the minds of the English, into great suspence, now ready to enter into a double warre.

(19) For as William the Norman for his part claymed England by gift; so Harfager the Dane did by succession; the rumors of both which, greatly terrified the heartes of the inhabitants: and yet behold, a third terrour vnexpected, contrary to nature

ture, and most mens opinions, suddainly arose, for Tofto the cruell Earle of Northumberland, and brother to Harold, expelled by his people, and proscribed by King Edward, fled into France, where by the instigations of William, whose wifes sister hee had married (both of them the daughters of Balwine Earle of Flanders), he got for his reuenge a Fleet furnished with men at Armes, and thus prepared; his first fury was shewed in spoiling the Ile of Wight; then coasting the shore, shrewdly endamaged Kent, whence hoisting saile, fell foule vpon Lincolnsheire; where Morcar and Edwine Earles of Cheshire and Torkeshire, aided with the Kings Nauie, drove him from thence, though with some losse of their men.

(20) Tofto for more succour fled into Scotland, where of King Malcolme hee had but cold comfort, himselfe being busied with ciuill broiles; but howsoever his expectation there failed, yet his purposes were continued with the assistance of Harold Harfager (that is, the Faire-locker) King of Denmarke, who with three hundred shippes had entred the river Tyne for Englands inuasion, after his conquest of the Iles of Orkney, Tofto therefore joining his Fleet to these Danes, in warlike brauerie, both of them entered the mouth of Humber, and drawing vp the river Ouse, at Richhall landed their men, making spoile of the Country wherefoeuer they came. To meet with these, the foresaid Earles Edwin and Morcar, in a tumultuous haile raised their powers, but were so ouerlaid by the Norwegians, that many were slaine, and more drowned, in passing ouer that river.

(21) The enemy grown proud by this late victory, halted towards Torke, the chiefe Citie of the North; where planting his siege, it was presently yeelded vp, and hostages deliuered vpon both parts for the performance of covenants. The Danes thus prospering, had most strongly encamped themselves; for backed they were with the German Ocean, flanked on the left hand with the river Humber, wherein also their Fleet rid at Anker, and had on their right hand and afront the river Derwent; so that it seemed impossible to raise the siege.

(22) But Harold thinking the coasts cleere from all danger, the Equinoctiall at hand, and Navigation now past, the victuals in his Fleet spent, and notice from Earle Balwin of Flanders, that Duke William meant not his voyage that yeere, was about to disband his Army. When this sudden newes from the North pierced his eare, no need it was then to bid him make haste thither, the case standing so neere him as it did. Therefore recalling his Army, posted to Torke, and from thence marched against the Norwegians, who lay secured with such advantage, as wee haue said. Notwithstanding Harold courageously ordered his battell, and assailed to passe the Bridge called Stamford, built ouer Derwent, which one onely Dane made good for a time against his whole host, and with his Axe flew forty of his men, till lastly this Dane was slaine with a dart.

(23) The Bridge gotten, and the English reduced into their ranks, Harold most boldly set vpon his enemies euen in their Campe; where the battaile with equall valour and fortune, was maintained a time, till lastly the Norwegians disarraied and scattered, were slaine outright; and among them the two Chieftanes, Harfager and Tofto, with many others of worth and account, lost their liues. Olave the sonne of this Harfager, and Paul Earle of Orkeny, who kept their Fleet & Seas, whilst his Father and followers fought vpon land, were brought to King Harold, and to haue their liues spared, abjured the Land, and thenceforth to attempt no hostilitie against the English peace; and with twenty small vessels to cary away their slaine and hurt, were suffered to depart, bringing heavy newes into Denmarke of the losse of their King, and ouerthrow of his Army.

(24) By this victory thus happily obtained, fell vnto Harold an exceeding rich booty, both of gold and siluer, besides the great Armado of Tost and Harfager; whereby his mind was soone set aloft, and he began to grow both proud, and odious vnto his Army, the rather, for that he diuided not the spoiles vnto them that had desferued it; a wrong that the common Souldier doth continually murmur at, and commonly endure.

(25) Now in this current of King Harolds fortunes, William the Norman had the more leasure to strengthen his owne, and often conferring with his Captaines about Englands inuasions, found them euer resolute and cheerefull that way; the difficultie onely rested, how to prouide money enough, the very sinewes whereby the vast body of an Army must be knit, & strengthened for a subsidy being propounded vnto the assembly of the Norman States, it was answered, that a former warre against the French had empouerished much of their wealth, that if new wars were now raised, & therein their substance spent to gain other parts, it would be thereby so waisted, as that hardly it would be sufficient to defend their own; that they thought it more safety to held what hee had, then hazard of their own to inuade the territories of others; & that this was intended, iust though it were, yet seemed not necessary, but exceeding dangerous; besides (saide they) the Normans were not by their allegiance bound to Military seruices in forreign parts, & therefore such payments could not bee assessed vpon them. And although William Fitz-Osborne, a man in high fauour with the Duke; and as gracious among the people, endeauoured by all means to effect it, yea, and to draw on others by his example) proffered to set out forty tall Shippes vpon his owne Charge towards this warre; yet would it not bee: Therefore Duke William bethought him on another way.

(26) The wealthiest men among all his People he sent for, and feuerally one by one conferred with, shewing them his right and hopes of England, wherein preferment lay due to the meanest amongst them, onely money was the want, which they might spare; neither should that be giuen, nor lent without a plentiful increase: with such fair words he drew them so on, that they stroue who should giue most, and by this policy hee gathered such a masse of money, as was sufficient to defray the warre. Then went hee to his Neighbour Princes, namely to the Earles of Anion, Poitou, Mayne, and Bulloigne, promising them faire possessions in England, yea and vnto Philip the French King, in case he would aide him, hee voluntarily offered to become his vassall and Leige-man, and to hold England by oath and fealty vnder him. But it beeing thought nothing good for the State of France, that the Duke of Normandy, who already was not so pliable to the French King as was wished, should bee bettered in his estate by the addition of so mighty a Kingdome (the power of Neighbour Potentates being euer suspected of Princes) so farre was the King from yeelding any helpe, that he secretly maligne, & openly disswaded this his attempt of inuading England. This French ieaousy, the Norman soone perceived, which made him to call about yet another way.

(27) For making his claime knowne vnto Alexander the second, then Pope of Rome, with the wrongs done vnto Robert Arch-bishop of Canterbury, by Harold and his Father, (a text that might not bee read without a gloss), he was so fauoured of his Holinesse (whose See was euer glad to interest itself in disposing of Crowns, that hee both allowed well of his enterprise, and sent him a consecrated Banner, (Saint Peter himselfe had none such in his Boate) to bee borne in the Ship, wherein himselfe in that expedition should take saile for England; and accursed al them that shold oppose themselves against him: for euen then the Popes had began to vsurpe authority ouer Princes, & with their leaden blades, to hacke into the iron swords of Emperours.

(28) Thus furnished on all sides, hee assembled his forces, and with a mighty Nauy came to the Towne of of Saint Valerius, which standeth vpon the mouth of the Riuier Seme; where a long time he lay bound to his great discontentment, and with many vowes impetunating the fauour of that locall Saint, heaped daily a number of gifts and oblations vpon his Altar; till lastly his desire was obtayned, and then with three hundred Ships fraught full of his Normans, Flemings, Frenchmen, & Britaignes, weighed Anchor, and with a gentle gale of wind arriu'd at Peuensey in Suffex, vpon the twenty eight day of September, where Landing his men, to cut off all occasion or hope of returne, he fired his owne fleet, and vpon the Shoare erected a Fortresse to bee if neede were, a retiring place for his Souldiers.

Suttonius in vita Cesar.

(29) At his arriuage from Sea, as our Historians report, his foot chaunced to slippe, so that not able to recover himselfe, he fell into the mud, and all to becomed his hands; which accident was prefently construed for a lucky presage; for now (said a Capitaine) O Duke, thou hast taken possession, and holdest that land in thy hand, whereof shortly thou shalt become King: As Cesar is said to haue done, when hee entred into Africa, who from ship-board at his landing fell into the sands, and merily said, I doe now take possession of thee, O Africa.

(30) From Penensy Duke William departed towards Hasting, where raising another fortification, diuinged to all the causes of his comming, as pretending to reuenge both the death of his Normans, slain by the treachery of Godwin & Harold, and the wrongs and banishment of Robert Gemetius Archbishop of Canterbury, pretenes very slender, and enforced out of fealon: but surely had not a third fate neerer his heart, the two former would haue passed without the spleene of reuenge; namely, the donation of King Edward deceased, whereon he built his claime to the Englishe Crowne. And there also by his Edict, he straitly charged his souldiers not in hostile manner, to wrong any of their persons, who shortly were to become his Subiects.

(31) Harold in the North hearing of these newes, halted with his Armie (whose Armour yet reaked with the blood of the Norwegians) towards the south and with such power as possible hee could make, entred London, where immediately a messenger fro Duke William was presented vnto him, demanding no lesse then the Kingdome, and Harold's vassalage; vrging the same with such instant boldnesse, that Harold's furious indignation could hardly forbear, against the law of Armes, to lay violent hands vpon the Ambassador; so great a pride and confident hope had entred the heart of this late Victor: to shew both, with very great boldnesse, he dispatched his Ambassadors to William, and by way of irefull checkes menaced him, vnlesse forthwith hee departed backe into Normandy: when prefently mustering his men at London, hee found them much lessened by his battaile against the Norwegians; notwithstanding, many Nobles, Gentlemen, and others, whom the loue of their native Country inflamed, did ingage themselves for the field, against his common and dangerous enemy. He therefore with an vndaunted courage, led forth his Armie into Suffex (against the importunate suite of his mother, who sought by all means to stay him) where on a large and faire plaine, farre seu'n miles from the enemy, he pitched downe his battailes, and sent forth his Esquiers to defery his power.

(32) These comming into danger, were caught by the Normans, and presented to their Duke, who commanded them forthwith to bee led from Tent to Tent, to bee feasted, and dismissed, without any harme or dishonour done. These returning to Harold told what they had done, commending the Duke in his Martiall Promissions, and his clemency to themward, only said they, his Souldiers seem to be Priests, for their faces were all shauen, whereas the vse of the Englishe was then to reuerse onely the vpper lippe vncut, retaining or renewing the old manner of the ancient Britaines so described by Cesar: but King Harold, who had bin in that country, wel knowing their error, replied that they were men of great valour & stout Souldiers in fight. Vpon which speech, Gith, his younger brother, a man much renowned for martiall exploits,ooke occasion to aduise the King from being present at the danger of the Field: for (said he) it stands not with the rule of policy, to hazard all in the triall of one battell, nor to depend vpon the euent of war, which euer is doubtful, victory being as oft gotten by fortune, as valor; mature deliberation doth offe produce the safest issues, & a prouident delay is held to be the greatest furtherer of martiall proiects; neither will any thing strike greater terror into the Normans, then thou to bee leuying, & enrolling a new Army, whereby they may euer expect, and feare succeeding Battails. Again (said he) thou best knowest what oath thine owne mouth hath made vnto William, if lawfull, and willingly, then withdraw thy selfe from field, left for that thy sinne the whole Host perish; for there can bee no power against God. I am free from such guilt, and therefore may the bolder fight, and either defeat this dangerous enemy, or more cherefully dye in the defence of my country; & if thou wilt commit the fortune of Battaille into my Governance, assure thy selfe I will perform to thee the part of a louing Brother, and to my Countymen of a valiant Capitaine.

(33) This wise aduice notwithstanding, destiny so diuining him, he gaue flood, imputing it a part of dishonour, and not befitting a Souldiour, (as he alwaies had bene,) to leaue the field Coward-like, when great glory was to be wonne, or in case of fortunate successe, to be deprived of a part, and therefore re-prooued his brother for making this motion, and with disdainfull speeches, vnderualued and embased the worth of the Normans.

(34) Duke William now entred the field, & both the hosts standing ready for fight, the Norman, to spare the effusion of Christian blood, vpon a pious affection sent a Monke as a Mediator for peace, with offers to Harold of these conditions, either wholly to resigne the Kingdome vnto him, and from thence forth to acknowledge the Duke for his Soueraigne: or els in single combat to trie the quarrel with him, in sight of the Armies; or lastly, to stand to the arbitrement of the Pope, touching the possession and wearing of the Englishe Crowne. But Harold, as one whom the heauens would depreffe, accepting neither domestick counsell, nor the Normans offers, referred the deciding of the matter vnto the Tribunal of God, and answered, that it should be tried the next day with more swordes then one.

(35) That next day was the 14. of October, which vpon a credulous error, hee held euer to bee fortunate, because it was the day of his Natiuitie, and with hopefull assurance, desired greatly the approach of the same: His souldiers likewise as men whose heads were to bee crowned with the Laurels of victory, gaue themselves to licentious reuels, and in riotous banquets, with clamour, and noises, spent the night; whereas contrariwise, the Normans, more wisely, and seriously weighing the businesse in hand, bestowed the time in prayers and vowes, for the safety of their Armie, and victorious successe: neither had the morning sooner spread it selfe but their battell was ordered, and prepared for fight.

(36) Harold also with the like forwardnes, marshalled his battaile, placing in the Vant-guard the Kentish men (who by an ancient custome had the front of the battaile belonging to them) with their heauy axes, or halberts. The Middlesex-men & the Londoners were in that Squadron, whereof himselfe with his brother had the leading.

37 His enemies Fawward was led by Roger of Montgomery, and William Fitz-Osborne, the same consisting of Horsemen out of Aniou, Perche, and little Britaine. Their

Their Maine-Battaile consisted of Poitiuins and Germanes, Gejrey Martell, and a Germane Pensioner commanding them: In the Rere-guard was the Duke himselfe with the whole manhood of Normans, and the flower of his Nobility & Gentry; all which battalions were intermingled with companies of Archers.

(38) The Normans without any confused, or disorderly shout, founded the battaile, and aduanced forward, discharging a fierce volley of arrowes like a tempestuous haile, a kind of fight both strange, and terrible vnto the Englishe, who supposed their enemy had bene already euen in the midst of amongst them; when prefently a furious charge was giuen to the Va-ward of the Englishe, who resolutely had determined to couer the place with their bodies rather then to giue one foot of ground, and bending all their forces, kept themselves close together, whereby they valiantly, and with the slaughter of many, put backe the enemy: which was so farre from daunting the Normans, that by it they were more whetted to re-enforce themselves vpon them: when with an horrible noise, the battailes of both sides gaue the stroke; and now come foote to foot, and man to man, coped together in a most cruell fight. The Englishe standing thicke, and close, as if they had bene stucke one to another, abode the brunt, and charge of the Normans, and with such welcomes, that after many a bloody wound receiued, they were at point to recoile, had not Duke William, whose crown lay now at stake, both brauely performed the part of a Leader, and with his presence, and authority restrained them. The fight thus continuing, the Normans horsemen brake into the troups of the Englishe, and sore distressed the Souldiers on foot, yet notwithstanding they still held out, and kept their array vnbroken: for Harold (no lesse carefull to keepe, then the other to gaine a diadem,) as a most valiant Capitaine bare himselfe worthily euery where. The Duke well perceiving that with fine force, and true valour, no good end could bee got, betooke himselfe to a stratageme, and commanded his men to found the retreat, but kept them still in such order of array, that they gaue backe in as good discipline as they came on.

(39) The Englishe supposing the Normans to haue fled, and themselves the masters of the field, began in eager pursuit carelessly to vntwist, and display their ranks; when on the sodaine, the Normans hauing their wished opportunity, and winding about, charged the enemy a fresh; who now being scatteringly disranked, and out of all order, were slaine down on all sides, not able to recover their battaile: many thus borne downe, and slaine, none by flight sought to escape the field, but rather to maintain their honour in Armes, cast themselves into a round, choosing there to die in the cause of their Country, then cowardly to forsake the Standard of their King; and therefore with bold resolutions encouraging one another, they turne head and resist a long time: but showers of arrowes like a stormy tempest falling thicke amongst them, one, most fatal, and vn lucky for the Englishe, wounded Harold into the braines through the left eye; so that falling from his horse to the ground, was vnder his owne standard slaine.

(40) And yet Giraldus Cambrensis (I know not by what inducement,) relates the issue of this Battaille somewhat otherwise, affirming, that Harold with losse of his Eye, but not of his life, from the field fled to the City of Westeche, and there long after led a holie life, and made a godly end, as an Anchorite in the Cell of Saint James, fast by the church of S. Iohn. With Harold died his Brethren Gyth, and Leofwin, with most of the Englishe Nobility, besides the slaughter of sixty seven thousand, nine hundred seventy foure of their Souldiers: Bremen faith an hundred Thousand.

(41) Duke William in this Battail had three horses slain vnder him; God (saith Marianus) so defending his person, that though multitude of darts were thrown against him, yet not a drop of his blood was spilt by the Enemy, and this Battaille wonne with the losse onely of fixe thousand, and thirteene of his men. Whose wooden bowes (as Iohn Kouffe is of opinion) gained the Normans that great victory; for the Arrowes shot leuell, or directly forward, wounded the Englishe that stood in the front, and vpright; the other shot on high, galled at the fal, those that were more remote, and the backs of such as stooped to shunne the danger.

Hob. Hastings.

(42) This battle was fought in Suffex 7. miles from Hastings, vpon Saturday the fourteenth of October, and yere of Grace 1066. Wherin the dolefull destruction of the Englishe fell, and the glorious Sun of the Normans euen in the shutting of the day did arise; when perished the Royall blood of the Saxons, whose Kings first had made this Kingdome into Seuen, and afterward of them so glorious a Monarchy, that it was not inferior to any in Europe, and her Monarchs so renowned for princely magnanimity, as that many of them were ranked with the best in the world: But now the all-ordering hand of God (vnto whose becke not onely this Ball of the Earth, and the Rulers thereof, but euen the Heauens themselves, and all the powers thereof must bow) either for the finnes of the Englishe which were many, and great, or to graffe one more fair and longer continuing bud vpon this dried, and decayed stock, brought that forrein offspring into this his nursery of Britaine, whose branches, as the vine, haue spread both fruitfull and faire; and whose rootes are fastned as the trees of Libanon: the Kings thereof, euen from the loines of this Great Conquerour, holding on a royall succession for the space of these five hundred forty five yeares, their issues topped with the highest Cedars of the world, & their branches spread thoroughout Christendom; which wee pray may still procede and continue, whilst the Sun and Moone haue their being.

Hob. Hastings.

(43) This victory thus obtained, Duke William wholly ascribed vnto God, and by way of a solemne supplication or procession gaue him the thanks; and pitching for that night his Paulis among the bodies of the dead, the next day returned to Hastings, there to consult vpon his great, and most prosperously begun enterprize, giuing first commandement for the buriall of his slaine Souldiers.

(44) But Morcar, and Edwin, the vnfortunate Queenes Brethren, by night escaping the battell, came vnto London, where with the rest of the Peeres, they began to lay the foundation of some fresh hopes, positing thence their messengers to raise a new supply, & to comfort the Englishe (who through all the Land were stricken into a fearfull astonishment with this vnexpected newes) from a despairing feare, shewing the chance of warre to be mutable, their number many, and Captaines sufficient to try another Field. Alfred, Arch-bishop of York, there present, and President of the Assembly, stoutly, and prudently gaue his counsell forthwith to consecrate, and crowne young Edgar Atheling (the true heire) for their King; to whom consented likewise both the Sea-Captaines, and the Londoners. But the Earles of Yorkshire and Cheshire, Edwin & Morcar (whom this fearfull state of their country could not dissuade from dissolualtic and ambition) plotting secretly to get the Crowne to themselves, hindered that wise and noble designe. In which while, the sorrowfull Queene their sister was conuicied to Westche, where, without state or title of a Queene, she led a solitary and quiet life.

(45) The Mother of the slaine King did not so well moderate her womanly passions, as to receiue either comfort, or counsell of her friends: the dead body of her sonne she greatly desired, and to that end sent to the Conquerour two face Brethren of his Abbey at Waltham, who had accompanied him in his vnfortunate expedition. Their names (as I finde them recorded in an old Manuscript) were Osgod and Alrie, whose message to the Conquerour not without abundance of teares, and feare, is there set downe in the tenor as followeth.

Math. Paris.

In the Library of the learned Knight, Sir Robert Cotton.

(46) Noble Duke, and ere long to be a most great and mightie King; we thy most humble servants, destitute of all comfort, (as we would we were also of life) are come to thee as sent from our brethren, whom this dead King hath placed in the Monasterie of Waltham, to attend the issue of this late dreadfull battell, (wherein God favouring thy quarrell, he is now taken away, and dead, which was our greatest Comforter, and by whose only bountifull goodnesse, we were releued and maintained, whom hee had placed to serue God in that Church. Wherefore we most humbly request thee (now our dread Lord) by that gracious fauour which the Lord of Lords hath shewed vnto thee, and for the releife of all their soules, who in this quarrell haue ended their daies, that it may bee lawfull for vs by thy good leaue, safely to take and carry away with vs the dead body of the King, the Founder and builder of our Church and Monasterie: as also the bodies of such others, as who, for the reuerence of him, and for his sake, desired also to be buried with vs, that the state of our Church, by their helpe strengthened, may bee the stronger, and endure the firmer. With whose humble request, and abundant teares, the victorious and worthy Duke moued, answered.

(47) Your King (said he) vnmindfull of his faith, although hee haue for the present endured the worthy punishment of his fault, yet hath he not therefore deferred to want the honour of a Sepulcher, or to lie vnburied: were it but that he died a King, howeuer hee came by the Kingdome, my purpose is for the reuerence of him, and for the health of them, who hauing left their wiues and possessions, haue here in my quarrell lost their liues, to build here a Church and a Monastery, with an hundred Monks in it to pray for them for ever; and in the same Church to bury your King about the rest, with all honour vnto so great a Prince, and for his sake to endow the same with great reuenues.

(48) With which his courteous speech and promises, the two religious Fathers comforted, and encouraged, againe replied.

(49) Not so, noble Duke, but grant this thy seruants most humble request, that we may, for God, by thyleaue, receive the dead body of our Founder, and to bury it in the place which himselfe in his life time appointed; that we cheered with the presence of his body, may thereof take comfort, and that his Tombe may be vnto our Successors, a perpetuall Monument of his remembrance.

(50) The Duke, as he was of disposition gracious, and inclined to mercy, forthwith granted their desires: whereupon they drew out store of gold to present him in way of gratulation; which he not only vterly refused, but also offered them plenty to supply whatsoeuer should be needfull for the pompe of his funerall, as also for their costs in trauell to and fro; giuing trauit commendement that none of his Souldiers should presume to molest him in this their business, or in their returne. Then went they in haste to the quarry of the dead, but by no means could finde the body of the King, for that the countenances of all men greatly alter by death; but being maimed and imbrued with blood, they are not knowne to be the men they were. As for his other regall Ornaments, which might haue shewed him for their King, his dead corps was despoiled of them, either through the greedy desire of prey, (as the manner of the Field is) or to be the first bringer of such happy newes, in hope of a Princely reward; vpon which purpose many times the body is both mangled and dismembred; and so was this King after his death, by a base Souldier, gasht and hackt into the legge, whom Duke William rewarded for so vnsouldier like a deed, cashiering him for euery out of his wages and wars. So that Harold lying stript, wounded, bemangled, and goared in his blood, could not be found or known, till they sent for a woman named Editha, (for her passing beauty surnamed swan-shals, that is, swan-neck, whom he entertained in secret loue before he was King, who by some secret marks of his body to her well knowne, found him out; and then put into a coffin, was by diuers of the Norman Nobility honourably brought vnto the place, afterward called Battle-bridge, where it was met by the Nobles of England, and so conueied to waltham, where there solemnly, and with great lamentation of his mother, royally interred, with this rude Epitaph, well bebecoming the time, though not the person.

*Hec cadit hoste ferro, Rex a Duce Rege futuro, Par paris in gladio, milite Cruce valido,
Firmum iusti lux est tibi, luce Calixti;
Promior hinc superas, hinc superatus eras.
Ergo tibi requiem deposcat utrumque perennem:
Sicque preceatur eum, quod colit omne Deum.*

*A fierce foe thee slew, thou a King, he King in view;
Both peeres, both peerlesse, both feard, and both fearles;
That sad day was mixt, by firmum and Calixt,
Thine helpe thee to vanquish, other made thee laughis,
Both now for thee pray, and thy Requiem say;
So let good men all, to God for thee call.*

(51) This Kings raigne was not so full of dayes as of great troubles: being but the space of nine months and nine dayes, in whom was completed the Period of the Saxons Empire in Brittain, after they had continued from their first erected kingdome by Hengist in Kent, the space of fixe hundred and tenne yeeres, without any reuerfement or interruption fauing the small Inter-Raignes of these three Danish Kings, of whom we haue spoken. And although Aemund of Brene, in the fauour of his Danes, sharply taxeth this Harold as being an impious man, and for that by vsurpation he aspired to the Crowne, yet doth Edred the Abbot of Riuaxe, (the Legendier of S. Edwards life) much commend him for his courteous affability, gentle deportment, and iustice, and for his warlike prowess none matchable vnto him; and was reputed (saith hee) verily a man passing well furnished with all vertues besitting a Soveraigne commander and borne euen to repaire the decayed state of England; had he not in the haughtinesse and opinion of his own valour and prudence, so much addicted himselfe to his owne resolutions, and too much neglected the wise deliberations of his best friends and counsellors.

His Wiues.

(52) The first wife of Harold, whom he had married and buried before he was King, I find not named by any of our writers; but that he had such a one, appeareth, where it is recorded that hee was a Widower, what time he contracted the Conquerors daughter; and that also he had children of such age, that they made warres against King William in the second of his Raigne; which it is probable, he had not by Editha, his Swannes neck, but were legitimat, and by this lawfull, though namelesse Mother.

(53) Algieth, the second wife to King Harold, was the widow of Gruffith ap Llewelyn King of North-wales, the sister of Edwine and Morcar Earles of Yorkshire, and Chester, and daughter of Algar sonne of Leofrick, son of Leofwine, all Earles of Chester, Leicester and Lincoln: She was married vnto him beeing then but Duke, in the last yeare of Edward Confessors raigne, and of Grace 1065. neither did shee long enjoy him, or her Queenly title, after his aspiring to the Crowne; for being resident in London when hee was slaine, from thence shee was conueyed by her brethren to Westchester, where he remained in meane estate, and in good quiet (which vially most attends the meaneft) without any princely shew or name, during the rest of her life, which lasted a great part of the Conquerors raigne.

His Issue.

(54) Goodwine the eldest sonne of King Harold, being growne to some ripenesse of yeares in the life of his Father, after his death and ouerthrow by the Conquerour took he his brother with him, and fled ouer into Ireland: from whence he returned, and landed in Sommerfetshire; slew Ednoth (a Baron sometime of his Fathers) that encountered him, and taking great preyes in Devonshire and Cornwall, departed till the next yeare. When comming againe, hee fought with Beorn an Earle of Cornwall, and after retired into Ireland, and thence went into Denmarke to King Swain his Cosen-German, where he spent the rest of his life.

(55) Edmund, the second sonne to King Harold, went with his Brother into Ireland, returned with him into England, and was at the slaughter and ouerthrow of Ednoth, and his power in Sommerfetshire, at the spoiles committed in Cornwall and Devonshires; at the conflict with the Cornish Earle Beorn; passed and repassed with him in all his voiajes, inuasions and warres, by sea and by land, in England and Ireland; and at the last departed with him from Ireland to Denmarke; tooke part with him of all pleasure and calamity whatsoeuer, and attending and depending wholly vpon him, liued and died with him in that Country.

(56) Magnus the third son of King Harold, went with his brothers into Ireland; and returned with them the first time into England, and is neuer after that mentioned amongst them, nor elsewhere, vnllesse, (as some doe coniecture) he be that Magnus who seeing the mutability of humane affairs, became an Anchorer, whose Epitaph pointing to his Danish original, the learned Clarentiaux diicouered in a little desolate Church at Lewes in Suffex, where in the gaping chinks of an Arch in the wall, in a rude and ouerworne Character, certaine old imperfect verses were found, which hee suppoeth should bee thus read;

*Claudatur hic Miles Danorum regia proles, Magnus nomen ei, magna nota Progeniei.
Deponens Magnum, prudenter induit agnum:
Præpete pro vita, sit paruulus Anachorita.*

*Here lies a Knight of Danish regall race,
He Magnus high; great name note of great place:
But Magnus left, an Agnus mild he prou'd,
From world bereft, an Anchorite below'd.*

(57) Walse the fourth sonne of King Harold, seemeth to bee borne of Queene Algieth his second wife, for that hee was neuer mentioned among his other brethren, and hauing better friends by his mothers side, was left in England, whereas they were forced thence; neither is he spoken of, during all the raign of the Conquerour, and therefore at his entrance may probably be thought to haue bene but an Infant: yet after his death he is named among his prisoners with Earle Morcar (his vncl, if Queen Algieth were his mother) and was by King William Rufus re-lealed, and honoured by him with the Order of Knighthood.

(58) Gunhild a daughter of King Harold is mentioned by John Capgrau (the Writer of the English Saints) in the life of Wolstan Bishop of Worcester, reporting her to haue bene a Nunne in a Monastery of England; who, among the many miracles done by the said Wolstan, (which hee numbrell by tale, according to the superstitious manner of the time wherein heliued) declareth, how he restored this Lady to her perfect eye-sight, whereof by a dangerous infirmity, she was almost wholly, and in most mens opinions, vncurablely deprived.

(58) Another daughter of King Harold not named by any Story-writer of our own nation, is mentioned by Saxo Grammaticus in his Danish history, to haue come into Denmarke, with her two brethren; to haue been very honorably entertained by King Swaine the younger, her kinsman; and afterwards to haue been as honorably placed in marriage with Grellef, called in Latine Iarislauus, and of the Danes Waldemar, King of the Russians; and by him to haue had a daughter, that was the mother of Waldemar, the first of that name King of Denmarke, from whom all the Danish Kings for many ages after succeeded.

THE SVCCESION OF ENGLANDS MONARCHES FROM THE ENTRANCE OF THE NORMANS VNDER
WILLIAM THE CONQUEROVR: VNTILL THE REGALL RIGHT OF THE WHOLE ILAND WERE BY GODS PROVIDENCE VNITED VNDER
ONE IMPERIAL DIADEME, IN THE PERSON OF OVR PRE-SENT SOVERAIGNE KING JAMES, SOLE MONARCH OF GREAT BRITAIN: THEIR SEVERALL ACTS, ISSVES, RAIGNES, ARMES, SEALES, AND COINES.

CHAPTER I.

What hath beene spoken touching the Originals, Lawes, and Customes of the Saxons, and Danes, the ancient Conquerours and possessors of this our land, may in like sort bee said of the Normans (being abrach from the same roote) of whom wee are now to write, saying only that the name is not so ancient, and therefore their Manners may bee thought more ciuill. Through the misty-darke times of which Stories, together with that of the Romans, and of our Britainers, (wherein no brighter Sun did shine vnto vs) by the assistance of the all-seeing power which bringeth light out of darkness, I am lastly approached to these times of more light, and vnto affaires of more certaine truth: whose Current to my seeming is made now Nauigable, by the many writers that haue emptied their full channels into this Sea: wherein, though in respect of my owne defects, and that so many Master-Pilotes haue sailed before me, it may seeme but presumption for me to direct another course, with a purpose to better what they haue so well performed: yet to make a complete History from the first to the last: giue me leaue to continue, as I haue begunne.

(2) These Normans then, being anciently a mixt Nation with the warlike Norwegians, Swedens, & Danes, tooke their Name of that Northern Climate from whence they came first, which was that Coast of Germany, anciently called Cimbrica Chersonesus, and Nor-way, for that it tendeth in respect of situation so farre Northward; and from hence, and the parts adjacent, the Saxons, Jutes, Angles, and lately the Danes, made their incursions into this Land.

(3) This Tract therefore as the wombe of conception, by the dispose of the Omnipotent, after it had produced those Nations which formerly made Conquests of Britaine, now againe brought forth (as it were) her last-borne Benjamin, who denouring the pray in the morning, hath diuided the spoile in the Evening, and hitherto continued their glorious fame attieued; which I pray, may extend to the last period of Times being: For these Normans first by force got footing in France with the Dominion, and Stile of a Duke, and next the Diadem of this faire Empire, the last and most famous Monarches of the same.

(4) These, formerly practicing Piracies vpon the Coasts of Belgia, Frizia, England, Ireland, and France, proceeded in their hardy courtes euen to the Mediterranean Sea: insomuch that Charles the Great seeing their roauing tall Ships, and considering the bold attempts they vndertook, with a deepe sigh, and abundance of teares, is reported to haue said: Heaue am I at the very heart, that in my owne life time, these Pirates dare to come vpon my Coasts, whereby I foresee what mischief they will worke vpon my Posteritie. Which indeede proued so great, that in their publike Processions, and Letanies of the Church, this Petition was added, From the rage of the Normans, Good Lord deliuer vs. This feare, and prair notwithstanding, they draue the French to such extremitie, that King Charles the Bald was forced to giue vnto Hastings a Norman Arch-pirate, the Earldome of Chertsey, for to assuage his furie exercised vpon his People; and againe, King Charles the Grasse, granted vnto Godfrey the Norman part of Neustria, with his Daughter in marriage: Yet all this sufficed not, but that the Normans by force of Armes feared themselves neere vnto the mouth of Sein, taking all for their owne that lay comprised betwixt that Riuer and the Riuer Loire: which Countrey afterwards tooke the name of Normanny fro these Northern Guests, at what time King Charles the Simple, confirmed it vnto Rollo their Captain.

(5) This Rollo, as say the Danish Historians, was the son of Guion, a great Lord in Denmark, who with his brother Gaurin were appointed to depart the Country (according to the Danish customes) to seeke their adventures abroad, and leaue more room for the rest at home; but these refusing the order made warre vpon the King, in which, both Guion the Father and Gaurin the sonne, were slaine, and Rollo forced to fly for safeguard of his life, with whom went a number of Gallants to seeke Fortunes Court, and not a few mildoes, or out-lawed men: whose Acts in England registred by Albertus Krantius, seeing they vary from our owne historians in circumstances of times, and names, I haue chosen in this place to inferre, leaving the credit thereof to him the Reporter.

(6) Rollo, a Nobleman of Denmarke, (saith he) and too powerful in his Kings eye, was forced with a Navy to aduenture his Fortunes into forreine parts, whose first arriage, as he saith, was in England, where many of the Danish nobility had formerly tried their valours, and some of them attained to the Scepter, if not of the whole, yet of a great part of that kingdom. Indeed, (saith he) England from the beginning was not governed governed by one King, as now it is, for the Angle-Saxons had their province, and the Mercians theirs, both governed by Provinciall Deputies, but the Northumbrians had a King, as the Scots and Pitts also, in the same Ilands, had kept their own limits under the like Government. Amongst these Northumbrians the Danes had their cheefest abiding, and in this Province Rollo the Dane brought first his men on Land, where making warre upon that Nation, he built both Castles and Fortresses to fortifie himselfe, his Navy lying upon the Seas, and proceeding forward into the Continent, tooke great bootie both of men, cattle, and other spoiles, lading their ships as they lay at Anchor: the Inhabitants of the Country making head against him, had still the worst.

(7) Rollo yet doubtful and in suspense what to doe, desired indeed to returne to his Country, but that the Kings indignation was an obstacle that way: next hee affected to try his Fortunes in France, yet feared the issue would be dangerous, the People being exasperated against him, for the harms he had done them: but chiefly the Diademe of England ran most in his minde, though hee knew the hazard was great, to match his small Forces with an host of a King: in which perplexed thoughts, it chanced him (saith my Author) to fall into a sweet slumber, and in his sleepe he seemed to sit in the Kingdome of France, upon a high hill, bending his head forward to a kiner which issued from the top of a mountain, at the foote whereof beneath him, hee saw many Kindes of Birds, which walked their ruddy left wings in the same water, where they all fed together, flew about, built their nests, and at times appointed, brought forth their young.

(8) Rollo awaking from his pleasing dream, imparted the same vnto his comforts, desiring their iudgements for interpretation, which no way satisfying him, hee called a Christian of his English Captives, a man industrious, and of great Capacity, and of whose deep understanding he had a great opinion: this captiue then boldened, (and willing in likelihood, to diuert Rollo from infesting England) told him, that his dreame was significant and good, and did prognosticate the happy successe of himselfe and whole Nation: for by this he saw that he was shortly to receive a quiet possession, and a land of great renown in the Continent of France, and that himselfe should be cleaned in the Laver of Baptisme, wherein also the ruddy fins of his People should be washed away, as the water had done the wings of the Birds.

(9) This interpretation pleased Rollo well, and he easily belueed that which he most affected, as in the like kinde dreamers commonly doe: therefore prouiding all things for France, he set his countenance only that way, yet because he had already performed great matters in England, he thought to follow Fortune for his best Leader, and before he departed from so fair a land, intended to found the King by an Ambassage, that so it might find him inclinable to a league, he might haue a refuge against future chaunces; if not, then was he resolute to go forward with his iourney: therefore making choice of certaine actiue persons, sent them to the English King Alstan, a Prince of a speciall religion and holines of life: these hauing audience, vttered their message as followeth.

(10) Wee being men distressed, and driven from our Country, sought out in banishment an habitation to rest in, and going forth, very many followed us, who encouraged us to seek and winne a land by Conquest, supplying us with strength, and giving us great hope of victory: which thing when wee refused to take in hand, a Tempest of weather drave us (O King) into these English Ports, where staying a full season to put againe forth, the Winter withheld us, and our wants made us to seeke further into the Land: whereupon our men, cucumore brought up to the warre, being euill intreated of these inhabitants, were moved by such iniuries to provide for their owne defence, wherein some small skirmishes haue passed betwixt them. Our Prince therefore and Generall Rollo doth humbly require peace of thee, and to be permitted to sojourn in thy Land for a time, and to relieue his company with things necessary, wee paying sufficiently for it: these things when thou shalt grant, hee shall rest content and pacified, untill the next spring, at which time hee means to take his intended voyage.

(11) Alstenus, not ignorant of the Danish cruelty, and with how great Armies they might oppress the English thores, did readily grant what they required: And also added a further curtesie, saying withall, I doe greatly desire to see your Duke himselfe: and let him not thinke much to repaire to our mansions, for he shall find none among it vs but his most loving friends. When this was signified to Rollo, choosing out the tallest and goodliest persons of his company, and such as were of greatest wisdom, with them he very ioyfully meett the King, is entertained, presents him with great gifts, but receiueh greater: Then sitting downe to talke and commune:

(12) I am (saith King Alstenus) right gladd, most worthy Duke Rollo, to see you in this my Court. The renowne of your Nation hath bene related to mee, a Martiall kind of People you are, and in fight unconquerable. And you your selfe also for your prowess, are not vnnoted among the rest of your famous Worthies: your valiant exploits are well knowne vnto vs: It is right pleasing vnto vs to enter with such men into amitie. Behold our whole kingdome is before you, chooe out a feate for your selfe, and your people where you best like, for we will haue an euermore league betwixt vs.

(13) Rollo, glad of so faire promises, replied: Most worthy and renowned King, I highly esteeme of your bonifitull and most liberal proffers: God grant a happy successe of our affaires. I doe thinke my selfe most bounden to deuote to your worthines; and if destine euer answer to our desires, we will not be vnthankfull for this your so great benignity. To ease our selues in your kingdome, though in dedee we are very willing, and your Royall proffers do much more incite vs, yet Fate doth not permit it. I haue determined (and will certainly performe) to goe into France. For your gifts bestowed on me, I esteeme them in the highest degree: and right well content I am to haue a perpetuall League with you, that the like Fortune may befall vs both, the one to be a safeguard to the other. Thus I both offer, and accept of: Thus his League God grant may to vs both proue happy and fortunate.

(14) With such like interchanges the time much spent, and night drawing on, they were brought to banquet: And early the next morning, comming forth of their lodgings, most louingly embraced each other, when each gaue & receiued presents best fitting with their estates and occasions. Neither doth Krantius stay his penne there, but proceedeth to particular affaires betwixt these two Princes, without the concurrence of any of our owne writers.

(15) As how the English rose in Armes against Alstenus their King, taking opportunity of the time, for that Rollo (whom they knew to be ioined in a most strait confederacy with their Soueraigne) being then employed in the warres of France, could not come or send to his aide: Alstenus therefore oppressed with a tumultuous kingdome, remembered Rollo his faithfull friend, and sending Ambassadors declared vnto him what distresse hee was in; who nor vnmindfull of the firme league betwixt them, left his French wars, and prepared for England with all his Forces, where entering the Iland, he easily quieted the tumultuous rebels, ransacking their Cities, curbing their wildenes, and so reducing them at last to an orderly subiection. For which his great loue, care, & pains, the King not vnthankfull, resolu'd to requite him with the halfe of his kingdome, appointing the Cities and limiting the bounds, which each of them should rule and gouerne as their owne possessions.

(16) Rollo in the meane time, as careful of the peaces continuance, as regardless of so great remunerations, taketh pledges of the Rebels for securing their loialtie to the King, and peaceable bearing towards himselfe; vpon accomplishment whereof, repairing to Alstenus he thus bespake him.

(17) Seeing (King Alstenus) you haue so highly rewarded me, both with princely entertainment, and bon-sifull presents, I can doe no lesse, then willingly bestow vpon you thes my paines for your safetie: it is no more then your desert: doe challenge, neither will I accept, or seeme so vn-courteous as to expect, for my paines, any part of your dominion. Your selfe now may well gouerne it; for France calles for my presence: keepe therefore those your Pledges, brought to you by your Subiects, and there is no doubt but you shall hence forward gouerne your Kingdome in a settled and contentfull quietnesse.

(18) The King could not containe those his eies, which now beheld in a stranger so strange and vnex-pected kindnes, from resolu'ing into teares; giuing him both hearty thanks, and rich gifts, seeing hee could not falten on him any portion of his Kingdome: of whom, all that Rollo desired was this, that he would giue licence to such voluntary Souldiers as would goe with him into France: whereto Alsten, ready in all things to gratifie his desire, gladly condescended, and furnished him with attendants.

(19) But leaving Krantius the Dane, as likewise Gemetius the Norman, to fauour their Country, & these their reports, to the best liking of the iudicious, most certaine it is, that the French King Charles, commonly called the Simple, gaue the Duchie of Normandy with his daughter Gilla (whose mother was Agnina, the daughter of Edward the Elder, King of England) vnto Rollo the Dane, as is recorded in an old manuscript belonging to the Monastery of Angiers. And when Rollo was baptized, Charles receiuing him for his God-sonne at the Font, he was there required to doe homage for his Dukedome receiued, and inioined therein to kisse the Kings foot, which hee did, but with some disgrace to King Charles, and bound it with an oath that hee did not receiue it vpon courtlesse.

(20) This Rollo by his second wife Popee, (for Gilla died childlesse) daughter to the Earle of Besin and Basleux, had a sonne named William, surnamed Long-espee, and a daughter called Giraeta, who was afterwards married to the Duke of Guyan.

(21) William Long-espee (so called of the Long Sword hee usually wore) the second Danish Duke of Normandy, took vnto wife sporta the daughter of Hubert, Earle of Sentlis, by whom hee had only Richard his sonne: this William receiuing baptism, receiued therewith a new name, and was thenceforth called Robert, who hauing gouerned his Dukedome with great moderation the space of twenty yeeres, was guilefully murdered by the working of Lewes King of France, to the great griefe of his people, who so far followed the reuenge, that they intercepted Lewes in the Citie Rothomage, and detained him their prisoner, till he agreed to these Articles: That young Richard should succeed his flaine Father in the foresaid Dukedome; and that thenceforth when the King & Duke should conferr together, the Duke should bee girt with his Sword, and the King disabled either of Sword or knife: to which Lewes yielded vpon his corporall oth.

(22) Richard thus established, gouerned his Dukedome the space of fifty two yeeres. Hee was a man of an admirable fortitude, and therefore was called Richard the Hardy. His first wife was Agnes, daughter to Hugh le Grand, Earle of Paris, Lord Abbot of Germans, and Father to Hugh Capet of France; but the dying issuelesse, hee secondly married Gunnor, a Gentlewoman of the Danish blood, (whom hee had kept his Concubine before) by whom hee had three sonnes and three daughters: the first was Richard that succeeded in his dominions; the second was Robert Archbishop of Roan; and the third was called Maligner: his daughters were Hawila, the wife of Geoffrey Earle of Britaine, and mother to Alane and Guye his sonnes. Maud espoused * Eudes Earle of Chartiers and Blais: and Emma called the Flower of Normandy, was Queene of England, both by the English King Ethelred, and Canutus the Dane, to both which shee was married.

(23) Richard the second, surnamed the Good, was the fourth Duke of Normandy, and ruled the same for twenty foure yeeres: In whose time the Normans began to be great, and gracious in England, the marriage of his Sister making their way: his first wife was Judith the Sister of Geoffrey Earle of Britaigne, by whom hee had issue, Richard, the first Duke of Normandy, and Robert the first, William a Monke, and Nicholas Abbot of S. Andrew: his daughters by her were, Alice, that died young, and another of the same name married to Reinold, Earle of Bargaine, and Eleanor espoused to Baldwin the fourth Earle of Flanders; who bare vnto him Baldwin the fifth, father of Maud that was Queene of England, and wife to the Conquerour.

(24) The second wife to Duke Richard the second, was Esfrize, Sister to Cannie King of England, from whom hee purchased a Diuorce, without any issue begotten on her body; and then taking for his third wife a faire Gentlewoman named Paula, had issue by her William Earle of Arques, and Mauger Archbishop of Roane.

(25) Richard the third of that name, and fifth Duke of Normandy, in the second yeere of his Dukedome died an vtinely death, not without suspicion of Poyson, ministred by Robert his younger brother, who presently was inducted in the Duchie, for that hee left no issue of his body to succeed.

(26) This Robert (Duke Richards Brother) was a man of a magnanimous spirit, and of such bounteous liberality as is vncredible. Hee comming to the Citie Phaleisa in Normandy, chanced to see a most goodly and beautifull damosell, dancing among others of her familiar consorts; her name was Arlet, of meane parentage (the daughter of a Skinner, saith Higden) whose pleasing feature and comely grace fo pleased the Duke, that taking her to his bed, hee begot on her, William his only sonne, (who proued the only man of the Normans blood) and after vpon a remorse of conscience, vnderooke a pilgrimage vnto Ierusalem, from whence hee neuer againe returned. Arlet in Roberts life time was married to Herlaine a Norman Gentleman, but of meane substance; to whom the bare Ode Biishop of Baion, by his halfe-brother William created Earle of Kent; and Robert created Earle of Mortaigne, a man of a dull and grosse wit; & a daughter named Emma, wife to Richard count of Auranches, (a Prouince in Normandy,) the mother of Hugh Lupus Earle Palatine of Chester. And thus farre breefly I haue thought good to prosecute the Line of the Normans, for the better illustration of our English Stories.

(27) Duke Robert intending his pious pilgrimage vnto the holy land, assembled all his Nobility vnto the Citie Fisan, where hee caused them to sweare fealty vnto his sonne William, being then but seuen yeeres old, committing him to the Gouernance of one Gilbert, an Earle of much integrity and prudence, and the defence of that Gouernment vnto Henry the French King, and so in the eight yeere of his Dukedome, set on his voyage for Ierusalem; who entering Iurys, and not able to traualle, was born in a litter vpon the Saracens shoulders, and nere vnto the Citie, meeting a returning Pilgrime, desired him to report in his Country what hee there saw, which is, (saith hee) that I am carried to Heaven vpon the Diuels backe: but so farre was he borne that he neuer returned, being preuented by death: which the Norman Peeres hearing, made vse thereof for their owne ambitious ends, without any regard of young William their Pupill and Soueraigne, and grown into factions, greatly troubled the Peace of their Country, wherein Earle Gilbert the Protector was slaine, by Randulphus the young Dukes Cousen-Germane.

(28) The beginner of these stirres was another of his kinsmen, euen Guy of Burgoine, the sonne of Duke Richards daughter, brought vp with William in his youth, and euer in his most especial esteeme; who, vpon a vaine hope to aspire to an Earldome, got the aide of the Vicounts, Nigel, and Randulph, but tooke such a fall a fall before he could ascend the highest step, that in losing his footing he lost therewith his head.

(29) Strife also arose betwixt yong William, and his Vnckle William the base-borne Earle of Archie. Whereupon King Henry of France, who till then had held this Wolfe by the earc, fearing some hazzard to him selfe, if he should now let him go, thought it best to aid the Earle in his cause, and therefore sent him supplie vnder the leading of some men of note; but William so begit this Castle with strat siege, that hee caused the Earle by famishment to yleed vp his Fort, and droue the French with disgrace out of the field: where, with such successe he still prospered, that Henry now, to secure his own Confinnes, sent Odo his brother for Prefect, into those Parts, that lay betwixt the Riuers Reyn and the Seyn.

(30) William as watchfull as the French King was jealous, sent against Odo, Robert Count Auenst, Hugh Gornacensis, Hugh Mountfort, and William Chirspine, all of them stout Souldiers, which so brauely bare them selues, that Odo was the first man that made away, and the rest of the French saued themselves by flight.

(31) William that had sworne a league with King

Henry, and in his Minority had euer found him his gracious Guardian, was loth to endanger the breach of his Oath, or the duty that loue and deserts had obliged him vnto; and therefore by this Stratagem hee sought to dislodge the French. In the silence of Night when in the Kings Campe all were at rest, he caused to be cried aloud, the flight of Odo, and his discomfiture, with no lesse terror then it was; which rang so shrill in the eares of the French, that Henry thought best to be gone: leauing William the absolute Lord of Normandie.

(32) Which he valiantly defended, and vprightly gouerned all the daies of King Henry: whose death presently caused an alteration of State; for he leauing Baldwine surnamed the Gentle, and fifth Earle of Flanders, Tutor to his yong Sonne Philip, the quarrell betwixt those two Princes had an end; Baldwine on the one side so working his Pupill, and on the other the Normane, (who was his sonne in law) that a most firme League was ratified betwixt them, and kept vniuolated so long as William was a Duke: where wee will leaue him in prosperitie and peace, and proceed in our intendment, as he did in his Conquest here in England.

CHAPTER II.

Battle Field wonne with the losse of little lesse then sixty eight thousand men, and Harold in Souldier-like exequies borne vnto Waltham in Essex, & there honourably enterred, as we haue said: William the Conqueror, (for so now may wee stile him) returned to Hasting, and thence set forward with spoile of the Country, ouer Thamesis towards London.

(2) Where Edwine and Morcar, the Brethren of the Queen, were in working the English, that one of them should be King, or rather, saith Simon of Durham, to crowne Edgar Etheling, the rightfull heire, in such esteeme with the People, that he was commonly called Englands Darling; vnto whose side most of the Nobles adhered, with the Citizens of London, and the Nauall forces; to which part also ioined Aldred Archbishop of York, though presently he fel off and stuck to the stronger; for the Prelates, though secretly affecting the right claime, yet terrified with the flashing thunderbolts of the Papall curie, durst not goe forward with their purpose (so powerful was the Pope, euen then to defeat the rightfull heires of kingdomes) but refused to side with the Lords, wherupon all their designements were suddainely quashed.

(3) For William hauing wasted through Kent, Sussex, Surrey, Hampshire, and Barkshire, came vnto Wallingford, and croising there the Thamesis, passed through the Counties of Oxford, Buckingham and Hertford, where staying at Berkhamsted, Aldred Archbishop of York, Wolstane Bishop of Worcester, Walter Bishop of Hereford, with the Earles Edwin and Morcar, yea and Edgar himself, yielded their allegiance vnto the Duke: This curse so preuailing, farre farre engaged William to the Pope.

(4) William intending for London, being on his way, found the passage stoppt vp with multitudes of great trees, which by the policy of Frethericke Abbot of S. Albans, (a man descended from the Saxons noble blood, as likewise from Canutus the Dane) to secure his Monasterie from the destruction of the Normans, were so cut downe: whereat the Duke both wondering and fretting, sent for the Abbot, vnder his assurance of safe returne, and demanding the cause why his woods were so cut; Frethericke answered very stoutly, I have done (said he) the duty both of my birth and profession, and if others of my ranke had performed the like, as they well might and ought, it had not bene in thy power to haue pierced the land thus farre.

(5) William hearing the bold answere of this Prelate, and knowing it was now a time fitter to pacifie, then exulcerate the English spirits, gaue way to the present necessity, and withall hastned (as good policy required) his coronation, which at Westminster was solemnized vpon Monday, being the day of Christs Nativity, and yeere of saluation, 1066, where herecruiced the crowne at the hands of Aldred Archbishop of York; causing the Bishops and Barons to take the oath of allegiance vnto him; and himselfe likewise at the altar of S. Peters, tooke a solemne oath to defend the rights of the Church, to establish good lawes, and to see iustice vprightly administered, as became a good King; and thereupon chose for his counsell, such men as he knew to bee of great wisdome and experience: next applying his thoughts for the security of his new gotten Empire; fortified such places as lay open to danger, bestowed strong Garrisons vpon the coasts, & ships to ride in those Harbours which were most exposed to invasion.

(6) And the better to assure the south of the land, (best seruing his purpose, if any new troubles should arise) hee tooke his way towards Douer, the locke and key of the Kingdom, as Mathew Paris terms it; that so hee might command the seas from his enemies arriuage, and ouerawe the Kentish a most strong and populous Prouince. When Stigand therefore Archbishop of Canterbury, and Egeline the Politicke Abbot of Saint Augustines (being the chiefeft Lords and Gouvernours of Kent) vnderstoode of his approach, they assembled the Commons at Canterbury, laying forth the perils of the Prouince, the miseries of their neighbours, the pride of the Normans, and the wronges of the Church; all which now were too apparently scene: the English till then, (they sayd,) were borne free, and the name of bond-men not heard of among them; but now seruitude only attend vs, if wee yeeld (sayd they) to the insoleny of this griping enemy: These two Prelates therefore, after the example of the vndaunted Machabees, offered themselues to die in the defence of their Country, whose forwardnesse drew the people vnto the like resolution, which by their aduertisements were assigned to meete at a day, the place was Swancombe, two miles west from Grauesend.

(7) Where accordingly conuening, and keeping secret in the woods, they waited the coming of the Conquerour, all iointly agreeing, for that no way lay open save onely a front, to carry in their hands keepe branches of trees, wherewith they might both keepe themselves from discovery, and (if need were) impeach the passage of the Normans: which device tooke so strange an effect, that it daunted the Duke euen with the sight at his approach; who being, as he thought, free from the enemy, was now suddainly beset on all sides with woods, whereoffeing some before him to moue, he knew not but that all the other vast woods were of like nature, neither had hee leisure to auoide the danger. The Kentish inclosing his Army about, displayed their banners, cast downe their boughes, and with bowes bent prepared for battle; so that hee which euen now had the Realme to his seeming in his fist, stood in despair of his owne life; of which his sodaine amazement, the reuerend Prelates Stigand and Egeline taking notice, & also aduantage, presented themselues before him, and in the behaile of the Kentish thus spake.

(8) Most noble Duke, behold here the Commons of Kent are come forth to meete and receive you as their Sovereigne, requiring your Peace, their own free condition of estate, and their ancient lawes formerly used: if these be denied, they are here presently to abide the verdict of battaile, fully resolved rather to die, then to depart with their lawes, or to liue seruite in bondage; which name and nature is, and euer shall be strange vnto vs, and not to be endured.

The Conquerour driuen into this strait, and loath to hazard all on so nice a point, their demands being not vnreasonable, more wisely then willinglie granted their desires; and pledges on both parts giuen for performance, Kent yeeldeth her Earledome; and Cattle of Douer to their new King William.

(9) All things established for Englands securitie, and subiection now to the Normans; hee ordained his halfe brother by the surer side, Odo Bishop of Bayeux, (whom hee created Earle of Kent) and his coven William-Fitz-Osborne (by him made Earle of Hereford) to bee Gouvernours in his absence ouer the Realme; and in the Lent following failed into Normandy, leading with him many pledges for their fidelity, besides other Nobles, especially such as hee feared to be too potent; amongst whom, Stigand the Archbishop of Canterbury, the two great Earles Edwin and Morcar, Edgar surnamed Etheling, Fretherik Abbot of S. Albans, Aeglethous Abbot of Glasterbury, Walteof the sonne of the warlike Sirard Earle of Northumberland, Roger Earle of Hertford, Rainulph Earle of Cambridge, and Gospatrike Earle of Cumberland, were the men of greatest note; yet was hee no sooner gone, but that Edrick surnamed Syluaticus (sonne to Africke the brother of Edrick Sirona, the treacherous Earle of Mercia, a man of great spirit, and of no little power, aided by the Welshmen, tooke vp armes and denied subiection to the Normans, so that by either parties (as in ciuill discords it euer falleth out) great spoiles were made in many places; but most of all in Herefordshire, where Robert Fitz-Sceope left to man the Castle, did much hurt vpon the Tenants of Edricke, and he to requite him with the like, calling to his aide Blethyn and Rywalbon Kings of Wales, wasted all to the mouth of Wye.

(10) These stirres in England called William out of Normandy, and were so distastfull to his great, but ill digested stomacke, that hee began to hold the reine straiter, and harder to curbe the head-strong English, giuing the possessions of their Nobles vnto his Normans, and laying vnwonted taxes & heauie subsidies vpon the Commons, then which nothing bred him more hatred, in so much, that many of them, to enioy a barren liberty, forsooke their fruitfull inheritance, and with their Wives & Children, as outlawes, liued in the Woods, preferring that naked name of freedom, before a sufficient maintenance posselt vnder the thraldome & tyranny of their Conquerors: but in short time, to sustaine their wants, (easily conceived, but hardly indured) they so fell to spoyle and robbe, that the high waies lay vtrod from towne to towne, yea and priuate houses euery where so guarded with bowes, billes, polaxes, swords and clubs, as if they had been not harbours of peace, but fortresses of warre; when praies were made at the stuffing in, and opening of their dores, as in times of open hostilitie. On the other side, such as preferred vassallage with some hope of tollerableness (yea, or vtollerableness) viage, they to curry fauour with the Normans, seeming to forget who they were, became as strangers themselues, and did shauie their beards, round their haire, and in arment, behauiour, and diet, altogether vnafashioned ned themselues to imitate them: it being a shame in those daies, euen amongst Englishmen, to bee an Englishman.

(11) Vnto these Malecontents, and voluntarie Out-laws, ioined Morcar and Edwine, the stout Earles of Chester and Yorkshire, setting vp again for their Captaine Edgar Etheling (which if in due time at first they had done, might haue proued successful) who with their complices right valiantly for a time resisted the Normans, and in their proceedings put many of them to the sword. King William as carefull and sedulous to preuent further mischief, collecting his forces, and not without danger of his life, disfolued their power, so that euery man sought how to faue himselfe by escape: among whom Edwin and Morcar, Weltherfus and Mertther, with some of the Bishops and Clergie went into Scotland. Marleswin, and Gospatrike, Noblemen of Northumberland went into Denmarke: Edgar Atheling, with his mother Agatha, and his sisters Christian and Margaret, tooke the seas for Hungarie; but by contrary winds were driuen into Scotland, where they were most courteously entertained by Malcolme (surnamed Cannor) King of that Country, who so affected the person and qualities of Lady Margaret, that hee entred with her a Nuptiall contract, and the rather in respect of her possibillity and neerenesse to the English crowne, whose marriage was solemnized about the feast of Easter, in the second of King William's raigne, whereby Scotland became a sanctuary to the English, which daily fledde thither from the pressures of the Normans.

(12) The Conquerour now perceiving the occasion of new stirres, sent vnto King Malcolme for the deliuerie of Edgar his enemy, which if he refused, hee threatened to denounce open warre against Scotland. But Malcolme minding more his owne honour, then King William's threats, returned this answere, That he held it an vnjust thing, yea and (in a Prince) a wicked part, to betray him to his enemy, that came vnto his Court for protection, as Prince Edgar was forced for feare of his life, whose innocency and demeanour toward William, his greatest aduerfariie, could not touch with the least suspect: alledging further (besides the respect of ordinary humanity, in this case euer religiously to be obserued) the straight bands of their neeralliance, which required him to tender the afflicted estate of his most louing wiues, most loued brother, committing vnder his Canopie, as it were for defence.

(13) William thus frustrate of all hope from king Malcolme, and daily perplexed at the flight of the English vnto his kingdom, feared a reuolt & dangerous rebellions to preuent which, hee caused foure strong castles to bee built, one at Hasting, another at Lincolne, the third at Nottingham, & the fourth at Torke, wherein hee bestowed strong Garrisons: and disarming the English of armour, commanded euery house-holder to put out both fire and candle at eight of the clocke at night; at which houre, in euery City, Towne and Village, he caused a bell to be rung, of the French then called Courfem (that is, Cour-fire) partly yet in practise, and in name verie neer, commonly called Curfew: to preuent nightly tumults that might happily be done.

(14) All this his circumspection notwithstanding, could not preuent the troubles that presently arose, for Goodwin and Edmund, the sonnes of the late King Harold, coming with some forces out of Ireland, and landing in Somersetshire, fought with Adonithus, (sometime master of their fathers horse, but now a Norman) whom they slew with many others, and taking great booties both in Cornwall and Devonshire, departed againe for Ireland.

Exceter likewise, seeking to shake off the fetters of the Normans bondage, as also Northumberland, to recouer their former liberties, tooke Armes against whom, King William in all hast possible, sent Robert Curmur, and went himselfe strongly prepared against Exceter, which hee most straitly beleaguered; at which time the Citizens thought it not enough to shutre their gates against him, but contemptuously taunted and flouted him, vntill a great peece of the wall falling downe by the especial hand of God, (as the Historians of that age report) they immediately set open their gates, and submitted themselues to his mercy. The chiefe instigator to their disloyalty was Githa the mother of King Harold, and sister to Swain King of Denmarke, with others siding against the Normans; who now seeing the yeelding vp of that Citie, shifted themselues out of danger, and got ouer vnto Flanders.

(15) But fortune to Cumin was not so fauourable in the North, nor himselfe so circumspect as valiant; for lying securely, as hee thought in the City Durham, hee was on the sodaine surprisid in the night by Edgar Atheling and his followers, where Robert and seuen hundred of his Normans were slain, one onely escaping, who brought the bloody news thereof to King William, which hapned in the third of his raigne, the twenty eight of January, and yeere of Christ, 1068. The depth of Winter notwithstanding, hee posted into the north, whose only terror danted all further attempts, so that taking some of the Authors of this rebellion, hee cut off their hands and some of their heads, conceiuing hereupon more hatred against the English, and in that spleene of displeasure returned to London.

(16) Whiles these insurrections were on foot in England, the fugitiue English in Denmarke so far preuailed with King Swaine, that they procured his aid to recouer their rights, and the rather, as they alledged, for that the Crowne of England was his, descending from those that had before made conquest thereof: hee therefore sent a puissant Naue of three hundred saile well fraught with souldiers, vnder the conduct of Osborne his brother, and Harold and Canute his sonnes; who arriuing in Humber, landed their men for Torke, and wasted the Country all the way as they went; vnto whom shortly ioined Edgar and his associates out of Scotland, so that their Army was exceedingly strong. Whose approach so terrified the Torke, that for very griefe thereof their Archbishop Aldred, (who was wholly become the Normans fauourite) died, and the Norman Garrisons that there kept, lest the enemy should haue any shelter or succour, set their suburbs on fire; the flame whereoff carried with an ouer-high wind, soone consumed a great part of the City itselfe, and therein, the faire Cathedral Church of S. Peters, with a famous Library thereto adioining.

(17) The Citizens, and Souldiers thus beset with sodaine flames, thinking to secure their liues frō the fire, did enahazard them on the fury of the sword; for committing vnawares vpon these hardy and well appointed Danes, were forced to come to a disordered fight, wherein though for a time they behaued themselues most valiantly, yet being ouerlaid, were discomfited with the slaughter of three thousand of their men. The Danes, swelling with this prosperous successe tooke into Northumberland, bringing all to their obedience where they came; and the two yong gallants were thereby so fleshed, & encouraged, that they intended to haue marched to London, had not the extremity of winter (enemy to all warlike enterprise) hindered them; yea and William as willingly would haue beene doing, if the same cause had not kept him backe; but when the time of the yeare was fit for warre, hee gathered a great host, whereof the English were chiefe, this being his policy, to vie their weapons each against others, whereby their strengths might bee lessened, that so who focuer lost, his Normans might winne: these ioining battaile with the enemy, fought it out manfully; and lastly, making a breach into a wing of the Danish

(35) The Earles therefore of Norfolk and Hereford, whose state now lay open to chance, as desperate men tooke themselves to Arms, & sought how to vntie their two powers into one. This sudden found of warre soone routed the Subjects, so that Walthof Bishop of Worcester, and Egelvne Abbat of Eneham having called to their aide Walter Lacie, and Wile the Sheriffe of Worcester, so manfully withstood Earle Roger that he with his Army could not passe ouer Seuerne to joine with his brother Norfolk: And he againe was so fore laide at, by Odo Bishop of Bayeux, and Gessrey Bishop of Constance, (who had assembled a mighty Army both of English and Normans) that they constrained him first to Norwich, where, in the Castle he bestowed his Countesse, and thence fled himselfe into Little Britaine, whither shortly these followed.

(36) William now returned from Normandy and some reliques of Rebellion remaining in the West, he hastid thitherward, where, with small adoe hee got Earle Roger into his hands, and condemned him to perpetual prison; the Welsh his Aiders (of whom also were many at the said Marriage) he vied with great severity, for of some he put out the eyes, of others he cut off the hands, hanged some vpon gibbets, and he that escaped best, went into banishment; neither Earle Walthof, notwithstanding hee reuealed the conspiracie, escaped unpunished; for after that the King had taxed him with ingratitude (he hauing formerly restored the Earledome vnto him) he caused his head to be chopt off at Winchester, (although he had before promised his pardon and life) his great possessions being his greatest Enemies; for he is reported to haue been Earle of Northampton, Northumberland and Huntingdon, thought by the King to be fitter dignities for the Normans his followers; and the desire of a new Marriage, moued Judith his wife not a little to set forward and hasten his death.

(37) These beginnings against the Welsh, King William prosecuted farther, entering into Wales with a strong Armie, as purposing a final end of those Domestical warres, hauing lo replenished England with his Normans, that hee now promised himselfe security and happinesse of State: To him therefore the Princes of Wales vnable to resist, performed their Homages at Saint Davids, and with their Hostages he returned as a victorious Conquerour.

But the Seas of these troubles now growne quiet and calme, and he at some leasure to thinke on future successe, all on the sudden a cloud arose in the North, which hastily came on and threatened a storme.

(38) For Swaine King of Denmarke, whose title (to his seeming) stood firme for the Crowne, manned forth two hundred tall Ships, whereof his sonne Canute and Earle Hacon were Generals; for his brother Osborne he had banished Denmarke, that basely tooke money to depart England some few yeeres before, nor withstanding his claime he made still, though, for money, still stopped by his Dames: For so faith their owne writer Adam Bremensis, that continual contention was betwixt Swaine and the basard, although (saith he) our Bishops by bribes would haue persuaded peace betwixt the two Kings: Yea and Malmesbury, our writer, affirmeth, that William gaue bribes to Earle Hacon to begone; though Paris and Polyder report, that when these Dames heard that their fauourites heere were vanquished they turned their Sailes for Flanders, and durst not fight with King William.

(39) But now a lesse suspected, but much more vnaturall warre arose, for Robert, his eldest sonne, (set on by Philip King of France, who did greatly desire this so hallic growth of the Conquerour) claimed Normandy by gift of his father, promised to him immediately after his Conquest of England; a Noble Gentleman surely, but of an ambitious and hasty nature, prodigally spending and maintaining his followers about the compass of his priuate estate; him Philip, & his own ill-nurtured Ambition, thrust forward, & Q. Maad his mother supplied vnder had, out of her own Coffers, and King Williams Reuennewes, so that with banners displayed hee entred Normandy in hostile manner, and there by force seised vpon diuers places to his owne vie, and so without respect of dutifull patience gained by force the free-gift of his father.

(40) King William hearing of his sonne Roberts proceedings, was not (as great cause there was) a little offended thereat, and with a powerfull Army halted to Normandy: where neere vnto the Castle of Gerbury, at a place called Archenbraye, he ioined battle with his sonne; where the fight was sore and dangerous on both sides, the Generals being such men as they were: but in the heat of the foot battels that fought it out resolutely, Robert commanded a power of horse to breake in vpon the Rereward of his enemies, and himselfe valiantly following, chanced to light against his owne Father, and with his lance thrust him through the Arme, bearing him off his horse to the ground. King William thus wounded & false, called for helpe to be remounted, storming to see his blood spilt in his owne land, and against his owne sonne, which neuer had beene in battailes of other countries, nor drawne by the weapons of forraigne enemies, and in great rage threatened the reuenge: Robert that knew his Father by his voice, hastily alighted, and in his Armes tooke him from the earth, humbly desiring his pardon for this vnknown fact, and forgiveness of his ouer-hastie attempt; then mounting him vpon his owne horse, brought him in safetie out of the presse; who hauing escaped so great a danger, and seeing himselfe for the present too weak to withstand the enemy, left the honour of the field vnto Robert, with the losse of many hisouldiers, slaine there both in the battaile and chafe, besides a great number that were hurt & wounded; among whom, William Rufus his second sonne was one, a man of a better temper, and more filiall regard to his parents, and therefore more deservingly and tenderly beloued then Robert; for which dishonour now done to his Father, and disloyalty for his vnaturall armes, hee bitterly cursed him, and execrated the time wherein he begate him: howbeit, others doe write, that for his most vndaunted courage at that time, issuing and ending in such dutifull and tender care of his fathers safety, hee presently forgave his former offences, and euer after had him in better respect.

(41) These stirres thus qualified, and King William returned, he went forward with his former determination; for seeing a further assurance to himselfe and successors of the English crowne; to which end, first on the east side of London (the mother City of the land) he laid the foundation of a stately & strongly fenced Castle, or Magazine of warlike munitions, intrenched with a large and deepe ditch, now called the Tower of London; the surveyor of which worke, was Gundulphus Bishop of Rochester; about the twelfth yeare of the Conquerours raigne, so much is lessened the antiquity of that Citadell, & credite of such, as would haue it founded by Iulius Caesar; vnlesse (perhaps) we would thinke that King William did onely adde some new fort to the former being built (saith Fitz-Stephen) with morter tempered with the blood of beasts.

(42) Then to enrich his owne coffers (for hee is taxed by Malmesbury to be exceeding couetous) he laid laid great subsidies vpon the land: and that the same might amount to his great benefite (though with the greatest griuance of the people) hee caused an exact survey to be taken of the whole kingdom, yea and of every particular part and commodity thereof; so that there was not an hide of land, lake, water, or wast, but he knew the valuation, the owners, and possellers, together with the rents, and profits thereof, as also of all Cities, Townes, Villages, Hamlets, Monasteries, and Religious houses; causing also all the people in England to be numbered, their names to be taken, with notice, what euery one might dispise by yeere; their substance, money & bondmen recorded: how many yokes of oxen, and plough-lands were in the Realme, and what seruices they owed, who held of him in Fee; all which was certified vpon the oathes of Commissioners. This done, he exacted fixe shillings to be paid him for euery hide of land; which amounted to an huge masse of money. The Booke thus made of euery feuerall survey, was commonly called the rowle of Winchester, (as being there at first kept) but for the generality, and ineuitable censure thereof, is by Authors named Liber Indiciarius, by the English, Domesday booke, kept to this day in the Kings Exchequer at Westminster: of which collection Robert, a Poet at Gloucester in ancient time, and ryme wrote thus:

The King William, vor to wite the worth of his land,
Let enqueri strestlich thorow all Engeland,
How mani Plow-land, and hou mani Hiden also,
Were in euerich sire, and wat hij were wurth yereto:
And the rents of each town, and of the waters echone,
The wurth, and of woods eke; that there nelined none,
But that he wist wat hij were wurth of all Engeland,
And wite all elene, that wurth thereof ich vnderstond,
And let it write clene inou, and that scriit dude in wis;
In the Tresorie at Westminster, there it yut is,
So that ure Kings suth, when hij ransome toke, Treded wold might yine, his fond there in yor boke.

(43) This exaction was gathered with such extremity, & paid with such impouerishing of the English, that they greuously groined vnder their miserable estate, whereby more hatred grew daile to the King, and his Normans; whose loue againe to themward was so little, that hee sought by all means to bring the English name, and Nation to ruine: for it is noted by Caistor, and Rouse, that no English man was permitted to beare any office of Credit, or Countenance in this Conquerours daies, and accounted it was a great shame to be called an Englishman, or to marry into their blood.

(44) These griuances seeming vn sufferable, the English incited Malcolme King of Scotland once more to enter King Williams confines, waiking all before him vnto the Riuer Tyne; against whom the Conquerour sent Robert his sonne, surnamed Courtoise, who marching with a mighty Army, made shew of doing much more then he did; this onely being memorable, that neere to the mouth of Tyne he laid the foundation of a Castle, whereof the towne of New-Castle did afterward take both her beginning, and Name; though long before that time there was a place called Monk-Chester, because (as it should seeme) it had been either the habitation, or possession of some Religious Order.

(45) Neither was Swaine, King of Denmarke, so quailed by his former expeditions, but that he had a minde once more to griape at the English Crowne, preparing a mighty Armado that way, as was constantly reported and beleued; King William therefore retained a great power of French Soldiours with others, which he had lately brought with him from Normandy, to disburden himselfe; of whose Charges, he appointed them to be maintained at the costs of the English, both for their wages, and other provisions, which was an other great burden vnto the English, though it long lasted not; for that the Danish King better aduising himselfe, gaue ouer the enterprise, and thereupon these Soldiours were discharged.

(46) Another griefe and offence he ministred against both God and man, for the fruitfull Countrey lying South from Sarisbury vnto the Sea, hee depopled, pulling downe Townes, and Villages, with 36. Mother-churches, from mans vie, & Gods diuine seruice; & for 30. miles, laid open the country, some say out of pollice, to haue safeariage from Normandy in time of need: others say, for beasts, & for his owne game in hunting, or to vie the words of Gualter Mapes, who liued immediately after, to dedicate the same vnto wild Beasts and Dogs-game; which place called anciently Tyene, was euer since named the New Forrest: imposing great penalties both pecuniary, and corporall on all such as offended in hunting his Game: in so much that he was then called the Father of wild Beasts, more fauouring them then the People his Subjects. But Gods iust judgement not long after followed this so vnreasonable, and cruel act: for in this Forest, Richard his second sonne being gaied by a Deare, (others say, blasted with a pestilent Ayre) was vntimely slaine: And Rufus his other sonne mistaken for a Deare was by chance shot thorow with an Arrow, by Walter Tyrell. Henry likewise his Grand-child by Robert Courtoise, whilst he hotly pursued the chafe, was stricken by a bough into the lawes, and as Absolon left hanging vntill he died.

Thus, no doubt, God punished his sinnes (euen on his children, and childrens children) who had both taken away the places, and vie of his seruice, and also disherited multitudes of Christian people to their extreme pouerty, for his vnfaciat and superfluous pleasure: so that (as some then thought) the Earth it selfe also seemed to cry Reuenge, when as vpon the sixt of April, and fifteenth of King Williams Raigne, a most fearefull Earthquake, with a warring noise, did shake the ground.

(47) Other great calamities are noted to haue hapned vpon his people, as burning feuers strangely consuming the people: Murrins decouring infinite numbers of Cattle; abundance of raine, and course of water-floods beyond credit, whereby the hilles were so softned to the very foundations, that some of them fell, and ouerwhelmed the villages which were in their way: most of the principall Cities of England much endamaged by fire, and London especially, where the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul (as much as was combustible) was consumed to ashes; and if that may also be noted (which caused not the least wonder) tame, and domestick fowles, as hennes, geese, peacocks, and the like fled into the forests, and woods, and became vey wild, in imitation of men, degenerating then into sauages: for in those times euen the Churchmen (and therefore lesse maruaile of others) became vnlike themselves: Walter Bishop of Durham, bought of King William the Earledome of Northumberland, maintained murderers, and was murdered himselfe. Odo, another Bishop, and Earle also, to reuenge his death, made Northumberland desolate, beheading and dismembred the poorer sort, and at great ranlomes fining the rich, and Pope Gregory for his part plaid Rex in this land, sending hither his Buls with damning curses against the married Clergie: commanding that none should heare their Masses: which how it was disgisted, either by God, or man, is let vs heare Paris an ancient Monke (and therefore herein no partiall man) speake his mind.

Inhibiting of married Priests a new decree, and inconsiderate.

Papists Continen- cy hypocrit- icall.

O Jo King William brother, af- fecteth the Pa- pacy.

King William condemneth his brothers Ambitions.

His sacrileges.

(48) Pope Gregory in a general Synode excluded the married Priests from execution of their holie offices, and forbad the Lay-men to heare their Masses; a president new, and proceeding (as it seemed to many) out of inconsiderate iudgement, contrary to the sentence of the holy Fathers: which haue written, that the Sacraments of the church by the inuisible operation of the holy Ghost, haue their due effect, whether they are dispensed by men good or bad, &c. By which fact so grieuous a scandall is arisen, that holy Church was neuer rent with a greater schisme in the time of any heretic whatsoeuer, since some stand for the right, and others strue against it. Moreover, whereas few obseue this chastitie enioined (for that though some for gaine, or vaine-glory, doe hypo- critically pretend it; yet many doe heape vp in- continency with perjury, and manifold adulteries) by this occasion the Lay-men shalke off all due respect to sacred orders and ecclesiasticall gouerne- ment; they prophane the holy mysteries, they baptize Infants, anointing them with the sordid humor of their ears in stead of holy oile, they burn the tithes due to the Priests; our Lords body con- secrated by a married priest, they tread vnder their feet, and often doe wilfully cast forth the bloud of our Lord vpon the ground.

(49) This Gregory (before called Hildebrand) fate in Peters chaire with such pranks of impietie, that his gouernment was odious to the Romans, who wished an end of his raigne and life, so that certaine Southsaies imploied in that busines gaue forth, that after Gregory, Odo should be Pope. Odo, our said Earle, the Conquerours brother, fed with full hope that hee was the man, sendeth to Rome to buy him a Pallace, adorning it with statelie and ouer-lauish trimmings; Salutes the Senators with great gifts & complements, stuffeth bagges with money, and letters to such as might doe much in the election, and provides honourable personages to attend him to Rome. Among the which for chiefe, was Hugh Earle of Chester, with many great men and Knights of the land: for the Normans variable, and desirous to see forraine Countries, were contented to forsake their faire lands in the west climate, to accompany this proud Prelate ouer the fier Poo.

This lolly traine was set forward into the Isle of Wight, and there in great pompe ready to set saile into Normandy, when on the sodain King William vn- looked for, was euen among them, and in his great Hall in preence of his Nobles thus spake:

(50) Excellent Peeres, I beseech you hearken to my words, and giue me your counsell: at my sail- ing into Normandy, I commended England to the gouernment of Odo my brother Bishop. In Normandy many forraine foes haue risen vp a- gainst me, yea and inward friends I may say, haue invaded me: for Robert my sonne, and other younglings whom I haue brought vp, and giuen Armes, haue rebelled; vnto whom my fallie Clients, and other bordering enemies haue giuen their assistance: but they haue not prospered, God (whose seruant I am) euer defending mee: neither haue they gotten any thing of mine, be- sides iron in their wounds: They of Aniou pre- pared against me, whom with the onely feare of warre I haue pacified. These busineses you know haue drawn me into Normandy, where I haue staied long and imploied my painfull endeouours on pub- like behoofes. But in the meane time, my brother hath greatly oppressed England, spoiling the Chur- ches of Lands and Rents, hath made them naked of Ornaments giuen by our Predecessors, and hath seduced my Knights, with purpose to traine them ouer the Alpes, who ought to defend the Land against the inuasions of the Danes, Irish, and other Enemies our strong for me; but my greatest dolour is for the Church of God, which he hath af- flicted, and vnto which the Christian Kings that raigned before me, haue giuen many gifts, and with their loues honored, for which now (as we beleue) they rest, reioicing with a happy retribution in a pleasant State: Ethelbert, Edward, Saint Oswald, Al- tholph, Alfred, Edward the Elder, Edgar, and my co- sen and most deere Lord Edward, haue giuen Riches to the Church, the spouse of God: But my Brother to whom I committed the whole Kingdome, vio- lently plucketh away their goods, cruelly grindeth the poore, and with a vaine hope stealeth away my Knights from me, and by oppression hath exalpe- rated the whole Land with vniust taxations; con- sider thereof, most Noble Lords, and giue mee (I pray you) your aduice, what is heerein to bee done.

(51) At which pause when all stood mute, as fearing to giue their opinions in so weighty a point, concerning so great a Person, the King thus continued his speech.

Hurtfull rashnesse is euer vn sufferable, and must at length be repressed. This man hath oftentimes banded himselfe against his owne father, and vp- on a stomacke, blowne vp with pride and folly, hath fallen off to the King of France: therefore left with ouermuch lenity, we buy too late a repentance, he shall remaine Prisoner, yet not as a Bishop, whose name I both honour and reuerence, but as an Earle, subject to the Lawes and Censure of his King.

Which accordingly was done; vpon seizure of whose estate, this Prelate was found so well lined in purse, that the heapes of yellow mettall did moue ad- miration to the beholders, and many of his bags were taken vp out of the bottome of Riuers, where they were hidden full of gold ground into powder.

(52) Soone after, some displeasure hauing arisen betwixt King William, and Philip King of France, hee hauing first generally cauled to be taken the Oath of English Allegiance to himselfe and successors, with a mighty masse of money (fitted for some great at- tempts) departed to Normandy; where falling sicke, and keeping his Bed more then his wont, the French King hearing that his discaie was in his belly, gaue him this trumpe: Our Cousen William (said he) is laid now in Child-bed: Oh what a number of Candles must I offer at his going to Church? Surely I thinke a hundred thousand will not suffice.

King William hearing thereof, is said to make this answer: Well, our Cousen of France I trust shall be at no such cost, but after this my child-birth, as my going to Church (swearing by the resurrection and brightnes of God) I will (said he) find him one thousand candles, and light themmy selfe. And accordingly towards August following, when both the trees, fruites, corn, and ground, was most flourishing, hee en- tred France with a mighty Army, spoiling all the west parts thereof before him; and lastly, set the City Meux or Mauniz on fire, wherein he con- sumed the faire Church of our Lady, in the wals wher- of was enclosed an Anchorite, who might, but would not escape, holding it a breach of his religious vow to forsake his Cell in that distresse. The King busied in these attempts cheered his men to feede the fire, and came himselfe so neere the flames, that with the heat of his hartesse, he got a sicknesse, and the same encreased by the leape of his horse, that burst the inward rimme of his belly, and cost him his life.

(53) At which time feeling death to approach, he deferred not to address his last will, wherein hee commanded all his Treasures to bee distributed to Churches, Gods Ministers, and the Poore, limiting to each their feuerall portion and quantity, which he caused to be ingrossed in writing by Notaries before him: Amongst which, he bequeathed to the Church and Monkes of Saint Stephens at Can in Normandy, two Mannors in Dorsetshire, one Mannor in Devon- shire, another in Essex, much Lands in Barke-shire, some in Norfolk, a Manlion house in Woodstreet of London, with many Aduowions of Churches; yea, which is to be wondred at, hee gaue his Crowne, and Regall Ornaments thereto belonging to the said Church, being of his owne foundation; for the redemption whereof, King Henry his sonne, gaue the Mannor of Brideton in Dorsetshire, to prevent any danger that thereof might arise; and vnto the Churches by fire destroyed in Meux, he gaue great summes of money to repaire them: and so preparing him- selfe for God, briefly ranne ouer the carriage of his former life: the summe whereof (as much as best fitteth this place) we will declare as he spake it to them that were present.

(54) Being laden with many and grieuous fins, (O Christ) I now tremble, who am ready to bee taken hence, and to be tried by the seuer, but iust examination of God. I that haue alwaies bin brought vp in warres, and am polluted with the effusion of blood, am now vterly ignorant what to doe; for I cannot number my offences, they are so in- finite, and haue been committed by me now these sixty foure yeeres: for which, without any delay I must render an account to that most vpright Judge. From my tender infancy and age of eight yeeres, I haue hitherto sustained the weight and charge of Armes to defend my Dukedome, go- uerned by me now almost fifty fixe, both in pre- uenting those snares that haue beene laid for my life, and in vanquishing those conspirers which would haue vlrped my right: a thiffe nee- ded people I may say, my arme hath still ma- naged, I meane the Normans, who with an hard hand, if they bee curbed, are most valiant, and in hazardous attempts inuincible: for, as they ex- cell all men in strength, so doe they contend to ouercome all men by valour. But if the reine bee once let loose, and laid in their necks, they will teare and consume one another; for they are euer seditious, and desirous of new stirrings; experi- ence whereof sufficiently I haue had, not only of my confederates and allies; but euen of mine own kindred, denouncing me to bee a bastard, degene- rate and vnworthy of gouernment: against whom, I haue beene forced to put on armour, before I was by age ripe to weild it: all which I haue van- quished, and some of them captiuated, God so preferring me, that they neuer had their desires.

A roiall Diadem, which none of my predecessors euer ware, I haue gotten, not by right of inheri- tance, but by heavenly grace. What labours and conflicts I haue sustained against those of Excester, Chester, Northumberland, Scots, Gaels, Norwegi- ans, Danes, and others, who haue endeouored to take the crowne from me, is hard to declare; in all which the lot of victory fell euer on my side: which worldly triumphes, howsoeuer they may please the sense & outward man, yet they leaue an inward horror, and fearefull care which pricketh mee; when I consider, that cruell rashnes, was as much followed, as was the iust prosecution of the cause. Wherefore I most humbly beseech you, O yee Priests and Ministers of Christ, that you in your prayers will commend mee to God, that hee will mitigate my heauy finnes, vnder whole burden I lie pressed, and by his vnspoke- able mercy make me safe among his elect. Nine Abbies of Monkes, and one of Nunnes which my Ancesters founded in Normandy, I haue enrich- ed and augmented; and in the time of my govern- ment, seauenteene Monasteries of Monkes, and sixe of holy Nunnes, haue beene founded by my selfe & my Nobility, whose Charters I haue freely confirmed, and doe by princely authority con- firme against all emulations and troubles; in them God is serued, and for his sake many poore peo- ple releued; with such Camps both England and Normandy is defended, and in these Forts let all younglings learne to fight against the Diuell and vices of the flesh. These were the studies that I followed from my first yeeres, and these I leaue vnto my heires to be preferred and kept. In this then (my children) follow me, that here and for- euer you may be honoured before God and Men: And chiefly, O you my very bowels, I warne you to frequent & follow the company and coun- sell of good and wiile men, and gouerne your selues accordingly, so shall yee long and happi- ly prosper. Doe iustice to all without partiall af- fection; for it is a true wisdom indeed that can discerne betwixt good and euill, right and wrong. Shunne wickednesse, relieue the poore, succour the weak, but suppress the proud, and bridle the troublesome. Frequent the Church, honour the religious, and without wearinesse bee obedient vnto the law of God. The Dukedome of Nor- mandy, before I fought against Harold in the vale of Senlac, I granted vnto my sonne Robert, for that he is my first begotten, and hath already receiued ho- mage of all the Barons almost of his Country: that honour giuen cannot againe be vndone; but yee without doubt, I know it will bee a miserable regi- on, which is subiect to the rual of his gouernments for he is a toothill proud knaue, and is to bee puni- shed with cruell fortune. I constitute no Heire to the Realme of England, but doe commend it to the eueralting Creator whose I am, for I possesse not that honour by any title of inheritance, but by the instinct of God, the effusion of blood, and the per- iurie of Harold, whose life breacued, and his fa- uourers vanquished, I made it subiect to my do- minion. The Natiues of the realme I hated, the Nobles I dishonoured, the vulgar I cruelly vexed, and many vniustly I disherited. In the Countie of Yorke, and sundry other places, an innumerable sort with hunger and sword I flew: and thus that beautifull Land and noble Nation I made de- solate with the deaths of many thousands, (woe worth the griefe.) These then my finnes being so great, I dare not giue the offices of that land to any other then to God, lest after my death they yet be made worse by my occasion. Yet Wil- liam my sonne, whose loue and obedience from his youth I haue seen, I with (if so be the will of God) may flourish in the throne of that Kingdome, with a long life and happy raigne.

(55) Henry his youngest sonne, surnamed Beau- clerke, hearing himself vterly neglected in his Fathers distribution, with teares said to the King: And what Father doe you giue me? to whom hee answered, sue thousand pounds of silver out of my tresurie I giue thee. But what shall I doe with treasure said Henry, if I shal haue no dwelling place or habitation? His Father re- plied, Be patient my sonne, and comfort thy selfe in God, suffer quietly thy elder brother to goe before thee: Robert shall haue Normandy, and William England: but thou in time shalt intirely haue all the honour that I haue gotten, and shalt excell thy Brethren in riches and power.

After which speeches, he presently called his son William, to whom hee deliuered a letter signed with his owne seale, written vnto Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury, and commanded him therewith to halt for England, left in that spacious Kingdome some suddaine troubles should arise; and so with a kisse blessed him in Christ. His prisoners hee comman- ded to be set at liberty, affirming that hee had done Earle Moreau much wrong, whom as hee then con- fessed, hee had imprisoned more for feare then for fault; onely his halfe brother Odo he would haue had to remaine a perpetual prisoner, but that by the im- portunate intercession of friends hee was releafed.

(56) The period of this Great Conquerour now come neere to his last, when this Sunne so gloriously raised to the height of his course, must now of force set in the West, the dying King (for Kings must die) hauing raised his weak body vpon the Pillowes, heard the found of the great Bell in the Metropol- itane Church of Saint Geruis neere Roan, and demand- ing the cause, one replied that it did then ring prime to our Lady; whereupon with great deuotion lifting his cies towards heauen, and spreading abroad his hands;

hands, I commend my selfe (said he) to that blessed Lady, Mary, Mother of God, that live by her holy prayers may reconcile me to her most deare Sonne our Lord Iesus Christ; and with the words yielded vp his Ghost, vpon Thursday the ninth of September, the sixth of his Dutchie, the twenty one of his Kingdome, the sixty four of his age, and yeere of Christ Iesus 1087.

(57) Wherein; as we see the instability, both of Mans life, and Glory, (a point fitting for great Princes euer to thinke on) so by the sequell wee shall perceiue, how ill-rooted and vngrounded the friendship is, which attends the greatnesse of Soueraignes, whose Fauourites chiefe or onely ends are their own Ambition and Gaine, the fewell whereof once beginning to decay, the fire of their seeming-deuotion will bee quickly cold. For no sooner had this late-glorious Princes Soule bidden farewell to his Body, but his dead Corps was presently abandoned by his followers of neereft place, and best meanes, who posted homewards apace to defend their owne; and by the meane and his inferiour seruants, he was spoiled of Armour, Vessells, Apparell, and all Princely furniture, euen so farre from all wanted and due respect, as that they left his dead Body naked vpon the floore; like true Kites, praying whilst any thing was to be had.

The sudden fame of his death stroke such feare into the Commons hearts as was admirable, euerie man shifting for one, but all neglecting the funeral rites of their King, vntill that one Harlins a poore Countrey Knight, undertooke the Carriage of his Corps vnto Cane, and at his owne cost, both by Sea and Land, vnto Saint Stephens Church, which this dead King had formerly founded.

At his entrance into Cane, the Couent of Monks came forth to meet him, and to celebrate the buriall with all Ceremonies befitting; but behold euen at that instant, a sudden chance of fire happened, which presently inuaded a great part of the Towne, that, as his Corps before, so now his Hearse was of all forsaken, whilst they addressed themselves to respect that furious Element: which done, and the Funerall Sermon ended, the Stone-Coffin set in the earth, in the Chancell betwixt the Choral and the Altar, and the body ready to be laid therein, one Ascelinus Fitz-Arthur, a man of some Note, stood vp and forbade the buriall: This very place (said he) was the floore of my Fathers house, which this dead Duke violently tooke from him, and heere vpon part of my inheritance founded this Church: This ground therefore I challenge, and in Gods behalfe forbid that the Body of my disposer, be conuered in my Earth, neither shall it be interred in the precincts of my right. Whereupon they were enforced to compound with him for a present sum of money then deliuered, and with consent of his sonne Henry, for a hundred pound weight of siluer after to be paid, and so the Exceques went forward; when, behold again the Corps laid into the Tombe, was with the largest, which being pressed, the belly (not bowelled) brake, & with an intolerable stench so annoyed the by-standers, that neither Gummies, nor spices fuming from the Censures, could be any whit fenible to relieve them, in so much that all with great amazement hastning away, they left the Monks to shuffle vp the buriall, and they were soone glad to get them to their cels.

(58) This then was the life and death of this great Monarch, the Conquerour of Men, but not of Death, nor suruiuing Enuie; a bright example of the dimme glory of man, who in life had the possessions of Kingdomes and Dukedomes, men at Armes, riches and honour, and all things thereto adhering; but after his death, neither Ornament, nor Attendants, nor place of buriall, till it were bought; all which, private men seldom are so vaine is the pompe of this world, and so vncertaine the state of her darlings.

(59) He was for stature indifferent, of countenance sterne, his fore-head high, and haire verie thinne, far and corpulent of body, with his bellie bearing out, so strong of ioints and armes, that he could bend his bow; of witte ready, and very politike, in speech eloquent, resolute in attempts, in hazards valiant, a great souldier, and as great in successes; rough and courteous towards the English, in his taxes, lawes, and in giuing to his Normans their lands; whose Charters were of a farre other tenour, forme, & breuity, then those tedious and perplexed conveyances, since in vfe, as by these few inferred may appeare.

I William King, the third yere of my raigne,

Giue to thee Norman Hunter, some that art both leefe and Deere,

The Hop and the Hopton, and all the bounds up and downe,

Vnder the Earth to Hell, about the Earth to Heauen,

From me and mine, to thee and to thine,

As good and as faire, as euer they mine were,

To witnesse that this is sooth, I bite the white waxe with my tooth,

Before Iuge, Maude, and Margery, and my yongest sonne Henry;

For a bow and a broad arrowe, when I come to hunt vpon yarrow.

(60) At the suite of William Bishop of London, he granted the City (whose chiefe Magistrate was then called the Portreue) their first Charter written in the Saxon tongue, confirmed with greene waxe, whereas the Saxons before vsed onely to signe with guilt crosses, and such like markes: the Copy thereof is this:

"William Cyng greit William Bisceop. & Godfrees Forgeresan & ealle the Burghwaren the on Lunden be-on, &c. William King, greteth William Bisceop, and Godfrey Portreue, and all the Burgeses that in London be, French & English, friendly. And I doe you to wit, that I will, that you enioy all the law which you did in the daies of Edward King. And I will that each Child bee his Fathers inheritor after his Fathers daies. And I will not suffer that any man you any wrong offer. God you keepe."

(61) In the like Charter, granted to his Nephew Alane Earle of Britaine for lands in Yorkshire, he writeth himselfe William farnamed Bastard; and yet it seemeth, hee was offended at Gay of Burgundy for tearing him Nothus; perhaps, because that word signifieth such a one, whose Father is vnkown, whereas King Williams was not only known, but renowned also.

(62) Howsoever hee was sterne and hard to the English, yet to his Normans hee was facile and too indulgent, much deuoted to Religion, and frequenting the Church, both morning and evening; The Clergie that liued according to their rule and profession, hee both honoured and richly endowed; but to the licentious was very rough and hard handed: his vncl Malgerius Archbishop of Rotomage, for his dissolute life hee disgraced; his brother Odo Bishop of Batieux, he imprisoned, and many of the English deprived, as we haue heard.

(63) Besides his many other rarely buildings, both for fortification and deuotion, three Abbies of chiefe note hee is said to haue raised, and endowed with large priuileges and rich possessions. The first was at Battle in Suffex, where hee wonne the Diadem of England, in the valley of Sanguelac, so called in French, for the streames of blood therein spilt: but William of Newberie deceived in the soile it selfe, which after raine sheweth to bee red; as firmeth firmeth, that after any small showre of raine, the earth sweateth forth very fresh blood, as by the euident sight thereof (saith hee) doth as yet plainly declare; that the voice of so much Christian blood there shed, doth full crye from the earth to the Lord.

(64) But most certaine it is, that in the very same place where King Harold's Standard was pitched, & vnder which himselfe was slaine, there William the Conquerour laid that Foundation, dedicating it to the Holy Trinity, and to Saint Martine, that there the Monks might pray for the soules of Harold and the rest that were slaine in that place: whose Priuileges were so large, that they, and others of the like condition, were afterwards dissolved by Act of Parliament, when it was found by experience, that the feare of punishment being once taken away, desperate boldness, and a daring will to commit wickednesse, grew still to a greater head: for it was enfranchised with many freedoms, and among others, to vse the words of the Charter, were these: If any Thiefe, Murderer or Felon, for feare of death, sue and come to this Church, let him haue no harme, but let him be dismissed, and sent away free from all punishment. Be it lawfull also for the Abbot of the same Church to deliuer from the Gallows any thiefe or robber where soeuer, if he chance to come by, where any such execution is in hand.

The Standard it selfe curiously wrought all of gold and precious stones, made in forme like an armed man, Duke William presently vpon his victory, with great complements of curtesie, sent to Pope Alexander the second, as good reason it was, the Popes transcendent pleasure and power, being the strongest part of the Dukes title to the Crowne, and his cursing thunderbolts the best weapons whereby he attained to wear it.

(65) At Selly also in Yorkshire, where his yongest sonne Henry was borne, he founded the Abbey of Saint Germans: at Excester, the Priorie of Saint Nicholas; and to the Church and Colledge of Saint Martins legrand in London, hee gaue both large priuileges, and much land, extending from the corner of the City wall, by Saint Giles Church without Criplegate, vnto the common Sewer, receiuing the waters, running then from the Mare, and now Mare-felds.

(66) At Cane in Normandie, he founded the Monastery of Sant Stephen the first Christian Martyr, adorning it with most sumptuous buildings, and endowing it with rich reuenues; where his Queene Maud had erected a Nunnerie for the Societie of vailed Virgines, vnto the honour of the blessed virginie Mary. Thus much of his Acts, and now of his marriage and issue.

His Wife.

(67) Maud the wife of King William, was the daughter of Baldwine the fifth, farnamed the Gentle, Earle of Flanders; her mother was Alice, daughter of Robert King of France, the sonne of Hugh Capet: Shee was married vnto him when hee was a Duke, at the Cattle of Angi in Normandy, and in the second yeare of his raigne ouer England, she was crowned Queene vpon Whit-sunday, the yeere of Grace, 1068. And although she maintained Robert in his quarrell for Normandy, and out of her owne coffers paid the charges of warre against his Father, and her owne Husband; yet, because it did proceed but from a motherly indulgence for aduancing her sonne, it was taken as a cause rather of displeasure, then of hatred, by King William, as himselfe would often aouch, holding it an insufficient cause to diminish the loue, that was linked with the sacred band of a matrimoniall knot. Shee departed this life the second day of November, the sixteenth yeere of his raigne, and of Christs humanity, 1083: for whom he often lamented with reares, and most honourably entered her at Cane in Normandy, in the Church of S. Maries, within the Monasterie of Nuns, which shee had there founded.

His Issue.

(68) Robert, the eldest sonne of King William, and of Queene Maud his wife, was farnamed Curtuaise, signifying in the old Norman-French, Short-Bootes: hee succeeded his father onely in the Dutchie of Normandy, and that also hee lost afterwards to his brother Henry King of England, at the battell of Edenburgh (in that Dukedom) the yeere of our Lord 1106. where he was taken prisoner, and hauing his eyes put out (an vnbrotherly punishment) was committed to the Cattle of Cardiffe in South-Wales; and after twenty eight yeeres imprisonment, there deceased, the yeere before the death of his said brother, Anno 1134. and was buried at Glocester, in the midst of the Quire of Saint Peters Church; where remaineth a Tombe with his Carued Image at this day. Hee had two wiues, the first, Margaret daughter of Herbert, Earle of Mayne, both married in their Child-hood, and hee died before they came to yeeres of consent: The other was Sibyll, daughter of Geffrey, and sister to William, Earles of Comerfana in Italy, and Neece of Robert Guiscard, Duke of Apulia: By her hee had two sonnes William and Henry; this Henry was hee that was slaine by mischance, as he was hunting in the New-Forest in Hampshire.

William the Elder, furnamed in Latine Miser, was Earle of Flanders, in right of Queene Maud his Grand-mother, succeeding Charles of Denmarke in that Earledome; hee also had two wiues, the first Sibyll, (whose Mother, called also Sibyll, was the daughter of Fowke Earle of Aniow) after diuorced from him, and remarried to Terry of Alsie, his Successour; the second was Joan, the daughter of Humbert Earle of Morien, now called Sauoy, sister of Queene Alice of France, wife of King Lewis the Grasse: hee died fixe yeeres before his father, of a wound receiued at the Siege of the Cattle of Angi in Normandy, the 27. of Iuly, in the 28. yeere of the Raigne of King Henrie his vncl, and of our Lord, 1128. hee was buried at Saint Omers in the Monastery of Saint Bertin, and left no issue behinde him.

(69) Richard the second sonne of King William and Queene Maud, was borne in Normandy, and after his Father had attained the Crowne came into England, where, being then verie yong, as hee was hunting in the New-Forest of Hampshire, hee came to a violent & sudden death, by the going of a Stagge; (others say, by a pestilent ayre,) and is noted to bee the first man that died in that place, the iustice of God punishing on him his Fathers dispeopling of that Countrey: his body was thence conueied to Wincheſter, and there buried on the Southside of the Quire of the Cathedral Church, where there remaineth a monument of him with an inscription entitling him a Duke, and some suppose of Boloigne.

(70) William, the third Son of King William and Queene Maud, was borne in Normandy, in the 21. yeere of his Fathers Dukedom, ten yeeres before hee was King, 1159. hee was furnamed of the Red colour of his haire, in French Rouge, in Latine Rufus; he was brought vp vnder Landfranke the learned Lumbard, who was Archbishoppe of Canterbury, of whom hee receiued both instructions of knowledge, and the order of Knighthood; hee serued vnder his Father at the battaile of Gerberoth in Normandy, 1079, wherein hee was wounded: and hee alwaies framed his actions so pleasing to his Fathers humor, as that hee thought him much worthier then his elder brother to succeed in his Kingdome.

(71) Henry, the fourth, and yongest sonne of King William and Queene Maud his wife, was borne in England at Selly in Yorkshire, the third yeere of his Fathers raigne, and of our Lord God, 1070, his childhood was trained vp in learning; at Cambridge saith Caius; but the ancient Annales of Saint Austins in Vpon his return he was made Knight, being 16 years old, by his Father at Westminster, in Whitsontide, the nineteenth year of his Reigne, Anno 1086. and though at his Fathers death he had nothing bequeathed him but Treasure, yet afterward he succeeded his Brothers, both in the Kingdome of England and Duchie of Normandy.

Cecily.

(72) Cecily, the Eldest daughter of King William and Queene Maud his wife, was borne in Normandy, brought vp in England, and carried againe into Normandy, where in the ninth yeere of the Kings Reigne, and the yeere of our Lord 1075. shee was by her Father on Ester day, with great Solemnity offered vp in the Church of Feshampe, & vailed to bea Nunne in the Monastery there; but was afterward elected by the Nunnnes of our Lady at Cane, to be Abbesse of their Monastery, founded by her Mother, which she gouerned, and where she died, and was entered.

She is vailed a Nunne.

Constance.

(73) Constance, the second daughter of King William, and Queene Maud, was the first wife of Allayne Earle of little Britaigne, surnamed in the Brittsb. Vergent; in Englsb. Red. In regard of which marriage, and his seruice done at the conquest of England, his Father in law gaue him all the lands of Earle Edwine, whereon he built the Castele, and whereof he made the Earldome of Richmond, which long after, belonged to the Earles and Dukes of Britaigne his Successors; although he had his children by an other wife; for shee died very yong and without issue, and was buried in the Abbey of Saint Edmundsbury in Suffolke.

The Earldome of Richmond corrected.

Alice.

(74) Alice, the third daughter of King William & Queene Maud, was married to Stephen Earle of Blois in France, and had issue by him William an Innocent, Thibaud surnamed the Great, Earle of Blois, and Champain, Stephen Earle of Mortain and Boleine, (who was King of England) Henry a Monke of Cluny, after Abbot of Glastenbury, and Bishop of Winchester, Mary married to Richard Earle of Chester, and Emme, wife of one Harbert, an Earle of France, and mother of Saint William Archbishop of Torke: Shee suruiued Earle Stephen her husband, and in her widowhood tooke vpon her the profession of Religion in the Priore of Nunnnes at Marciay in France, where she ended her life.

Gundrid.

(75) Gundred, the fourth daughter of King William, and of Queene Maud, was married to William of Warren, a Nobleman of Normandy, who was the first Earle of Surrey in England; by whom shee had issue William the second Earle, Progenitors of the Earles that followed; and Rainold of Warren, her second sonne, who had also Issue. Shee died in Child-bed, three yeeres before her husband, at Castleker in Norfolke the 27. of May, in the 20. yeere of her fathers raigne, being the yeere of our Lord, 1085. and is buried in the Chapter-house of Saint Pancrase Church within the Priory, at the town of Lewes, in the County of Sussex.

(76) Ela, the fifth daughter of King William, and his Queene Maud, in her Child-hood was contracted in marriage to Duke Harald, when he was in Normandy, being then a yong Widower. Notwithstanding, hee refusing her tooke an other wife, and vsurped the Kingdom of England, after the death of King Edward, whereby hee occasioned his owne ruine, and Conquest of his Country, which afterward ensued when her Father sought reuenge: so much (as some write) to the discontentment of this Lady, that for griefe of these mischances, shee euer after refused marriage, and led a single and solitarie life; though others vpon better warrant collekt, that shee died yong, and before William her Father set forth for England; Harald himselfe pleading, that hee was free from all couenants and promises to Duke William, by reason of the death of this his daughter.

Ela.

(77) Margaret, the sixth and yongest daughter of King William and Queene Maud, was in her child-hood giuen in marriage to Alphonso King of Gallicia in Spaine, that afterward was so renowned for the Conquest of the City Lysbon, for his victories against the Mores, and for the slaughter of their five Kings, and was the founder of the Kingdome of Portugall, the first King thereof, and the first bearer of the five Shields of the said five Kinges, which are to this day the Armes of the same. But this Lady being thus contracted, deceased before those things happened, and before shee came to yeeres of lawfull consent to the marriage.

CHAPTER III.

William posting for England, & Archbishop Lauf, ask his earnest solicitor by liberal gifts giuen, and promises made to abrogate the ouer hard lawes of his Father, had the readier passage into the opinions of them that could doe most: and the more to notifie his intended mild gouernment, with other his noble inclinations to princely vertues, as eye-witnesses of his fauours towards the English, hee brought with him from Normandy, Morcar, the stout Earle of Chester, and Wilnoth the sonne of King Harold, both of them released out of prison, and then held in especial fauour with him. But most of the States standing for Robert Curtoise his elder Brother (a man deemed of a more liberall disposition, and better temperature towards the Subiects) their titles had bene tried by swords, had not Lauf and Wulstan, both wife & reuerend Prelates, by their Counsels and Mediations staied their hands.

(2) Content thus gotten, and all voices giuen for William, he was crowned their King at Westminster, vpon Sunday the twenty sixth day of September, and yeere of Saluation, 1087. by the hands of Lauf, Archbishop of Canterbury, vnder whom he had bene educated euen from his Child-hood, and by him made fit both for Warre and Gouernment, had not the variable inclination of his owne mind carried his actions past the limits of any staied compass.

(3) Robert vpon discontents that Normandy was still detained, before his Fathers sickness, was gone into Germany, to sollicite their assistance for his right to that Duchie: but hearing of his death, hasterh into the Prouince, and was there peaceably receiued.

ued, and made their Duke: which title notwithstanding, seemed to him dishonourable; his younger brother being inducted to a Kingdom, and himselfe disinherited; no other cause moving, but his overmuch gentleness, being by nature composed nothing so rough, as was Rufus.

(4) The like emulation incited Odo, Bishoppe of Baieux (his vncle) against Lanfrank the Archbishop, who now ruled all, and had worn him out of fauour with the Conquerour his halfe brother, whom hee taught the distinction of imprisoning Odo, as an Earle, not as a Bishop: now therefore seemed the time most fitting for a iust reuenge: & albeit that Rufus brought him from Normandy, where he had bene captiued, and restored him his honours & dignities in England; yet hee, vngratefull man, enuying that Lanfrank should goe before him, plotted the downfall aswell of the one, as of the other. And drawing in to this conspiracy, Robert Earle of Mortaigne and Hereford his brother, with many other of the English Nobility, wrote his letters into Normandy vnto his Nephew, haunting him to repaire into England, and recouer his right, which by his meanes hee promised should soone be effected.

(5) The busines thus wrought to Duke Roberts hand, and the English resorting daily into Normandy, assured his hopes of a happy successe, onely the hinderance was want of money, and that very much as the world then went with him, hauing euer borne himselfe no lesse then his birth, nor euer had made his bagges his summa bonum. In these extremes, he well saw the lesse was to be followed, and to let a Duke dom at stake to cast at a Kingdom, he thought it ods sufficient, though the chance were doubtful: Therefore to his younger brother Henry, who had flore of gold, and wanted land, hee morgaged the Countie of Constantine, a Prouince in Normandy, & then sent to Odo, that he should expect his landing on the West-coast of England by a day prefixed.

(6) The Bishop now growne bold vpon Duke Roberts great power, shewed himselfe the first in the Action; and fortifying Rochester, beganne to molest the peace of Kent, lending to his complices a broad to doe the like, which was not long in performing: for in the West, Robert de Mowbray Earle of Northumberland, assisted by Geoffrey Bishoppe of Constance, lacked Bath and Berkeley, with a great party of Wiltshire, and strongly fortified the Castle of Brislow against King William: In Norfolke, Roger Bygod, in Leicestershire, Hugh Grentemesnil did shrewdly waite those Countries: Roger Montgomery Earle of Shrewsburie with his Welshmen, assisted by William Bishop of Durham (the Kings domesticall Chaplain) Barnard of Newmerch, Roger Lacie, and Ralph Mortimer (all of them Normans or French-men) with fire and sword past through the Countie of Worcester: and surely, the stirres were so great, and Duke Robert so fauoured, that by the iudgement of Gemeticensis, had hee hastid his arriuage, or followed the occasion, the Crowne of England had easily beene set vpon his head.

(7) All in an vprere, and Rufus thus turmoiled, he appointed his Nauie to cower the seas, and to impeach his brothers arriuage: then gathering his forces, and knowing well how to plecte the vulgar, promiseth againe to abolish their ouer-hard lawes, & presently to put down all vnjust Imposts and Taxations, whereby the People were soone drawne to stand in his defence; and among them Roger Montgomery was reconciled to the King.

Thus now growne strong, & his enemies decreased, he led his Armie into Kent where the sedition first beganne, the Castles of Tunbridge and Horne hee recouered, as likewise Pensley, wherein his vncle Odo had strongly immured himselfe, whose lacke of victuall, by King Williams strait siege, allied the pride of that great-hearted man; so that hee not onely surrendered the same, but promised the deliuerie of Rochester also strongly manned, with Eustace Earle of Boloinne, and a sort of other gallant Gentlemen, euen the flower of Normandy and Flanders.

(8) Odo comming to Rochester for the deliuerie of the Castle according to his promise, was by them surprized, and laid in strait prison, whether in displeasure, or vnder colour, and with consent of Odo, I will not say; but certaine it is, that the King tooke the matter so to heart, that he sent forth his Proclamation through England, commanding that euerie man should repaire to that siege, whosoever would not be reputed a Niding, a word of such disgrace, and so distastie vnto the English, that multitudes seemed rather to flie, then runne to that seruice: whereupon the Castle was surrendered, and Odo banished into Normandy, lost all his liuings and honours in England.

(9) Whilest these things were in acting betwixt King William and his Barons, Duke Robert with his Normans was landed at Southampton, hauing passed some conflict with the Kings ships at the sea: whom Rufus so feared (if mine Author say true) that he sent Messengers vnto him in most submissiue manner, protesting that hee tooke not the crowne as his own by any right; but rather to supply the time in his absence: neither did hee account himselfe King, but as his substitute to hold the crown vnder him; yet seeing the matter had bene so farre passed, and the Emperiall Crowne set on his head; hee most humbly desired that it might be restituted, proffering to pay him three thousand Markes by yeere, and to resigne it to him at his death: whereat Duke Robert shaking his head (belike he saw no other remedy) easily consented, and returned forthwith into Normandy.

(10) And, if we compare this with the Monke of Saint Albans report, wee may well beleue, that William was forward enough in his offers, though euer as vnready in performance; for the Barons then being vp, and he not able to allay them, did that by his word, which he could not by his sword, protesting to them that he was willing to resigne the Kingdom, and would be content either with Money or Possessions, if those that were his Fathers Ouer-seers should thinke it meete; and for any Ordinances touching the affaires of the Common weale, he would referre it wholly to themselves, provided alwaies his owne honour should not thereby be impeached. But when the Cloudes of these feares were altogether ouerblowne, no budde once appeared from these faire planted grafts.

(11) For Lanfrank deceased, and both King decried of a politike director, and Common-wellth of a principall Statist, he presently shewed the bent of his inclination, lausfully giuing where no defects had engaged, and exacting extreame tributes, when no Necessity required; alwaies couetous, yet neuer thrifty, and still gathering, yet neuer enriching his Coffers: All Ecclesiastical promotions then vacant he assumed into his owne hands, and kept the See of Canterbury without an Archbishop about foure yeeres, setting to sale the free-rights of the Church, and he that would giue most came soonest to preferment, whereby both the Lands and good esteeme of the Clergy was daily diminished.

These greouances were complained of vnto Pope Vrbane, but hee neuer busied to forward an expedition of Christian Princes for the winning of Ierusalem, had no leisure seriously to thinke vpon their estates, or else lesse minde to diuert Kings out of their owne by-ways, whose persons he meant to referre for his own gain.

(12) The Storme thus cleered without any thunder; King Rufus set the eye of desire vpon Duke Roberts dominions, who lately had done the like with his; and suddenly burst into Normandy, as Skipio did into Africke, pretending reuenge of injuries done to his Kingdome; first therefore surprizing the Castles of Saint Valery and Albemarle, hee stored them with his owne Souldiers; then piercing forward did great spoile in the Countie. Robert destitute of meanes and knowing his Normans euer vnfaithfull, sent to Philip the

the French King, desiring his assistance against this Brother-Enemy; who preparing towards Normandy, was stopped with such golden shoures from King William that he could not passe, so that Duke Robert was constrained to make a peace with his brother, though for himselfe a very sorry one, as saith Gemeticensis; which, as Paris reporteth, was effected by twine Princes vpon either part, and the conditions as followeth: that King William should retaine and enioy the Countie of Euue with Fescampe, the Abbaacie of Mount Saint-Michael, and all the Castles hee had gotten in Normandy: for the Duke it was agreed, that his brother King William should aide and assist him, to recouer those lands & territories beyond the seas, which had bene belonging to their Father; That all such Normans as had lost their liuings in England, in taking part with Duke Robert, should be restored: and lastly, whether of them should die first, the suruiuer should be his heire.

(13) Peace thus established, and both their powers united, they bent altogether against Henry their yongest brother, who fearing after-claps, had strongly fortified the Castle of Mount Saint-Michael, situated vpon the confines of Normandy and Britaine: him, who they ought to haue provided for, (saith Gemeticensis) they went about to expell, and all the Lent long laid siege against him.

It chanced one day as his men sallied out, & made a bratado in the face of their beleaguers; King William alone, more bold then wise, rode against them, thinking none so hardy as to encounter him single; but presently a Knight slew his horse vnder him, & his foot entangled in the stirrups hee was ouerthrowne; his enemy therefore with drawn sword, was ready to haue slaine him, had hee not reuealed himselfe by his voice: the armed men with great reuerence then tooke him vp, and brought him another horse; when the King not staying for the stirrup, sprang into the saddle, and with an angry countenance demanded, who it was that ouerthrew him? the Knight as boldly answered, and shewed himselfe who he was; by Lukes face, quoth William (for that was his oath) thou shalt bee my Knight, and be enrolled in my Checke, with a Fee answerable to thy worth.

(14) During this seige, Prince Henry being fore distressed for water, and knowing Duke Robert to be of the milder temperature, sent him word of his want, desiring to haue that permitted, which God had made common, and giuen euen to brute beasts, aswell as to men; Duke Robert therefore commanded him to be supplied, whereat William was wroth, telling his Brother he wanted discretion, & policy in warre, which allowed all advantages to surpris the Enemy: And doft thou (saith Robert) esteeme more of water, which is euery where to be got, then of a Brother, hauing no more but him and me? In which diffension, Earle Henry got thence; and by policy tooke a very strong towne called Danford, where presently was a reconciliation made amongst these three brethren, who thereupon forthwith tooke the Seas together for England.

(15) About this time, in the yeere of Grace, 1091, and fourth of King Rufus his raigne, one Emon the sonne of Cadur Lord of Dyret, mouing rebellion against Rees ap Tewdor Prince of Southwales, drew to his side Iestyn Lord of Glamorgan, vpon promise to become his sonne in law by the marriage of his daughter: Iestyn notwithstanding, iudging their faction too weak, sent Emon into England, where hee was well acquainted, to procure aide against Rees: who entering conference of his businesse with Robert Fitz-hamon a worthy Knight of the Kings Priuie-Chamber, wrought so far with him, being a man easily drawne to the exercise of warre, that for a Salarie hee undertooke the seruice, and with twelue Knights, and a competent number of Souldiers went into Wales, where ioining with Iestyn, in battle slew Prince Rees ap Tewdor, with Co-nam his sonne. Robert Fitz-hamon, now minding to returne, demanded his pay according to covenants; which Iestyn in some part denied, alledging that Emon had gone beyond his commission: whereupon such discord arose, that these friends fell out, and Emon thus touched in his reputation, sided with the English against his owne Country-men; whereupon a battaile was fought, and Iestyn with most of his Welsh saine, so that Robert with his followers obtained a fruitfull possession in those parts, (which by their policies are enioied euen to this day) whose names, as they are found written in a British record, were as followeth.

(16) As these things were commenced betwixt England, Normandy, and Wales, Malcolme King of Scotland entred into the English Marches as farre as to Chester in the Streete, doing much harme; whose farther outrage to prevent, William incontinently halted, sending by sea a great Nauie of Shippes, and by land his brother Robert, though with much losse of either: for his Fleet was torne by tempest, and his horsemen through hunger & cold perished in those barren parts: at length the Kings came to an Interuue, where by the meanes of Edgar Atheling, a peace was concluded to both their contents: for William restored vnto Malcolme twelue Villages, which hee had held in England vnder his Father, and gaue him yearly twelue Markes in gold: And King Malcolme for his part promised to keepe true peace with him, as hee had done with the Conquerour, whereunto hee gaue him his Oath, as saith Mathew Paris.

(17) But as these two Kings of Enemies were made friends, so the two Brethren of reconciled friends became againe enemies: for Duke Robert well perceiving, that King William meant nothing lesse then performance of covenants, (protracting time vpon some secret purposes, as his ienious head conceived) in great displeasure returned into Normandy, taking with him Edgar Atheling, whom he held in an especiall account.

(18) King William then repairing those Castles which the Scots had destroyed, new built in Cumberland the City Carlisle, which two hundred yeares before had bene spoiled by the Danes; and hauing defended it with walles, built there the Castle, Churches, and Houses, wherein hee placed a Colonie of Southerne Souldiers, with their wives and children, granting large priuiledges to the place, which the City enioieth euen vnto this day.

(19) And hauing settled his affaires thus in the North, returneth with triumph into the South, where immediately hee fell dangerously sicke, in the sixth yeere of his Raigne, at the Citie of Gloucesters, whose finnes beganne to fit so neere his heart, (not looking to continue to commit many more) that hee sore repented him of the same, making approve: that without his licence none should goe or appeale to Rome in any cause: that Anselme could not keepe his Allegiance to his Soueraigne, and also to the Pope. Vpon all which points the Prelates of England, excepting only Gundolphus B. of Rocheſter, assented to the King against Anselmus, that he was guilty of High Treason, for attempting to deprive the Crowne of these prerogatiues.

(34) And because the King then vrged, that here- in he did no more then his Father had done before him, it shal not be impertinent to obserue heere, how that, as Vrbannus vſed Anselmus for his instrument to draw the King to his becke; so Pope Gregorie before him vſed Archbilhop Lanfranks helpe for vndermining of William the Conquerour, and to subiect him and his State to the Papacie; which that it will appeare the better, I will here insert the Conquerours owne Letter to the Pope.

To Gregory the most Excellent Pastor of Holy Church, William by the grace of God, King of England and Duke of Normandy, witheth health and friendship. Your Legat Hubert (Religious Father) came unto me, exhorting me, in your name, to make Allegiance to you, and your Successors, and to take better order for the money which my Predecessors were wont to send to the Church of Rome. The one I haue granted; of the other I haue not admitted. Fealtie to you, I neither would nor will make; for I neither promised you so much, neither finde I that euer my Antecessors did performe it to yours. The money hath bene negligently gathered, my selfe almost these three yeeres being in France; but being by Gods mercy returned into my Kingdome, as much as is Collected is now sent by the said Legate: the rest shall be sent when it may conveniently, by the messengers of Lanfranke our faithfull servant. Pray for us, and for the good estate of our Kingdome; for I haue loved your Predecessors; and my desire is above all others sincerely to loue you, and to heare you obediently.

His Holinesse was then very wroth, that things did not cotten better to his desires in England. But Lanfranke cleared himselfe of the blame, shewing him how diligently (but indeed traitterously) hee had bestirred himselfe, in counselling the King to yeeld to swear obedience to the Pope: Snashied non persuasi (saith he) I haue so aduised him, but I could not persuade him.

(35) By which incredible pride and Popish in- croachments, attempted by the means of these chiefest Prelates of the Kingdome, King William Rufus (no doubt) saw it was high time for him to prevent further mischiefes to his State, by following his Fathers steps in timely repressing such Papall intrusions: yea so farre was hee from yeelding his necke to that yoke, that hee auowed, that the Popes, though boasting of Peters Chaire, had not from him any power of binding or loosing, whose godly stepes they wholly neglected, following onely after Lucre and worldly Honours: that also it was but impoſture to teach Intercession, and bootlesse to vſe Inuocation to Saints, euen to Saint Peter himselfe. And as for the rest of the Romish Clergie, who then gaue themselves strangely to worldly and fleshly pleasures, wearing their guilt girdles and spurs, and trimming their bushe Locks; their loose liues the King much detested, and fought to punish; which most incensed their Choler: and these were the hairens no doubt in those Monkish writers Pennes that euer blotted his faire name, vnder their fast-running, and vneuen hands. For so much may we gather from Gemeintensis the Recorder of his life, who hauing reported many Acts of this Kings, seemeth lastly to checke himselfe for going so farre: where (he saith) These and many other like things wee could truly report of him, were it not we think it unconuenient largely to relate his actions, because he persecuted verie many of Gods seruants; and the holy Church not a little, for which it is thought by the most part of wisemen, that he repented too late and vnpitifully.

(36) And true it is, that some of them haue taxed him for great Pride and Couetousnesse, whereof yet some pregnant examples to the contrary are not wanting; as, (though the instance bee somewhat familiar) when his Chamberlaine bringing him a paire of new hoſe, and he demanding the price, was answered that they cost three shillings; Away base fellow (quoth he) are those beſeeming a King? bring mee of a Marke price: his seruant went, but brought him another paire of no greater cost, yet tolde him (as great Mens reckonings usually are made) that they were of the rate appointed: wherewith the King was very well pleased, and disbursed that great Price to fulfill his owne pride.

(37) His Couetousnesse what it was, may hence appeare, that when two Monkes whose Abbat was lately dead, repaired to his Court, and each in large offers out-uid and ouerbaid the other, to succeed in the Abbacie; a third Monke very sober, and poore in shew, accompanying them in their businesse, stood by; whom the King asked what he would giue to be made Abbat? Nothing, said the Monke; for I entered my profession to be poore, and hitherto haue bene, little ſeeming the pompe or riches of the world. Then thou art the man (replied the King) and shalt be their Abbat, more worthy in thy poutie, then they for their price; and so conferring on him that high honour, checked the others to their open infamy and reproach.

As the like he also did to Hugh a Norman Knight, and Souldier by profession, who of a sincere deuotion had entred the Monkish Order in the Monasterie of S. Auguſtines at Canterbury, and at the death of Vido the Abbat, was but a Probationer; when coming with others to the King for the election of another, was chosen himselfe (though fore against his will) without any request or proffer; whose penitency and vnfained humility so moued the King, that in this his Election he burst forth into teares.

(38) Other faults I grant hee is charged with, wherein we haue not and cannot vtterly acquit him: as this besides others, that his chiefest Comforts were Effeminated persons, Russians and the like, and himselfe said to haue delighted continually in Adulteries, and the Company of Concubines, etiam coram Sole, shamelesse and in the sight of the Sunne; though none of them be named, nor any his illegitimate issue knowne; and yet onely, or especially for his sins, many strange signes of Gods wrath are reported to haue happened in the time of his raigne.

(39) For in his second yeere a terrible and most dreadful Earth-quake happened: And in his fourth, a vehement Lightning pierced the Steeple of the Abbey at Winſcombe, rent the beames of the rooſe, caſt downe the Crucifixe, brake off his right legges, and wichall ouerthrew the Image of our Lady standing hard by, leauing such a stench in the Church, that neither incense, holy-water, nor the singing of the Monkes could allay it. And not long after, so great a tempest of winde happened, that in London it bare downe fixe hundred Houſes, and blew off the rooſe of Bow-Church, which with the Beames were borne into the Aire a great height; fixe whereof being twenty seven foot long, with their fall were driuen twenty three foote deepe into the ground, the streets of the City lying then vnpacked.

In the ninth of his Raigne a blazing Starre appeared with two buſſies, and other Starres seemed to shoote darts each against others, to no little feare and amazement of the beholders. The last of his Raigne, the Sea breaking ouer his limited banks, drowned an innumerable multitude of people in many Countries, and in Kent ouerwhelmed the lands that sometime were Earle Goodwins, which as yet are called Goodwins Sands, lying very dangerous for all Navigators. But most fearefull was the Wel of blood, which for fifteene daies rose vp out of the ground at Finchamſted neere Abington in Barkſhire. His owne dreame, wherein it seemed the veins of his Armes to be broken, and abundauce of his blood streaming on on the floore; as likewise that Monkes, who in his sleepe saw the Crucifixe to spurne the King to the ground: these with many like, were held as preſages of his death, which presently followed. Ofal which, or the most part, what better censure can wee giue, then that which King William himselfe (when this last vision was told him) did deliuer; saying, Well, a Monke he is, and can dreame (Monachiliter) as Monkes use to doe, onely for to gaine. Giue him an hundred shillings, lest he should thinke he had dreamed bootlesse.

(40) Whatſoeuer force those preſages had, it is true, that vpon the second day of August, as he was hunting in the new Forrest, and in the place called Choreſham, all his Company being scattered from him, sauing onely a French Knight, whose name was Walter Tirrell, the King with his arrow strooke a Stag, which yet not greatly hurt ranne away; to marke therefore the course that it tooke, he held vp his hand betwixt his eie and the Sunne, when vnawares also Walter Tirrell so shot, that his Arrow glancing against a tree, strooke the King in his brest, who hastily breacking off so much as stucke out of his body, with one onely groane fell downe and died. Of which sudden chance, his followers foone vnderstanding, most of them made away, but those few which remained, laid his body (bafely God wot, but as necessity sufficed) into a Colliers Cart, which drawne with one filly leane Beast, through a very foule and filthy way, the Cart broke, and there lay the spectacle of worldly glory, both pittifully goared, and filthily beimed, til after ward he was thence conuayed vnto Wincheſter, and buried vnder a plaine flat Marble stone in the Quire of Saint Swithens, the Cathedral Church of the City, whose bones were since taken vp, and laid into a Coffin, with the bones of Canutus. Hee died after he had raigned twelue yeeres, eleuen moneths lacking eight daies, being the yeere of his age forty three, and of Christ Iesus, 1100.

(41) He was of person indifferent, not of any great stature, yet very wel set, his belly (like his Fathers) somewhat bearing out: of complexion a Ruddy, whereof he tooke his surname, and his haire somewhat yellow, his forehead flat and square, and his Eies diuerſely coloured; a stammering tongue, especially in his anger; gorgeous in apparell, and of no sparing diet; very bountifull to Souldiers, often hard to Churchmen, burdensome to his Subjects, an expert Souldier, that could wel both endure labour of the Body, and put off cares of the minde; in his affaires circumspect, of his word stedfast, and in his warres no lesse diligent, then fortunate. He gaue to the Monkes called de Charitate, the great New-Church of Saint Sauours of Barmondſey in Southwarke, which he built, with his Mannor of Barmondſey it selfe, and all the appurtenances, together with the Towne of Charleton: confirming all that had bene giuen them before. He also of an old Monastery in York founded a new Hospital, to the honour of Saint Peter, for the sustentation of poore men and women: dying as we haue said, without Wife or Issue, or without respite of time for dispose of his Crowne, or other worldly affaires.

CHAPTER III.

Will. Malm.
John Rous.
Anales S. Aug.
Math. Paris.

Henry, the youngest sonne of the Conquerour and third King of his race, was born here in England, and brought up in learning euē fro his child-hood, whereby hee gained to himselfe the high honour very rare in those daies, especially in Princes, to be, and to bee stiled the Beauclerk: whose portion of Treasure was not a little, given him by his father, neither any whit spared by himselfe to purchase friends at the death of his Brother, * Henry of Newburgh the right Noble, veruous and learned Earle of Warwicke, euē making his way both with the Clergy and Nobles, who * refused to admit any King but with capitulation and covenants to their owne likings.

(2) The steps then by which hee mounted the Throne of Maiesty, were the dislikes of Williams our-hard curbing of his Natives, as he euē called the Engliſh: the rash and giddy head of his brother Robert; his absence in Syria, for whose returne to stay was dangerous, and whose election for King of Ierusalem, was likely to imploy his person there: his Engliſh-birth, hauing both a King and Queene to his Parents; his faire promises for reformation of bad and rigorous Lawes, imposed by his Father and Brother; the restoring of the Clergy from exile, and to their Church-Liuing; remission of Taxes exacted on the Subiects; and due punishments of such persons as were the chiefe Caulers thereof, in which behalfe to satisfie the People hee committed Ralph Bishop of Durham to the Tower. Then promising by Oath to frame iust Lawes grounded on those of Saint Edward (then which nothing was more desired) did winde himselfe so farre into the loves of all, that with a general concurrence hee was saluted King.

(3) He began his raigne the second of August, the sacred rites of whose Coronation were celebrated at Westminster, by Maurice Bishop of London (in the absence of Anselme Archbishop of Canterbury) the fifth day of the same month, the yeere of Christ 1100. When Henry the fourth possessed the Imperiall Diadem, Philip the first iwaied the Scepter of France, Edgar wore the Crowne of Scotland, and Paschall the second late in the See of Rome.

(4) His first businesse was to put in execution what he had promised; and because hee might be thought unfit to guide a large kingdom, who cannot reforme those who are euē at his elbow, began (as a good Prince ought) with his owne Court and Household (as knowing that to be the paterne and warrant of others enormities) whence hee cashiered all Court-minions and nice or effeminate wantons, and enacting a decrec against his Courtiers Rapines, Adulteries and Robberies, punished their Thefts with * death, and Lechery with the * losse of their Eies, and other parts peccant.

Then herestored to the Engliſh the vse of Lights, which his father forbad by the ringing of a Bell, and had now continued for the space of thirty three yeeres, ordaining likewise many good Lawes, and common Liberties, exemplified at large in Mathew Paris, which summarily may be thus abridged.

- 1 The Freedome of the Church from oppressions, or reſeruation of their Possessions upon vacancies.
- 2 That the Heires of his Nobility should possess the Lands of their Fathers, without redemption from him, which fauour the Nobles likewise should afford to their Tenants.
- 3 That the Gentry might giue in Marriage their Daughters and Kinswomen without his licence, so it were not to his Enemy.
- 4 That the widow should haue her Jointer, and not be compelled to marry against her owne liking.
- 5 That the Mother or next of kindred, shall be Guardian of the Lands of her Children.
- 6 That Coiners of false money should bee * punished; a likewise ordained a measure to the length of his * Arme to be a standard for Commerce among his People.
- 7 Then did hee forgive all debts to the Crowne before his owne time, and murders committed before the day of his Coronation: with some other like indulgences: But, to the greatest content of the People, hee gaue power and strength unto King Edwards Lawes.

(5) To these his Ordinances he set his Name and Seale, with the subscription of sundry Peeres, commanding as many Copies as there were Counties in England to be transcribed and kept in the Monasteries of euery Prouince. Then did hee recall Anselm Archbishop of Canterbury forced out of the Land by Rufus, and bestowed all vacant Church-luings vpon the worthiest persons. But to ground his new planted affection more deepe in the hearts of the Engliſh, he became a suter to Edgar King of Scotland, to haue his sister to wife, which was Maude the daughter of Queen Margaret, Sister to Edgar Etheling and Grand-child of Edmund Ironside, whereby his issue might meere be both of the Engliſh blood and of the ancient Engliſh Kings.

(6) Shee by report of some writers had vowed Virginity, and was brought vp in a house of Religion at Winchester (hauing entred the profession of a Nun vnder her Aunte Christiane) whose sanctity and knowledge both in matters humane and diuine; with her mother Margaret, are highly commended (saith Gemetice) in a book written of their lines: Norwithstanding others hold that shee vailed her selfe but for a shift, to put off some vnworthy matches, which her father Malcolme would haue imposed her; and indeed this scruple was such a Core in Anselm his mouth that he would not pronounce the words of Contract vntill her selfe had cleared the doubt by her open confession.

(7) Duke Robert, who now had bin five yeeres in the holy warres, and therein borne himselfe with such valour that hee of all the Christian Princes was thought the worthiest to bee anointed King of Ierusalem, had their voice and election standing in the Temple before the Altar, vpon Easter-Eue: and that the rather by a miracle of his Taper, which tooke light of it selfe, or from Heauen (if wee will be so light to beleue it:) but he hearing of the death of Rufus, refused that, in hope to haue England; for which his neglect of Diuine appointment, it is said God neuer after prospered him: then returning from Syria into Normandy was there ioufully receiued, and assumed again his Dukedom (which hee had engaged to his brother William) without repayment of any money: where hearing that Henry his younger, was slept into his throne of England, laid proiects in his minde how to defeat him. And to further these his designs, Ralph Bishop of Durham, corrupting his keepers, brake out of the Tower of London & gat into Normandy, where hee instigated Duke Robert against his brother of England; others also delighting in alterations, solicited Robert to make into England, with promise of their assistance to recouer the Crowne.

(8) King Henry for his part resolving to hold what hee had got, neglected no means to keepe the Diadem as it was set, and therefore rigged forth his Nauie to secure the Seas, manned his fortresses, and with agreat Army repaired towards the Coast, where heere vnto Hastings hee lodged his Campe, relying more vpon his owne strength and valour of his People, then any iust title hee had to the Kingdom.

(9) Duke Robert by this time had taken the Seas, and was vpon the Kings fleet before they were aware, where preparing for Conflict, the most of the Engliſh fell to the Normans, either by the perswasion of the Duke or in hatred of Henry, that then began to tyrannize ouer them as they did imagine: By which means the Duke, had safe landing at Pevesmouth, and did not a little reioice in this his fortunate beginnings: threatening his brother to be reuēged for his wrongs; & blaming the Nobility for suffering him thus to be abused, whilst hee for the common good of Christendome, was imployed in the Holy-Lands warre. King Henry, as wise, as the other was valorous, wrought vnder hand for an agreement of peace; for hee very well saw, that the euē of warre hath commonly issue from the first successe, and at one and the same time doth bolden and weaken the courage of the multitude; & therefore certaine Noblemen on both sides so trauided the businesse, that the Brethren in short time became friends, and a composition made to both their contents. The agreement was thus, that, because Henry was borne after his fathers Conquest of this Land, and stood now the Crowned King with common consent, hee should during his life, enioy the same, paying Duke Robert in way of fealty three thousand Markes by yeere: and the suruiour to be heire to his brother deceased, if hee died without a sonne. In which it was also concluded, that all, either Engliſh or Normans, which had taken part with the King or Duke, should be pardoned of all offences, and their Liuing againe restored: for the Confirmation whereof, and the performance accordingly, twelve Princes vpon either parties took their Corporall Oathes; and the Armies presently dissolued.

(11) The Norman Duke princely entertained the space of fixe months in the Court of King Henry, shewed himself rather open & credulous, then any way suspicious, in all his carriages, & so with much liking, & loue to his brother, departed vnto his own Country. But the Sunne-shine of these faire daies, began forthwith to be ouercast, by the incitation of such as endeouored to sow discord betwixt the two Brethren: and not only those in Normandy, which euer buzd teailoues into Duke Roberts cares, but eue in England also, some fell in dislike of King Henry, and affecting alteration, with the malignant eie of enuy beheld the glory of his beauteous Crowne.

(12) Amongst whom, Robert Belasme Earle of Shrewsbury, the eldest sonne of Roger Mountgomery, strengthened the Towns and Castles of Shrewsbury, Bridenorth, Tichile, and Arundell, with victuals, munition, and men, against the Kings alluring likewise the fickle Welshmen vnto his designs. Henry therefore in rage & halt, marched thitherward with a great power against Arundell Castle, hee raised another of wood: and tooke it besieged Bridenorth, which presentlie yielded, and Shrewsbury sent him their keyes and pledges of their obedience: when Belasme with his brother Arnulfus, and Roger de Poytiers, were constrained to abiure the Land for euer, and thereupon went into Normandy, where they ceased not to raise more sparks from that brand which others before them had blowne.

(13) Neither were those men busie to raise stirs abroad, then was Archbishop Anselmus to doe it at home; who being a man of a stiffe resolution, in a Councell holden at London, drew on him the offence both of the King and Clergie: for therein, first, he excommunicated all married Priests, * halfe the Clergie of England at that time being either married or the sons of married Priests; next he inhibited all lay men to heare their masses. But this thing (saith Paris) howe euer it seemed good to some, yet vnto others very dangerous, lest while they affected after a purity which was above their strength, they might fall into impurity of a higher quality. In this Councell also Anselme, peremptory vpon the Popes assistance, depriued many great Prelates of their promotions, because they had accepted their Inueltures from the King which was done by receiuing of a Pastoral staffe and a ring, an ancient rite, testifying that their donation was from their Soueraigne, (as S. willstan receiued his Staffe from S. Edward, and therefore professed hee would resigne it onely to him): in which number were the Abbots of Ely, of Ramsey, of Perfor, of S. Edmunds, of Tanelock, Peterborough, Wurch, Bodae, Middleton, and Stoke: for which his bold parts, and for refusing to consecrate certain Bishops, aduanced by the King, great contention fell betwixt him and the Archbishop, who taking himselfe much wronged by the present ouerbearing power, appealed vnto his Holy Father, Pope Paschall, and soone after went in person to Rome vnto him.

(14) Vnto whom likewise the King sent his Ambassadors, namely Herbert Bishop of Norwiche, with Robert Bishop of Lichfield, both of them of his pruiue Counsell, and William Warcest his procurator a Clergy man, of a very bold spirit and speech, who in debating his Soueraigns cause before the Pope and cardinals, with threatening language and countenance a-touched, that the King his Master would not lose his right in the Inueltures of the Church, for the losse of his Kingdom: whereto the Pope, (no Crauant to be dared on his owne dunghill) as stoutly answered; If, as thou sayest, the King will not lose the donation of Churches, for the losse of his Kingdom, know thou for certaine (before God I speake it) that I would not suffer him to enjoy them without punishment, no not for the saving of my head: notwithstanding which braue words against the King, yet the degraded Abbots were restored throug the Clemency of the Papall see, which is neuer wanting to any, as long as the white and red, (to vse the very words of a Monke) make intercession for them. But from the Church to the State.

(15) Robert Curtuaise, either to sound his brothers designs, or to congratulate him in a brotherly loue, came into England, where hee was so royally entertained, that all suspicion was quenched, and himselfe so well contented, that at the onely motion and request of Queene Maude, he remitted the three thousand Marks, couenanted to be paid yeerly vnto him, though hee were lesse able to forebare, then King Henry to giue. But when his wants told him of this his ouer lauidh release, he openly exclaimed against King Henry, that hee had craftily circumvented, and deceitfully cheated him; and now giuing open care and credit to such as fought their disunion, gaue his Brother all occasions of enmity, who was ready enough of himselfe, to make the least very great. For besides this present displeasure conceived against Duke Robert, he added others, and this especially, that he had willfully waisted the Inheritance which his father had left him, to wit the Dukedom of Normandy, hauing nothing now almost in that Dominion besides the City of Roane, which he would haue parted with all, had not the Cittizens thereto denied their consents.

(16) Neither was it the least motiue to King Henries displeasure, that his traitorous subiects were so willingly receiued by his brother; for besides Robert Belasme and others, William, Earle of Mortaigne in Normandy, and of Cornwall in England, the sonne of Robert, halfe brother to the Conquerour, because the Earldome of Kent (which he made claime vnto, as heire to his vnkle Odo) was denied him, in a discontent got him into Normandy, where besides his valiant assaults of the Kings Castles, and Soldiers, hee much endangered the possessions of Richard Earle of Chester, then a child and the Kings Ward: so that the flames of warre raised by these feditions, seemed to be blown from England vnto the parts beyond the Seas, and to fire the territories of the English there; neither is it easie to declare (saith Houen) what misery (the meane while) by exactions the land felt here at home.

(17) For the King incited into Normandy vpon these occasions, by large distributions of money carried out of England, wonne the Normane Nobility to reuolt from their Lord, and tooke the Towne and Castle of Cane by composition, and burnt Bayon with the beautifull Church of Saint Maries, whereupon the Priors of Normandy yielded themselves vnto his Protection; by whose example the Brittaines and those of Anjou did the like; so that their Castles and forts were filled with the Garrisons of King Henry, Duke Robert in no wise able to resist, which done Henry with triumph returned into England.

(18) The Curtuaise by his Normans thus vncourtously dealt with, law it was bootlesse against so great a streame to sturue, and therefore thought best to lay away weapons, and to become himselfe a Mediatour for Peace. With which resolution taking the seas, hee followed his brother vnto Northampton; where humbling himselfe in a more deuotiu manner, then either his birth, or owne nature could well brooke, desired the Kings peace, both in respect of their brotherly vnion, and the regard of his owne accustomed clemency; willing him to consider, that warre was not only vnnatural betwixt brethren, but that a reproch euer follows the chariot of the Victor, desiring him not to triumph in his ouerthrow, who was now ready to render all that hee had into his hands: but King Henry muttering to himselfe, turned away from his brother without any answer.

(19) For God (saith Paris) not pleased to giue the effect, though the Beau-clearke felt a remorse in conscience, for vsurping his Kingdom (being indeed very learned, and well vnderstanding the duties both of equity and law) and thereupon became both to feare some violent inuersion of the subiects, and also the reuenging wrath of God vpon him for his trecherous and vnjust dealings towards his elder brother, to whom undoubtedly the Kingdom

Kingdome by all right did appertaine: yet stood hee rather in feare of men then God (whose fauours he cunningly laboured to keepe) whom he meant to please another time by building of an Abbey for his satisfaction. Duke Robert then seeing and detesting the Kings swolne pride, posted backe vnto Normandy to gather his powers. Henry also held it good policy, not to giue passage vnto Roberts wrath, knowing him a Souilder, and well waying his desperate estate: and therefore calling his Lords vnto London, in an assembly tickled their eares with these delectable and smooth words.

(20) My friends, and faithful Counsellors, and native Countreimen, you know by true report how my Brother Robert was elected, and by God himselfe called to be the fortunate King of Ierusalem, and how vnfortunately, or rather intolently, he refused that sacred estate, whereby hee is now most iustly reprobated of God: you also know by many other experiments, his pride and arrogancy; for being a man of a warring humor, hee is not onely impatient of a peace, but also wilfully desirous to trample vpon you as men of abiection and contemptible disposition, vbraiding you for idle drowes, for belly-gods, and what not? But I your King, naturally inclined to be both humble and peaceable, take delight in nothing more then to do you good, to maintain your tranquillity and ancient liberties, (as I haue often sworn vnto you, and meekely and willingly to yield my selfe to your aduises, whereby I may circumpectly gouerne you as a clement Prince: and to that end euen now will I confirme (if your wisdomes so thinke fit) your ouer-worne and vndermined Charters, and will roborate them most firmly with a new oath and ratification. Meane while, all the lawes which the holy King Edward by Gods inspiring did establish, I doe here commaund to be inuolubly obserued, hereby to moue you to adhere stedfastly vnto mee, in repelling cheerfully, willingly, and powerfully, the wrongs offered me, by my brother that I say nay, by my most deadly enemy & yours, and of the whole English Nation: For if I bee guarded with the valours and affections of Englishmen, I shall scorne the threats of him and his Normans, as forcelesse, and no whit to be feared. And with these faire promises (which yet afterwards hee vterly neglected) hee so wonne the hearts of them all, that they would die with him, or for him, against any hostility whatsoever.

(21) Duke Robert gone, and preparing for warre, Henry thus led in his peoples affection, followed him with all expedition, hauing in his company the choice Nobility of England, Normandy, Gaunt, and Britaine, so that hee was exceedingly strong. With Robert, for men of chiefe account, were Robert Belasme, Earle of Shrewsbury, and William Earle of Mortaigne, in like displeasure with the King, and therefore armed with the like desperate boldnes.

(22) Henry with his Army had pierced into Normandy, euen as farre as Tenechebray, a Castle of the Earle of Mortaigne, vnto all meanes possible to surpris the same, for whose rescue, the Duke with these his Consorts, made all diligence to dissolue the siege, and after some few skirmishes ioined a bloody battaile, brauely fought on each part, where at the first onset, the Kings power (though much greater in number) went down; but by their multitude and manhood (especially through the Kings example and encouragement) they soone preuailed, where Duke Robert, with Earle William, and sundry others of good note, manfully fighting in the very preffice of their enemies, were taken prisoners; but Robert Belasme escaped by flight. And thus (as Matthew Paris obserued) Gods Iustice & Mercy tooke effect his Iustice vpon Robert, for his refusal of Ierusalem; title, and vnto Henry his fauour, according to the prophesie of King William his Father. This battaile was fought, and Normandy wonne, vpon

Saturday, being the Vigill of S. Michael, euen the same day forty yeares that William the Bastard set foot on Englands Shore for his Conquest; God so disposing (saith Malmesbury) that Normandy should be subiect to England that very day, wherein England was subdued to Normandy.

(23) Robert Curtuaise, that now vnfortunate Prince, and William Mortaigne, that valiant, but headstrong Earle, were forthwith sent into England and imprisoned; the Earle in the Tower of London, and the Duke in Cardiffe Castle in Wales, after hee had gouerned the Dutchy of Normandy nineteen yeeres, and was for esteeme in Chiuallie accounted among the best Captains that the world then afforded, had hee not bene (as commonly martiall spirits vse to be) too rash and vnstaid in his other enterprises; which headnesse did now draw vpon him a penance of twenty fixe yeeres continuance, in the afflicted state of a forlorne Captiue. And Henry now no longer as a brother, receiuing the keyes of Normandy, as a Conquerour returned into England.

(24) But long it was not ere Duke Robert, weary of this vnwonted dureffe, sought to escape, and hauing liberty to walke in the Kings Meadows, Forrests, and Parkes, brake from his Keepers without any Asilters, or meanes for security: who being milke, was presentlie pursued, and taken in a quag-mire, wherein his Horse lay fast: whereupon the King hearing of this his attempt, considering that woods were no walles to restrain the fierce Lyon, and that to play with his claw was to endanger a fate, commanded him not onely a greater restraint and harder durance; but also (a thing vnfit for a brother to suffer, but most vnworthy for Beau-clearke to act) both his eyes to be cut out, causing his head to be held in a burning balon (to auoid the deformity of breaking the eye-balls) vntill the glassie tunicles had lost the office of retaining their light.

(25) Hauing thus quieted all forraine oppositions, King Henry set his minde to preuent Domestickes; and therefore (about this time) those Flemmings, whose Lands the Seas had deuoured some few yeeres before, and place was granted them in Cumberland, first by King Rufus, and afterwards by Henry; were now by the King, vpon better aduilement, removed into Wales, both to disburden his Inland of such guests, and that so they might bee a defence betwixt him and those euer stirring people. Which proiect nothing deceiued his expectation; for by the testimony of Giraldus, They were a Colony stout and strong, and continually endured the warres of the Welch; a Nation most accustomed to seek gaine by cloathing, by tripping also and Marchandize by Sea and Land, undertaking any paines, or perils whatsoever. A people of very great power, and as time and place requireth, ready by turnes to take plough in hand and till the ground, as ready also to goe into the field and fight it out; and that I may adde thus much more (saith hee) a Nation most lolally deuoted to the Kings of England, and as faithfull to the Englishmen.

(26) By the which his policy, he attained that which his brother Rufus could not, who many a time had but small successe in those parts though otherwise, euer sped most fortunately in all his adventures of warres: But it is thought by some, that as the Mountainous cragginess of the Country, and sharpnesse of the Aire, encouraged them in their rebellion; so the same impeached Rufus his successe.

But King Henrie (saith Malmesbury) who with many a warlike expedition went about to force the Wellmen, euer stirring vnto Rebellion, for to yeeld and to submit themselves; in the end resolved vpon this whole some policie for to take down their pride, hee brought thither all the Flemmings that dwelt in England: a great number of which Nation in those daies, inregard of his mothers kindred by her Fathers side, flocking thither, were clothed (spread in England, in so much as they for their multitude seemed burdensome vnto the Realme: Wherefore hee sent them all together with their substance, their Wines, and and Children, unto Rosse a Country in Wales, as it were into a common audience, thereby both to purge his own kingdom, and also to qualle and repress the desperate boldnesse of his Enemies.

(27) And now being free from all feare of subverters, King Henry, growing disdainfull (saith Paris) refused to fulfil what he had so oft promised to his Nobles, heaping threats upon threats; for God had bestowed on him three bounties, wisdom, victory, and riches, above any of his Predecessors: but for all these he showed himselfe to God most unthankfull: And of his Clergy (wee may say) too regardlessly, in suffering Anselm, newly reconciled, to lay heauy punishments vpon the married Priests, putting many from their places, because they denied to put away their Lawfull wiues, whereof great contention followed, and grievous finnes in short time committed, both against God and Nature.

(28) Among these proceedings in England, Philip King of France deceased, and his sonne Lewis surnamed Crassus succeeded in his gouernement, which how he too affected to Henry was doubted, and therefore to make sure worke, the King failed into Normandy, furnishing his Townes, Castles, and Fortresses, with all habiliments of warre, with provisions befitting such suspected times; and so returning, he found attending his coming, the Ambassadors of Henrie the fourth Emperour, as suters from their Master to obtaine Lady Maud the Kings daughter in Marriage, then not past five yeeres of age, which was willingly graunted, and the espousals by way of Proxy solemnized, with great feasts and magnificent triumphs.

(29) About which time the death of Archbishop Anselme happening, gaue no small hope to the Clergy, as themselves conceited, againe to enioy the liberty of matrimoniall society; wherein they were not a little deceived: for the King seemed willing that the Ecclesiasticall Ordinance before made should be more neerely looked into; whereupon men for feare, and in the light of men, carried themselves accordingly, but if in secret they did worse (saith Eadmerus) let the charge light on their own heads, fith eueri man shall beare his owne finnes: for I know, (saith hee) that if Fornicators and Adulterers God will iudge, the abusers of their owne Consens, (I will not say, their own Sisters and Daughters) shall not surely escape his iudgement.

(30) The Kings peace, which seemed to be secured by his new affinity with the Emperour, and his glory raised to the high, began now to be enuied, and his brother Duke Roberts extremities greatly to be pitied, both by some English and also Normans. For Foulke Earle of Anjou both threatened the reuenge, and by corrupting the inhabitants wanne the City of Constance, from his obedience. To stay whose irruptions King Henry passed into Normandy, where hee vied great extremity, and put to death Helia Earle of Genomanie, who held that County against him; for which cause Godfrey Earle of Gaunt tooke such displeasure that hee entred into that Earledome, and marrying the said Helia his daughter, kept the County perforce against King Henries great power. But Robert de Belusme that had escaped at Duke Roberts overthrow, was then taken and committed prisoner to Wygham Castle, too gentle a punishment for so blood-thirstie a man, whose nature was such, that he delighted himselfe onely in cruelty, an example whereof hee shewed vpon his owne sonne, who being but a childe and playing with him, the father for a pastime, put his thumbs in the boies eyes, and thrust out the ballies thereof.

(31) These warres somewhat allswaged, King Henry returned into England, where the people conceited much grudge at his importable taxes, and the Clergy no lesse at his reueration of Church liuings in their vacancies, vnder pretence of keeping them for the worthies; but how vnworthily hee oftentimes bestowed them, maybe gathered by that pretty reproof of Guymandus his Chaplain, who grieuing to see vnworthymen (for the most part) aduanced to Bishopricks and other dignities; when on the Rogation day he celebrated diuine seruice in the Kings Chapel, being to read that lesson out of Saint James, it rained not on the earth III. yeeres, and VI. moneths, hee purposely read it, it rained not one, one, one, yeeres, and fure, one, moneths. All men either laughing or wondering at his reading; the King checked him for it, and aske him the reason; marry (quoth hee) I see you bestow your preferments onely on such, as can read so which secret touch the King well weighing, did both presently preferre him to the gouernment of Saint Erideswides in the Vniuersity of Oxford, and afterward was more carefull in all other his choi-ces.

(32) The King had not beene long in England after his returne from Normandy, before the Welshmen (then a restless people) were in Armes against such English, as had set footing in that Country, which were Gilbert Strangbone Earle of Strygil, and others, whose lands in the south part Owen ap Cadogan fore molested and spoiled; the like did Gruffith ap Conan Prince of North-Wales vpon Hugh Earle of Chester County, and both of them denied King Henry either seruice or tribute. These Earles so incensed the King, touching these and other outrages of the Welshmen, that in a rage he vowed not to leaue one aliue in al North-Wales, nor in Powys-land; and straight repairing thitherward, diuided his Armie into 3. parts. The first was led by Earle Gilbert against South-wales; the second band by Alexander King of Scotland, and Hugh Earle of Chester against North-Wales; and the King himselfe lead the third, vnder whose Standard was the chiefe strength of middle England. But the Welsh seeing themselves far vnable to withstand this present preparation, tooke in to the Mountaines and Woods, (their surest holds) where being followed, with great difficulty, many of them were slaine, and the rest yielded to King Henry; who now as a Conquerour in triumph returned to London.

(33) Whither immediately resorted vnto him, the Ambassadour of his sonne in law the Emperour, to haue his wife Lady Maud now marriage-able, to be sent vnto him; to which request the King most willingly condescended, and to furnish her forth accordingly, laid a tax vpon his Subjects, taking three shillings for euery Hyl of land: whereupon the was presently conducted by his greatest Peeres into Germany, and at Mentz married to the Emperour Henry the fourth, being there consecrated and crowned his Emperesse.

(34) Shortly after King Henry tooke the Seas for Normandy, and there created his sonne William (about the age of twelue yeeres (Houeden saith but eight) Duke of that Country, causing the people to sweare him fealty, whereof grew a custome that thenceforth the Kings of England made euermore their eldest sonnes Dukes of Normandy; which done, he returned, and nothing recorded of his next yeeres adventures, but onely that the Sea gaue place to the Sands, and by low Ebbes restored some part of her treasures that long had lain hid and buried in her depth; the riuers likewise forgot their wonted swiftness; and as it were seemed vnwilling to pay their ancient tribute into that dejected Element, and among them Thamesis not the least, whose waters fo failed for two daies, that betwixt London Bridge and the Tower she became passable and scarce two foot deepe.

(35) King Henry free now from all forraine & domestical trouble (onely Gruffith ap Rees somewhat vnquiet in Wales) gaue his thoughts to assure the Crowne into his line, and to ordaine lawes for the well gouerning of his people; for calling an assembly at Salisbury, caused the Estates both Spirituall and Temporall, to sweare fealty to himselfe, and to his sonne William, the Hope of succession: then reforming many abuses, and ending certaine contentions both of his Nobles and Prelates, laid here the first foundation of our High Court of Parliament: for the English Kings in elder times, ordered the affaires of the Common-wealth, by their Edicts, by their officers, and by the Gouernours of euerie County, and feldome had the ioint aduice of their people; laing onely at beginning of their gouernment, and in time of warre; whereas now the Subject, best vnderstanding his owne grieuances, hath both liberty in choice of their Knights and Burgeses, as also free voice to complain thereof in that honourable assembly.

(36) At this time Theobald Earle of Bleffis, Nephew vnto King Henry, vpon occasion of displeasure rose vp in Armes against the French King, to whose aid King Henry sent; whereat Lewes found himselfe agrieved, and drew to his side Baldwin Earle of Flanders, and Foulke Earle of Anjou, who together tooke oath to dispossesse Henry of Normandy, and to make William the sonne of the Curtoise Duke thereof, to whom it belonged by right and descent; to which also many of the Nobles of Normandy consented; pityting the wrong of the noble spirited Child, and the wretched captiuitie of the blind, and ouer-borne Father.

(37) Henry as wisely wrought against their designs, and leauing a great tax vpon his Subjects, passed therewith into Normandy, where vnting the aides of the foresaid Theobald, as also of the Earle of Britaine, with his English, hee made a great heu in the field: at which time King Lewes with the Earles of Flanders and Anjou being entred Normandy, and hearing of King Henries approach and power, staid hardly one night, but as nie without hart or courage returned, and left the Country for him: so that all things seemed well quieted for a yeare or two; nothing disturbing King Henries peace, excepting onely the expectation of the Popes Legate, whom hee prohibited to enter England, and the death of his Queene Maud, the very mirrour of piety, humility, and princely bounty.

(38) But coales of displeasure kindled betwixt King Henry and Lewes of France, were not quite extinct, though they had laine for a while, as raked vp vnder cold ashes. For the next yeere following, and twentieth of his raigne, Lewes came into Normandy as hote in rage to do somewhat, as before he departed thence calme and cold; where forthwith he began to molest the Country; which K. Henry for a while suffered, till his friends noted him of cowardize; to whom hee replied that he had learned of his Father, to "break the foole hardines of the French, by patience, rather then by force: that they should not wonder, if hee were loath to be prodigall of their blood, whom he found so fast friends vnto him: that he would not gladly winne a Kingdom with their deatthes, whose liues hee still found deuoted to all hazards for his cause: that hee vied this backwardnesse, onely to stay them, whom hee saw so forward to testifie their zeale voluntarily, euen with their blood: which to proceed from prouidence, and not from dauidnesse, they should soone perceiue. This accordingly hee made good; and a pitched field was fought betwixt the Kings of England and France, whereof let vs heare the Monke Paris report. The French King (saith hee) hauing ordered his Armie into two Battalions, in the former of them placed William the sonne of Duke Robert, the brother of King Henry; the other, Lewes himselfe led, consisting of his speciall and chiefeft Souldiers. King Henry also disposed his forces into three Battalles, the first, consisting of his Peeres and men of Normandy: In the second, himselfe kept among his owne guard, and daile attendants: and in the third, hee marshalled his sonnes with the maine strength of the Footemen. The Armies thus ordered, the troupes on both sides gaue assault, whereof the first Battallion of the French brake through the ranks of the

Norman Nobles, overthrowing their Horse-men, and forcing them to scatter, in which violence they likewise brake into King Henries battaile, and put it much out of order: but he taking courage, and comforting his men beganne a most bloody and bold conflict: wherein himselfe was twice strooke vpon the head by William Crispin Countie of Eureux (whom for his offences Henry had before banished) whose sword and strokes were so sure and so heauie, that albeit the Kings helmet was impeneetrable, yet with fine force was it beaten flat to his head, in such sort, that the blood came forth in abundance: but Henry feeling himselfe to be wounded, gathered with his rage more strength, and stroke the said Countie in such sort, that at one blow hee overthrew both him and his horse, and tooke him prisoner, by which example his Souldiers were led to fight like Lyons, and the French to betake themselves vnto flight. In this battaile died many thousands, and among them Baldwin Earle of Flanders: King Henry returning victorious, was receiued triumphantly into Roan.

(39) Foulke Earle of Anjou hauing lost Baldwin his martiall Companion, and seeing it was bootles to bandy against the Beaularke, fell to an agreement with him, which was confirmed by giuing his daughter vnto his sonne Prince William (now seauenteene yeeres old) whom Henry made inheritor of all his Kingdomes, whereupon both France and Flanders became his reconciled friends, and William did homage to King Lewes for his Dutchie of Normandy. These things thus ordered King Henrie vpon the twentie fift of Nouember, loosed from land at Barfuit, and prosperously arriued in England.

(40) Prince William, who now wanted but onely the name of a King, commanded another fluppe to be prepared for himselfe, his Brethren and Sisters, with many other Nobles and Gallants Courtiers, both of England and Normandy, who plying the Mariners with pots and wine (therein being instruments of their owne calamity approaching) made them bragge to out-faile the Kings ship gone before; and in the night putting forth from land, with a mery gale made way ouer the dancing waves, as swift as an arrow: but (as if the Heauens would haue King Henries too great felicities allaid, and tempered with sense of Courtly variety, in the midst of their iollity and singing, (alas they sang their last, and little thought on death) for suddainely the shippe dashed against a Rocke, not very farre from the Shoare, at which fearefull disaster, a hideous cry arose, all of them shifting (and yet through amazement not knowing how to shift) to saue themselves from the danger: For God repaying the reward for sinne, suffered not shafe so vnaturall wantons (for such were many of them, saith Paris) to haue Christian Buriall, but were so swallowed up of the Sea, when her waves were most calme. Prince William got speedily into the Cocke-boate, and might well haue escaped, had hee not pittied his sister the Countesse of Perche, crying vnto him for helpe; when turning the boat to her aid, so many struied to get in (euery man in such a case esteeming his life as much as a Prince) that with their weight it presently suncke, and of so princely a Traine no one escaped to relate that dolefull tragedie, saue onely a bafe fellow (a Butcher some say) who swamme all the night vpon the Maine-masse, and got shoare in the morning with much danger of life.

(41) This was the most vnfortunate Shipwracke that euer hapned in our Seas, bringing an inconceivable heauinesse to the King, and whole State: for therein perished Prince William Duke of Normandy, the ioy of his Father, and hope of his Nation; Richard his bafe Brother, his Sister Maud Countesse of Perche, Richard Earle of Chester, with his wife Lady Lucy, the Kings Nicce by his Sister Adela, Orwell the Earles Brother, the yong Dukes Gouernour, diuers of the Kings chiefe Officers, and most of the Princes, Geffrey Riddle, Robert Manduit, William in England, and this Enstate had hee beene lawfully borne in wedlocke, had been heire to the Earledomes of Hereford and Iurie: notwithstanding he had as small a part in that inheritance of the Town of Pacie from which he tooke his surname, being commonly called Euface of Pacy, and had issue by this Italian his wife, William and Roger of Pacy his sonnes.

(76) A naturall daughter of King Henry recounted by the continuor of the History of William Gemeticensis, and by John Tillet his follower, is reported by them to haue beene married to one William Goet a Norman; but in neither of these writers is any mention made of her name, or of his estate, issue or other relation.

(77) Another naturall daughter of King Henrie is without name, recited by the said Authors, and by them reported to be married to the Vicount of Beaumont, which is a Towne within the County of Maygne. Shee had issue by him, as Roger of Howden writeth, Richard Vicount Beaumont, Father of Queen Ermengard the wife of King William of Scotland; and Robert the Abbot of Mount-Saint Michael mentioneth another of her sonnes, named Ralph, who (as he saith) was Bishop of Angiers.

(78) Another naturall daughter also of King Henry is recited by the Normans and French writers before auouched, and reported by them to be married to Mathew of Mountmorancy, the sonne of Bouehard of Mountmarancy, from whom perhaps descended the House of Mountmorancy, who after came to be Earles and Dukes, being growne to be one of the greatest houses in France, next to the Princes of the blood, for possessions, alliances, and honour.

(79) Elizabeth the last naturall daughter of King Henry recounted by the former Authors, was unmarried in the time of the one, and her husband unknowne to the other; but both of them agree, that she was borne of Elizabeth the sister of Walleran Earle of Mulan, who was sister also of Robert Beffue Earle of Leicester, wife of Gilbert Earle of Pembrooke, and mother of Earle Richard Strangbow, the Conquerour of Ireland.

Though the Empreſſe Maud had fealty ſworne vnto her in the life time of her Father: and againe both her ſelfe, and iſſue ordained to be his ſucceſſors in Englands Throne, as hath beene ſaid; yet ſo powerfull is Ambition, where the obiect is a Diademe, and ſo weak are all aſſurances which are built on the wauering Multitude, that King Henries providence, was ſoon defeated, and with his death al fealties reuerſed, and that by him onely who had contended to bee the formeſt of the Laitie in taking that oath, euen Stephen Earle of Mortaine and Boloin, a man whole deſcent was very Noble, being the third ſonne of Stephen Earle of Blois and Champaigne, who was the ſonne of Earle Eudes, and he of Earle Theobald, the ſonne of Gerlon the Dane, the companion of Rollo

bishop of Canterbury, the very first man that had sworn unto Maud the Emperesse: by whose example many others were winde into the like peritue, * traitorously auowing, that it was balenefic for so many, and so great Peeres, to be subiect vnto a Woman. And to helpe forward those audacious beginnings, Roger Bishopp of Salisbury, the late Kings Treasurer protested (Malmsbury, who reports it, himselfe heard it from him) that they were free from the oath made to the Emperesse; for that without consent of the Barons he had married out of the Realm; but that which wrought most, was the testimony of Hugh Bigot, * Seneschall vnto King Henry departed, who comming over with Stephen, tooke his corporall oath, that the King on his death-bed, vpon some offence taken against his daughter Maud, disinherited her, and appointed this Stephen his nephew to be his successeur. These colourable instigations so moued the * too credulous Archbishop and the Peeres, that they all fowle fealty vnto him and became his Leigemen.

(3) His first landing in England, (being at Whitland-bay) by a tempest of thunder so wonderful & terrible that the people thought verily the ende of all was at hand, did prognosticke the storms of troubles which his peritue brought with him; for euen then both Doner & Canterbury fortified themselves against him, though London gaue better leaue to his entrance, whose Perion and presence drew euer the affections of the beholder, being in all parts complete with natures endowments, of personage passing comely, of disposition louing, cheerefull, and affable to the meanest, alwaies very liberal; but now especially, knowing his Purfe the best Lanyer to plead for his Tit; and in Martiall prowesse gaue place to none of that time wherein, though his whole raigne was continually spent, yet (by reason of King Henries great Treasure left) neuer burthened he the Commons with any exactions, a thing that euer gaineth the loue of the common fort: neither is he taxed with any other obseruable crime, save onely his peritue against the Emperesse Dowager and her sonne.

(4) Hee entred his gouernement the year of Christ Iesus, 1135. the second day of December, and was crowned at Westminster the twenty six of the same Moneth, being Saint Stephens day, by William Corbell Archbishop of Canterbury, who with the rest of the Prelates doing him homage, and knowing now hee would yeeld to any conditions (for performance whereof his * Brother of Winchester did there engage himselfe for a pledge) that they tooke their oath of allegiance conditionally, (traitorously, I might say) to obey him as their King, so long as he should preferre their Church Liberties, and the vigour of Discipline: And that the Lay-Barons made vse also of this policie, appeareth by Robert Earle of Gloucester, who sware to be true Liegeman to the King, as long as the King would preferre to him his dignities, and keepe all Coucnants, wherupon the King promised for the present, that he would speedily reforme the ouer-hard lawes of his Predecessors, and mollifie the extreames thereof to their owne likings, vnder his Seale and Charter: and so thence hastening to meete the Corps of his deceased vnclie, (which was now brought into England) he honoured that pompous funeral, with his owne, and all his great Prelates and Peeres, attendance at Reading; whence presently he went to Oxford, where he sealed his fore-promised Charter, of many indulgent fauours: * prefacing therein, that hee attained the Crowne by Election onely; and that Pope Innocentius confirmed the same; whereby may be conceiued, that his Holinesse, either out of hatred to the Emperesse, (whose his band * Henry was no friend to the Papacie) or for some other holy ends, had no small hand in aduancing Stephens peritue and disloyal intrusion. The Tenour of the * Charter is this; That all Liberties, Customes, and Possessions granted to the Church, should be firme and inforce;

that all Persons and Causes Ecclesiasticall should appertaine onely to Ecclesiasticall iudicature: that none but Clergy men should euer intermeddle with the vacancies of Churches, or any Church-mens goods; that all bad vsages in the Land touching forrests, exactions, &c. should be utterly extirpate; the ancient Lawes restored, &c. As Stephen well knew, that they had chosen him their King, onely to make their vies of him, so these immunities he granted, rather to blear their Eies, then * with any purpose to manacle his own hands with such Parchment-Chaines.

(5) This his entrance was very peaceable (saith Geruajus of Canterbury) but by little, and little ciuill discord increased, to the lamentable destruction of men, and the land: whereto Robert Earle of Gloucester, half-brother to the Emperesse, whose wisdom and power King Stephen much feared, gaue a secret beginning, when amongst them that swore him fealty, hee concluded his (as we said) with this reueration, that his owne authority should be nothing empaired, meaning no longer to respect him as his King, then the King should him as a Peere: and a general surrence, to erect Castles for strength throughout the land, was no security to his peaceable estate. Intended indeed to strengthen the Kingdom against Maud the Emperesse; but proued the bane of all subiectue obedience: which was politicly considered by Henry Fitz Emperesse, in the conclusion of Peace betwixt King Stephen and him, when a thousand one hundred and fiftene Castles so raised, were againe razed and cast downe.

(6) The first man that professedly set himselfe opposite to Stephens viurpation, was Baldwin de Redvers, who fortified the City and Castle of Excester against him; the Welshmen also, bearing in minde the harms that K. Henry had done them, desired reuenge, and made many slaughters vpon the Kings people: Against these, Stephen proceeded with his band of English and Flemmings, and after a strong and chargeable siege, by famine drew forth Baldwin, his wife, and children, all which hee disherited and expulsed the Land, vnto so great lenity towards all other offenders there, that it gaue great encouragement to others rebellions. But in Wales the business prospered not so well, where at Cardigan a great battell was fought, with such slaughter and ouerbearing of the English, that the men by women were taken and led away Captiue, and so many drowned by the fall of a Bridge ouer Tema, that a passage was made ouer the water with the dead Carcases therein heaped.

(7) Neither thus onely, but some of the English also disliking King Stephen, secretly instigated David King of Scotland, to reuenge the wrongs done to the Emperesse Maud, a seruice as they vrged it very gratefull vnto her, and euen pleasing to God and Man. Hee therefore consenting, invaded the borders, and tooke from the English both Carlisle and Newcastle, which hee staffed with Garrison. Against these, King Stephen prepared, and with a great power came into those parts, where diuers accidents by diuers reporters are related, yet all agree that ere long peace was concluded, Carlisle still enioied by King David, and the Earldome of Huntington by Prince Henry his sonne; for which hee did homage at his fathers command, David himselfe refusing to doe (as Effector Boetius the Scottish writer affirmeth) for that he had giuen his faith before vnto Maud the Emperesse.

(8) King Stephen returned, and all in good quiet, he suddenly fell sicke of a Lethargy, yea & in such danger of life that the common report gaue fourth hee was dead, which stirred great troubles both in England and else where, for thereby his friends were stricken into great feare, and the factious more bold to prepare for Queene Maud; for Hugh Bigot one of his chieftest and first raisers fortified himselfe in the Castle of Norwich, and would not deliuer it vnto any save onely to the King, yea and very vnwillingly also vnto him: and in Wales, Owen and Cadwalader the the sonnes of Gruffith ap Conan Prince of that Country, carried great spoiles from the English, as of other goods; so also of Horse and Armour, and habiliments for warre; likewise in Normandy, Conspiracies began to bud forth; for Geoffrey Earle of Anjou, who in right of his wife made claime vnto all, easily got the hearts and endeauours of many to adhere vnto their heire; possessing himselfe of certain Castles; but entering further on the Demaines of one Talevas, a man of note (proscribed for some offence or displeasure by King Stephen) the Normans disliking that, and some other his doings, sent for the said Earle of Blois (Stephens elder Brother) offering him both their Dukedome, and their swords, and liues to defend him in it; who comming to Luxonia, Robert Earle of Gloucester, (not vnwilling any way to weaken King Stephen) deliuered vnto him vpon composition, the County of Falefa, himselfe carrying no small summe of money thence out of King Henries Treasure, and very thoroughly, (though secretly) watching all opportunities to aduance the title and designs of the Emperesse.

(9) Stephen recovered, and hearing these stirres, prepared himselfe first into Normandy, at whose approach, after some small attempts, the people (distracted betwixt feare, and sense of their duty) yeilded themselves vnto his power; surrendering their fenced Cities, and other strong holds. This good success thus fortunately begonne, hee hoped further to prosecute, by means of a league, which hee lately had made with Lewis the seventh King, of France: and hereupon created Eustace his eldest son liuing, Duke of Normandie, commanding him to do his homage for the same to Lewis.

(10) Earle Thobald seeing himselfe thus defeated of his hopes and purposes, stormed at the wrongs done by King Stephen; for hee, (his elder by birth, and Bloues Earldomes lawfull heire) laide his title both for Normandie and England also, now vsurped by Stephen his younger: notwithstanding (rage nought auailing without power) hee came to a composition, and remitted his Claime for two thousand marks annually to be paid. Geoffrey of Aniou likewise, whose title by his Wife was better then them both, not able at the present (being so far ouer-matched by the Kings power, wealth, & confederates) to do what he would, yeilded to necessity, and for five thousand marks yearly to be paid, suffered Stephen quietly to enioy the Crowne.

(11) Hauiug thus at once swept the two greatest rubbes out of his fortunes way, hee well hoped that all clouds of displeasure, and opposition, were now ouer-blowne, when vnexpectedly newes came, that England was in tumults, the sparkes of conspiracie, kindled secretly before in the hearts of factious Peers, now openly breaking forth, vpon aduantage of his absence in Normandie: therefore, hauiug not altogether coposid his busines in those parts, hee took ship for England in the depth of the winter; and euen in the Vigill of Christs Natiuitie, besieged, and after tooke the Castle of Bedford, that was manned against him in the behalfe of the Scots; about which time David their King hauiug entred Northumberland in the quarrell of Queene Maud, the ruler fort of his Armie (as commonly the best gouerned is not empty of such) reuenged too tragically the wrongs of the Emperesse, in ripping vp the wombes of women with child, and tossing their infants vpon the points of their speares, slaying the Priests at the Altar, and dimembering the slaine bodies in most vn humane manner.

(12) Against these, King Stephen made hastie forward, affirming it no policie, to giue one houres rest vnto the Enemy: and threatening more then hee accomplished, entred Scotland; whence after some small reuenge wrought, hee was hastily recalled; so many of his Nobles in England now in Armes against him, that hee was in a foretsette on euerie side. And what other could hee, as surper, expect from them, but Treason, whom himselfe had formerly taught to be Traitors to their rightfull Soueraigne? But yet (as no Rebellion was euer without pretence of Reason and Justice) they alledged, that hee had * violated his Oath touching their Forreits, and other Immunities of Church and Common-wealth: but Church and Common-wealth, were but publique colours for priuate grudges, (as Malmsbury, who then liued, well vnfoldeth) which the Great-Ones conceiued against their King, because he would not grant them such Castles, Commands, and Lordships, as themselves liked and expected of him, whom they thought to be so obliged vnto them, that he ought denie them nothing. The endless and shamelesse importunities of these men, sometimes hee put off, alledging thereby, the import of his Crownes reuenges; sometimes hee was faine to iustifie, distrustful their falling from him: whose loialtie notwithstanding being built on so vn-noble grounds, was but colour-red, and therefore could not long bee permanent. Neither was it. For Robert of Gloucester (the Emperesses half-brother, and now her chiefe Counsellor and Captaine) finding those particular dislikes apt to be wrought on, and made seruicable for a common bechoofe; whetted on with the touch of confidence, and counsells of religious learned men, (who vrged him, with the hazard both of his credit, and soule, for neglect of his first, and only-lawfull, Oath to the Emperesse) sent threatening messages vnto King Stephen, charging him with his Oath of Allegiance vnto Lady Maud his Soueraigne, against whom hee had showed himselfe a most perfidious man, and had impiouslie drawne him with others to doe the like; and so denouncing Stephen an open Enemy to the State, and himselfe vnto Stephen, made from his faction with the assistance of many Nobles; among whom, Milo, a chiefe man of warre, and High Constable to King Stephen, reuolted from him, and became a great help to their proceedings.

(13) Earle Robert (whom erstfoones the enraged King discharged of his honours and possessions in England) tooke into the Castle of Brifson, and made good also his Castle of Slade; his complices likewise did the like in other places: for William Talbot manned the Castle of Hereford, William Lowell the Castle of Carie, Paganell the Castle of Ludlow, William de Mount the Castle of Dunestor, Robert de Nichol the Castle of Warram, Eustace Fitz-Iohn the Castle of * Meltune, William Fitz-Alain the Castle of Shrewsbury, and Waldelinus the Castle of Douer. And thus those forts which were erected to defend the Crowne, first offended the King, some few wherof as hee recovered, hee flatted to the ground, and wished the other no higher walls; still swearing by Gods Birth (his vntall Oath) hee would not so slightlie be vnseated of his Crowne, and wondering what should moue them, who had so readilie aduanced him, so speedily to vnstate him. One fresh motiue to these Noble-mens discontents was the Kings * seizing on some great men and their lands, on bare suspicion of their loialtie; and on the other side, the extraordinary fauour, which Stephen shewed to William de Tyre, and his Flemmings (which they interpreted as a contempt of themselves and their Nation) whose counsells hee generally followed, and chieffie relied vpon: In disdain whereof, they sent word to the Emperesse, that within five Monethes, hee should haue the Realme at command, according to their Oaths made to her Father.

(14) These turmoiles thus working in the bowels of the Kingdom, David King of Scotland had better opportunitie to assaile the sides and skirts thereof; and following what hee had begonne, with a very great Armie entring Northumberland, made great slaughter of the English, and destruction of their Country: Against whom the Northern Lords prepared, at the command of Thurstan Arch-bishop of Torke (left by King Stephen Lieutenant in those parts) who being by sickness kept from the Field, appointed Ralph Bishop of Durham his General, whose Inuictive Oration before their ioyning of bataille, occasioned vpon the foresaid misdeameors of some vndisciplined Scottish, is at large set down by Houedon, Huntingdon, Wendouer and others; in the close whereof, hee abolueth from punishment of sin, all such of his side, as should die in this bataille: which made the English more desperate in fight, who so formerly pressed vpon their enemies, that they forooke their King, he notwithstanding valiantly persifiting, till his dearest friends earnestly vrged him to auoid. But his son Henry, etcoming more of glory the life, rushed in amongst his retiring souldiers, and with vndaunted courage, perfwading them to regard themselves and his presence, with threat of shameful deaths to all such as fled, he held them in for a time; till at length ouer-laid with the maine-bataille of the English, the magnanimous Prince Henry, likewise quitted the field, bitterly cursing the forwardnesse of Fortune, and the mischance that hapned that day.

(15) With like fortunate successe, proceeded Stephen against his disobedient Barons, and wanne from them the Castles of Hereford, Gloucester, Wexley, Brisfow, Dudley and Shrewsbury, whereby hee weakened Earle Robert so much, that he was constrained to flee into France, and there intigated his sister the Empreffe to come into England.

(16) These domesticke opposites thus remoued out of his way, King Stephen re-addressed himselfe for the North, to prosecute that which Thurstan had begunne: first therefore winning the Castle of Leeds, he went into Scotland, where by the persuasion & proffesse of Mars and Vulcan (saith Paris) a Peace was concluded betwixt the two Kings; and Stephen thence returning, brought Prince Henry (whom he created Earle of Huntingdon) with him into England, and at the siege of Ludlow Castle, the aduenturous Prince was almost surpris'd, where the besieged with an Iron Grapple pluckt him from his horse, and so had taken him, but that King Stephen himselfe, with great valour and honour recovered him: who hauing wonne the Castle, went presently to Oxford, whither newes was brought him that the Empreffe was preparing for England.

(17) To make all sure as he went, Stephen thought it good to demolish, and race those Castles lately built, (hauing had experience to what troubles they had brought him) and to preuent the building of new; and namely, that of the Diuise, now (as hee surmised) in fortifying against him: hee therefore sent for Roger Bishop of Salisbury (the Founder both of that Castle, as also those other of Sherburn & Malmesbury) a man who in a bad cause had stood King Stephen in good stead, howloever some enuying his greatness, had incensed the King against him, and other Prelates, as if they were fallen from his side. The Bishop standing peremptorily on his innocencie, yet mistrusting the euent, craued the company of Alexander Bishop of Lincoln, and of Nigel Bishop of Ely; so with agreeat and well appointed traine, repaired to Oxford vnto the Court, where Stephen had summoned a Grand-Councell of the States.

(18) The King who expected of Church-men humility, seeing them now armed as men for the field, commanded his attendants to take armour likewise, and so entering communication of diuers matters with his Peeres and Prelates, their Souldiers casually meeting, fell at variance, where the Bishops friends had the worse, so that many of them were wounded, and the rest forsaking their masters ranne away. This great assembly thus disturbed, the King required the Bishops to satisfie his Court for these outrages of their seruants, which satisfaction should be, to deliuer the keyes of all their Castles to the King, as pledges of their fidelity, which they refusing, the Bishops of Salisbury and Lincoln were laid hold of; but Ely escaped to the Castle of Diuise. Alexander was imprisoned, till hee had yielded him his Castles of New-marke, and Slaford; Roger the Cattles of Sherborne, and the Diuise (accounted then one of the goodliest Castles of Europe) besides forty thousand Markes in siluer; (which losses the Bishop did not long suruiue). The King employed the money to purchase Lady Constance, sister to Lewis King of France, to be wife vnto his sonne Eustace: all which was to strengthen himselfe against the Empreffe Maud, whose continuing he continually feared, & now before his expectation she was landed in England, at a fitt time for her designs, when all the great Prelates (who formerly were his chiefest friends) were highly incensed against the King for such oppression of their Brethren.

(19) The place of her arriage was at the port of Arundell, into which Castle shee was ioyfully received by William de Albany, who had married Queen Adeliza, the late wife to King Henry, whose Dowrie it was; from hence Earle Robert diuerting his course only with tenne horse-men, and as many Archers, (for in all hee brought ouer but one hundred and forty with him for so great an exploit) passed through the Land vnto Wallingford and Gloucester, soliciting his Complices for the aid of his sister the Empreffe. A man who then liued, holds him, in this bold attempt with so small forces, no way inferior to Julius Caesar, whom Lincie reports to haue begun his ciuill war, and to haue set himselfe against the whole world, onlie with five Cohorts of Souldiers.

(20) King Stephen as then lay in siege of Marmelburgh Castle, but hauing intelligence of this more dangerous an enemy, dislodged thence, and with all expedition made towards Arundell; whereat the Empreffe, wanting her Counsellor, was wonderfully perplexed, yet wanted not a womans wit to helpe at need; infrom that by the report of Gerardus, left her dignity and right might any way be endamaged, shee took an oath, that none of these the Kings enemies by her aduice or consent had entred the land, but with condition to carry themselves orderly without impeachment of the honour and allegiance due to the King; by which policy (to giue it no worse name) the so satisfied King Stephen (whom all do censure for too much credulity and facility towards his foes) that hee caused her to be conuained honourably vnto Brisfow, where she remained the space of two monethes, and then got thence vnto Wallingford.

(21) Earle Robert in the meane while disperfed the newes of the Empreffes approach, vnto whose aid so many gathered, that the lame Monke reporteth, no man was able to set downe their multitudes in context of historie, much lesse by way of Computation: then beganne (saith he) both labour and dolour, which brought the whole Realme to a most grieuous diuision, and in a manner to an utter ruine: for those that fauoured the King, what euill seuer could wrought or imagined, they did against them, that tooke part with the Empreffe: and contrariwise, Earle Robert, whose power daily encreased, tortured with cruelties all those that stood for the King; and to augment a more mischief, the Flemings left their owne Country, and came ouer by multitudes, like vnto a Company of hunger-starued Wolves, seeking to bring the Lands felicity vnto nothing.

(22) Stephen, whose head was now full of troubles, delaid no time to forward his Fortunes, but straightwaies besieged Maud and her brother in Wallingford Castle; notwithstanding, wearied with long labour and profiting little, hee caused a Tower of wood to be there erected, which he strongly fortified with me and munition, and then remoued to the siege of Malmesbury. His brother also of Winchester, a stout and politicke Prelate indeed, bestirred all his wilie wittes in Stephens behalfe; for inuincing certaine Noble-men to his Palace at Winchester, retained them prisoners, till hee had compelled them there, to resigne their Castles to the King. In the meane while Earle Robert subdued and spoiled Worcester; Ralph Parnell, in the Empreffes fauour, burned Nottingham; and Ranulph Earle of Chester, ioining in wilshes with Robert (whose daughter hee married) threwed himselfe not vnwilling to annoy King Stephen, though he had receiued great honours at his hands. The Empreffe her selfe, the better to secure her owne person, and to giue access vnto her fauourites, tooke into Lincoln, where she meant to make her abode, storing the City with all prouisions necessarie.

(23) King Stephen, as vigilant as the other was policie, made straightwaies thitherward, and begirt the Citie with a strait siege, where hee had surpris'd his greatest Enemy, had hee not found meanes thence to escape; & to possessing himselfe of the City, sealed it, & the whole Countrey in verie good quiet. Soone after whose departure, Ranulph Earle of Chester, with his Countesse, and Brother, comming to Lincoln, to keepe their Christmas; the Citizens knowing the King's illoues, and desirous to enuie fauour with him, sent secret intelligence, that if he would surprize both those Brethren, he had now the fittest aduantage: whereto the King giuing care, came thither with great expedition; and whiles they, thus circumvented, stood on their guard in the Castle, the Earle escaped forth, and went to craue aid of the Empreffe, for rescue of his wife and brother whom hee left besieged. Earle Robert, hearing the newes, and glad of so faire an opportunity, ioined with Ranulph, and they both gathered all their powers both of Welsh and English, for the rescue of their friends in Lincoln: where, resolute first wading through the Riuer, which parted them from the Kings Armie, and was then deepe) vpon Candlemas day and yeere of Christ Iesus one thousand one hundred fortie one, they pitched their Tents, and in the Kings sight ordered their Battaille: One Squadron whereof, was lead by Earle Ranulph: the Disberited were the Guiders of another; in the third was Earle Robert himselfe; and the Welsh-men secured for the Wing. Their troopes thus marshalled, Ranulph appointed in rich Armor, and full of braue resolution, spake thus to his followers, in the presence of Robert of Gloucester.

(24) "I yeeld you vnfaigned thanks, Inuincible Captaine, and you, our companions in Armes) "which heere so resolute witnesse your loues vnto mee, vpon my sole request, euen to the hazard of your owne liues. Sith then, I am the chief cause of this your perill, it well befits me, that I my selfe be foremost in the hazard, and giue the first onfset of battaile against this faithlesse King; who made vs a shew of truce, onlie to take aduantage for our ruines; and therefore both mine owne courage, and the Kings vniuit dealing, giue mee cause to hope, that I shall forthwith breake asunder the strongest array of his Armie, and make my way through their midst, by dint of this my sword. If I shall be argument of your proffesse, to follow me, leading you the way, and to imitate mee, giuing you example. My thoughts already tell mee, that euen now I am breaking through his Battles, trampling on the neckes of his Chieftaines, and piercing with this my sword the very sides of the King himselfe. His speech though short and headie, as more fitting a Souldier than an Orator, yet well suited with the time, and was seconded with great applause of the Souldiers: Whereupon Robert Earle of Gloucester, slept forth and said.

(25) "It is not against right, most Noble Earle, that the honor of this daies felicity, and first assault, should be permitted vnto you; in regard of the greatness both of your descent, and your martiall achievement; but yet, if Descent bee stood on, I my selfe am both the sonne, and nephew, of a Mightie King; if Valour, heere now are many of choiest worth, of whom none liuing can challenge precedence for proffesse. But other reason ought now to sway. For sith the King, contrary to his Oath made to my Sister, impiously vsurped the Kingdom, he hath made a confusion of all things, both in causing the blood of many thousands to bee spilt, and in making many Owners (as him-

"(selfe was) of that which was not their owne, by depriuing other of their rightfull inheritance: Thele therefore thus ditherized, ought of right (in assistance of helpe from their righteous Iudge and reuenger) giue first assault on their vnrighteous oppressor; and God who iustly iudgeth his people, will (doubtlesse) looke downe from his heauenly habitation, and will not leaue vs succourlesse, whiles in a iust cause, wee impugne a most vniuit Intruder. But one thing, (most resolute Captaines and souldiers) I would haue you throughlie to consider, that through these Fennes (which with so much a doe you haue passed) there is no way fit for escape: heere must wee either vanquish, or leaue our liues, for hope of flight is none at all, nor is there any other way, left vs now to goe, but by our swords into the Citie: and (if I gesse a right) euen this, that wee haue no meanes to flee, will bee to vs the meanes (by diuine assistance) to get the Victorie; because they must needs trust to their Manhood, who see no hope to thrue by their Cowardize. Indeed, the Citizens of Lincoln keepe night to their houses, and in the brunt of the Battle, there will their mindes bee, and thither will their heeles follow, whiles you victoriously shall keepe the field. And consider farther with mee, what kinde of Captaines they haue: First A-laine Duke of Britaine, he comes armed, not against you, but God himselfe, a furious person, spainted with all filth of sinne, in malice vnmachable, who thinks it his greatest dishonour, to see any man exceed him in cruelty: with him commeth the treacherous Earle Robert Mellent, the very craft-master of fraud, in whose heart dwells impiety, guile in his mouth, cowardize in his actions; high of minde, vaine glorious in words, degenerate in performance; last in the fight, first in the flight. Next, comes Hugh By-god, his name necerelle founding his pericure; who thought it not sufficient to breake his oath with the Empreffe, but that hee must be once againe forsworn (as all the world doth know) that Henry at his death bequeathed the Crowne vnto Stephen, to the preiudice of his owne daughter; a man (in a word) who accounts Treachery a Vertue, and Pericure a courtly quality. Among these Gallants marcheth the Earle Albemarle, a man of a singular constancy in euill; very ready to attempt, & very loath to leaue any mischief, whose wife, through irrefommes of his vnassufferable filthy qualities, is gone from him; & the Earle that keeps her, hee commeth against vs too, a notorious adulterer, and the Non-pareill of impurity, a true Souldier of Bacchus, a stranger to Mars; to whom the sight of all blood, except of the Grape, is verie fearfull. Then setteth forth Simon Earle of Hampton, whose deeds consist altogether in words, and whose liberality onely in promises; for when he hath said, he hath done, and yee get no more. Lastly, you see here gathered a knot of Peeres, all like to their Prince, accustomed to robberies, enriched with rapines; fatted with man-slaughters, and all tainted with pericure. You therefore (Noble spirits) whom great Henry aduanced, and this Stephen hath cast downe, whom Henry made wealthy, and Stephen hath empouerished, be now courageous, and vpon assured confidence of your great valours, yea, of Gods iustice, seeke both your iust Reuenge, which God euen puts into your hands, on these vngodly wretches; and immortal Glorie, which shall hence-forward attend both your felices, and your posterity for euer. If you are all of this mind, for executing this Iudgement of God now vpon them, then vow your felices vnto God, and this his seruice; and forbear, nay rather forswear, to shew your backs to your foes.

At which words, all iointly lifting vp their hands, and acclamations vnto heauen, with a terrible shout abured all thought of flight, and quickning vp their braue spirits, aduanced gallantly towards the enemy.

(26) King Stephen, the meane while, was farre from being idle, who also ordered his Armie into three feuerall Battalions: the greatest part and best harnessed, whose horses he had sent away (perhaps also to deprive his men of all hope of flight) he appointed to remaine on foot with himself, and certain of his Nobles, all vnder one Banner. The horsemen he disposed into two feuerall wings, the one commaunded by Alaine Duke of Britaine, Hugh Bigod Earle of Norfolk, Simon Earle of Hampton, with the two Earles of Mellent and Warren; and the other Wing was gouerned by William de Tpres the Fleming. Then the King, because his voice was not very pleasing or audible, commaunded Baldwine Fitz-Gilbert, a man of great honour and prowesse, to utter his mind vnto the Army, who standing conveniently to be heard, spake vnto them as followeth.

"(27) All such as addresse themselves, and ex-pote their liues, to the hazard of battaile, haue three things aduisedly to be thought on: The equitye of their cause; the Number of the Forces; the sufficiency of their men. The first, left they endanger the state of their Soules; the next, left they be overlaied with multitude of their enemies; and the last, left while they presume vpon numbers, they find them but faint-hearted, to their utter ruine. But in all these, we know ourselues to be sufficiently furnished. The Iustice of our cause is, for obseruing the vow made before God vnto our King, to withstand them that haue falsified their faith, euen to the hazard of our liues. For our Number, in Horsemen, is not inferior to theirs;
in Footmen we farre exceede them: and for sufficiency, what words can equall the noble valour of so many Earles, Lords, Captaines and Followers, trained vp euer in the warres? But about all, the incomparable prowesse and presence of our King, will be in stead of thousands to vs. Sith then this our Lord, and the Lords Anointed (to whom you vowed your faith) is in field here amongst you; now performe this your vow vnto God; assured, that the more constant you proue in this your Princes seruice, and faithfull aduise those faithles periured persons, the more shall your reward bee at the hands of God, and of him. Therefore be both courageous, and confident; the rather, considering against whom you fight: euen against Robert the Base-borne Generall, whose vtmost worth is well knowne; for he can threaten much, and performe as little: as a Lions tongue, and a Hares heart: his faire speech is his credit, his foule actions are his shame. Chesters Earle what is hee? a man audacious, but without all iudgement; heady to plore a treason, but still waunting in the pursuit of it: ready to runne into battaile, but vncircumspect in any danger; aiming beyond his reach, and conceiuing things merely impossible; and therefore hath he few with him that know him, but leads onely a rout of vagrant rascals: so there is nothing in him to be feared; for whatsoever he beginnes like a Man, he ends it like a Woman; vn-fortunate in all his vndertakings; in his encounters still either vanquished, or if he chance (rarely) God wot on a victorie, it is with farre greater losses then the conquered. The Wellshen he bringeth, are fitter for our contempt then feare: their rascallnes you may easily see, for its naked and vnarm'd, who wanting both military Art and Practise, runne headlong like brutes vpon the Hunters Jaquins. The rest a few Nobles (if such they may bee rearm'd) as common Souldiers, are but fraglers and runnagates: of whom I would wish their number greater; for the more they be, the more successefull will bee their seruice. You therefore (great Peeres and Worthies) it now behoueth (and indeed it much behoueth you) to bee very mindfull, both of your Valours, and Noblenesse: this day aduance your Proues to the height,

"and following the footsteps of your famous Ancestors, leaue to your posterities both a noble patterne, and an euermlasting renowne. Your dayly successe of victories, should quicken your hearts this day to atchieue brauely, and the continuall miscarrying of our enemies, will quicken their heeles to flee as speedily: and (I dare say) they already repent of their coming hither, and are by this time casting how to be gone, if the nature of the place would giue them leaue. Then sith it is impossible for them either to fight, or flee; why come they hither, but euen by Gods own appointment, to offer themselves, and all their prouisions into your hands: and here you see their horses, their Armour, yea and their bodies, to rest at your pleasure: reach forth therefore your warlike hands to seize on that ioyfully, which God hath freely brought you.

Which exhortation hee had scarcely closed, when the noise of Trumpets, and shout of the enemies comming on, was Rhetorick enough to incite them to their tasks.

(28) A fore battaile was fought, and with equall successe a long time maintained: for the band of the disherited, whose particular wrongs whetted their courage, (and were therefore politickly placed in the front) brake terribly into the Kings Vauntgard; and contrariwise William of Tpres into the Wellsh, vntill the Foreward of the Kings horsemen beganne to shrinke backe, and (not without sus-pition of treason) galloped away; when presently the Earle of Chester encountered the Kings battaile of foote, in whose strength he reposed most trust; but it being overlaid with Assailants, beganne also to faint, and to flee, leauing the King enraged, both with his friends faint-heartednes, and with his foes successe. A very strange sight it was (saith Paris) there to behold King Stephen, left almost alone in the field, yet noman daring to approach him, whiles grinding his teeth, and foaming like a furious wild Boare, he drave backe with his battle-axe whole troupes assailing him, emasacring the chiefe of them to the eternall renowne of his courage: if but a hundred such had there bene with him, a whole Army had neuer been able to surprize his person: yet as hee was single, hee held out, till first his Battle-axe brake, and after that, his sword also, with the force of his vnresistable strokes, flew in peeces; and hee now weaponlesse, and (by an vn-knowne doublet, an vn-noble hand) stricken down with a great stone throwne at him, was seized on by William of Kahames, a stout foot Knight, and by Earle Roberts commaunded, preferred from any violence to his person, was carried prisoner vnto Maud the Emperesse at Gloucester, & thence was sent bound vnto Brisfow, where in the Castle he remained in safe custody.

(29) The Emperesse hauing thus got the Lion in her hold, triumphed not a little in her own fortune, & now as sole Soueraign of Englands Monarchie, commaunded all businesse, elected her Counsellors, and bestowed many dignities where shee most fauoured. Notwithstanding, that shee altered not her stile of Emperesse, or Queene of Romanes, may appeare by this her Broad-scale ensuing; vnder which shee granted the custody of the Tower of London vnto Geoffrey de Mandeuil, and his Heires, counenancing with him therein, that he would not make peace with the Citizens of London, without the said Geoffrey's consent, because they were his mortall enemies: but this Earle being afterwards vnawares apprehended in the Kings Court at Saint Albans, could not bee released, till hee had surrendered both the Tower of London, and other his Castles to the King.

Vpon these happy successes of the Emperesse, the States-men rood not any longer for King Stephen, but their faithles turning with his Fortune, all of them surrendered their allegiance vnto her; the Kentish only excepted, where Stephens Queene, and William de Tpres, maintained his quarrell to the vtmost of their powers.

(30) But

THE TRVE SCVLPTVRE OF MAVD THE EMPRESSES BROAD SCALE, APPENDANT TO HER CHARTERS.

(30) But the Emperesse conducted in State to Winchester, had the Regall Crowne of the Kingdome then deliuered her; no man more forward then Henry the Bishop, and Brother of Stephen, who vpon the vowing to bee ruled by his aduise in affaires of Estate, being then the Popes Legate, solemnely in a Synode of the Clergie, accursed all such as withstood the Emperesse, and blessed all them that affixed her interest: but both hee, and his friends forgot not to adde that wouted trayterous clause of their oath, so long to keepe faith to her, as shee kept her Couenants with them: and so with appaule of the people, she came to London, and after much peruasion and mediation (for that the Citizens were very stiff against her) was receiued into the City with a roiall Procession.

(31) Neither was King Stephen thus defeated of England onely, but Normandy also cast off the yoke of subiection: for Geoffrey of Anion, husband of the Emperesse, hauing some intelligence of this achie-ued victorie, induced the Normans to incline vnto him, by publishing the captiuation of Stephen, vna-ble now to relieue them, or himselfe; and Dauid King of Scotland for his part was not behind, to let forward the claime of Lady Maud, assuming in her behalf the County of Northumberland.

(32) Maud thus established, all now esteemed her as Fortunes deare darling, and beheld her as their onely rising sunne; the Prison walls overshadowing the Presence, feature, and fauours of the now dejected vnfortunate Stephen, whose forrowful wife Queen Maud, incessantly sollicit the Emperesse in her husbands behalfe, desiring his liberty, but not his Crowne, which hee was now contented to let her enioy, and therunto offered for pledges many great persons, who protested for him to the Emperesse, that hee thenceforth would de-voute himselfe vnto God, & either become a Monke or a Pilgrime: Henry of Winchester also became a suitor vnto her in the behalfe of his Nephew Eu-face, King Stephens sonne, that the Countie belonging before to the Father, might bee conferred vpon the sonne.

(33) The Londoners likewise hauing receiued her into the City as their Lady, thought now (as most dow with new Princes) they might haue what they would aske, and became her importunate Suppliants, that the ouer hard lawes imposed by her Father, might now be remitted, and those of King Edward might wholly bee in force. But shee reiected all these Petitioners, out of pride, say some; but it may seeme rather of policy, holding it safest, to passe affaires of importance, not vpon intreaty, but by due audience, and to gouerne the subiect with a suauere austerities, rather then an indulgent lenitie.
But this too regular strictnes, which might haue done well in alected gouernment, in this her yet greene, and vnto secured citate, proued not so behouefull. For first, Queene Maud sent to her sonne Euface, that their suites must bee obtained onely by warre; willing him to make strong his partie by the assistance of the Kentish: the Nobles likewise, Stephens vndertakers, repined, that they were so slightly regarded, or rather reiected: and the Londoners also storming at the repulse of their desires, deuided how they might take the Emperesse their Prisoner, and so redeem King Stephen, to whom their affectiōs were euer firm: but the hearing of their conspiracie, fled secretly in the night, and tooke into Oxford, which in all her difficulties shee euer found true vnto her, out of their loue, both to her cause, and to her Father; & threatening due reuenge for her late wrongs, wrought it vpon the Nobles in prison, and (more then was due or decent) vpon Stephen himself, whom the commaunded to be laden with Irons, and to bee abridged of all princely feruities:

(34) Winchester high mind not brooking the Em-peresses deniall of his suite, in behalfe of his Nephew Euface, vpon secret conferences with Queen Maud, by her lamentable entreaties, began to melt in his affection towards the distressed King his brother; & in fine, resolving to trie the vtmost for him, absolved all those whom before hee had excommunicated; pretending, that the Barons had all kept faith with her, but shee had not kept touch with them; and thinking this a fitt time to worke for his brother, solicited the discontented Londoners in his behalfe, and stored the Castles of Waltham, Farnham, and Winchester with Munition and men; meane while the Emperesse came speedily to Gloucester, to conferre with Milo her chiefe friend, and presently againe returning to Oxford (which she chose for her Court and chiefe place of abode) was there maintained only at his charge, not hauing one dayes diet, or pro-uision of her owne, to requite which fidelity, and other noble seruices, shee there created him Earle of Hereford.

(35) Her forces recollected, & thither assembled, shee went forthwith to the City of Winchester, accompanied with Dauid King of Scotland her vnckle, Earle Robert her brother, and many other Nobles; where sending for the Bishop being then in the City (whose aid shee could hardly spare, and therefore was defirous of his reconciliation) though hee mistrusted some perill, yet not daring to send aduiall, returned the Messenger with this equiuocal answer, that he would with all speed addresse himselfe, as if hee had meant to follow them: so forthwith issuing secretly out of the City, did indeed addresse himselfe to worke her ruine: for, sending for Queene Maud her sonne Euface, the Londoners, and William Tpres, (afterwards created Earle of Kent) made strong his part, himselfe and friends abiding in the City, whiles

the Empresse and her Nobles defended themselves in the Castle, not aduenturing to goe forth amongst so many their mortall enemies: and soone after, to worke his wrathfull will, knowing the Citizens to bee more affected to the Empresse then to him, commanded the said Citie to be set on fire, where in the Monastery of Nunnes, above twentie Churches, the Convent of S. Grimbald, and the better part of the Citie, were consumed to ashes.

(36) Seven weekes thus spent, in this counter-siege of the Citie and Castle, the Bishopp, to deceive the Empresse, commanded peace to bee proclaimed, and the Gates to be set open towards evening. The Empresse then, who had endured such troubles and so long a restraint, greedie desired to change her lodging, and to recreate her perplexed spirits in some other place; so taking horse, accompanied with her brother, Reinold Earle of Cornwall, her servants, and many others her friends, besides Earle Robert, who followed behind with a troupe of Nobles and Knights; presentlie at the Bishoppes commandment, shee was pursued by his Souldiers, and many of her traine wounded and taken prisoners; the Empresse by good providence escaped into the Castle of Lutegarsball, and thence to the Castle Diniz: where understanding that shee was still in hazard to bee surprized, shee was contented, (as what will not necessity endure, & a womans wit devise?) to be laide in a coffin bound fast with cords; and so, as if it had bene her Corie, carried in a horrelitter to the Citie of Gloucester: in which bonds of her owne distresse, shee had good occasion to remember the chaines of King Stephens captivitie. To such extremities were these two Princes at the selfe same time subiect, that whiles they turmoiled for spacious Kingdomes, brought themselves to the very extreame wants, of aire, and of elbow-roume; but with such dalliance doth Fortune (wee see) oftentimes follow her game, that shee maketh even Monarchs the Balls of her play, and toffeth them lastly into the Hazard, whence hardly they escape with safetie of life. Yet this was not the worst; for Earle Robert her brother, whilest hee was busied in providing for her safetie, then for his owne, was taken by his pursuers at Stoubreg with others; brought backe to Winchester, and there presented by the Bishop vnto Queene Maude, King Stephens wife, who committed him to the custodie of William Ypres, and he for more safetie to Gloucester; but others taking sanctuarie in the Nunns Monastery of Warwell were burned together with the place: Thus then the King on the one side, and the Earle on the other, were kept in safe custodie; but the Queene labouring for the Kings release, and the Countesse for the Earles, many Articles were propounded, and many messengers imploied: at length, this was thought fittest, that Stephen should bee restored to his kingdom, and Robert vnder him to haue the whole government of the Land; so that both of them should now jointly uphold that, which they (the two Ring-leaders) by opposition had cast downe. But Earle Robert as he was no whit dejected in mind, with any frowne of Fortune whatsoever, so referred hee his fidelity to the Empresse vnstained, and vnmoued either with feare or faire inticements, still refusing to capitulate for his freedome, but to his Sisters liking, who likewise bare fo bravae a minde, that were her state neuer so weake, shee would not consent nor giue the least care to any composition for the Crowne.

(37) Then was enmitie increased, the Kingdom divided, and the peoples hatred kindled in maintaining the factions, all fore-running the ruine of the Land: For these two Chieftaines wearied with irksomnes of irons, and hard imprisonment, made exchange the one for the other, without any farther mention of peace, and so studied not onely to renew their former designs, but to encrease the lands miserie by more eage warres. Stephen in England wrought the people for him, & Robert taking pledge es of the Nobles to attend and guard the Empresse at Oxford till his returne, went into Normandie to sollicite Geoffrey her husband for her defence. But the Earle having troubles with his owne Nobilitie, and the Normans fearfully brought to any subiection, thought it not convenient by his owne absence for a state in hope, to hazard that in hand; and therefore sent with Robert some strength of Armes, and with them his young sonne Prince Henrie into England.

(38) The Empresse in his absence, had well fortified herselfe in Oxford, whom Stephen (vising the benefit of Roberts absence) followed with an eage pursuite, and wanne the Suburbs even vnto the Citie gates; then girt hee the Empresse with so strait a siege, (meaning neuer to giue over, till hee had now made her fure in his possession) that for two monethes whatsoever Strength or Stratagem could performe in assault or defense, was there put in practice, till at length great penurie enforced to thinke of a surrender: but thea, a woman (whose sexe hath often deceived wise men) resolute once againe to overreach her foe by wit, whom shee could not by force: whereto the time did fit her wishes; for being a winter, sharpe about measure, the Ruer Thames that runnes by the Citie walls, was then congealed with a strong crufted Ice, and besides a great growd did then continue, and had covered the ground. Maude vpon these advantages, put in practice a most dangerous attempt: for cloathing herselfe, and some choice of her company, in white linnen garments, to deceive the eyes of the Sentinells, issued secretly by night out of a posterne-gate, and passing the frozen Ruer, ranne on foote, through ice, and snow, ditches, and vallies, for five miles, even to Abingdon, the falling snow still beating in their faces; and there taking horse, the same night got to the Castle of Wallingford, to the great ioy, and also admiration, of all that were therein.

(39) In the meane while, Earle Robert, with Prince Henrie, were arrived in England at Warham hauen, and presentlie besieged the Castle there, (so to withdraw the King from siege of his sister;) but hearing of the happie escape of the Empresse, came with young Henry vnto his mother, whose sight made her forget the griefe and sorowes that shee had long endured. Then was Oxford vpon conditions yielded to the King; and Wilton fired by the bastard Earle Robert: The Towre of London, with the Castles of Walden, Pleisef, and Lincoln, yielded to Stephen; the Castles of Warham, and Portland, yielded to Robert: The Earles of Chester, and Essex, surprized by the King; William Martell the great fauourite, taken and imprisoned by the Earle. Thus sundrie yeeres passing with variable successes to and fro, and cury yeere heaping on each side, fresh calamities, to the great ruine of the whole land; the Empresse, euen wearied with those warres and uncertainties of successe, went into Normandie, chusing rather to be vnder the protection of her husband in peace, then to raigne in England perplexed with troubles: and to the same end shee had not long before, sent her young sonne Henrie to his father, who desired to haue him rather heire of a Dukedome with safetie, then of a Crowne with daylie hazard.

(40) Stephen, that by a fresh surprizall of Randall Earle of Chester had got Lincoln, and entring thence into (which no King before him durst doe, for that certain wizards had prophesied euill luck vnto such) at christmas did there wear the Regall Crowne on his head, and after the Emperesses departure, caused the Barons of England, to sweare allegiance vnto Prince Euface his sonne; by which two complements, hee supposed all had bene fure on his side; and the rather, for that the most faithful, puissant, and euer-renowned Earles, Robert of Gloucester, and Milo of Hereford the two great and glorious pillars, which had by many Conquests supported their Anouciens cause, were now conquered by death; and the rest of the Nobles, applying themselves to the Times, kept themselves quiet in the absence of these Competitors; all which gaue no little assurance vnto Stephens estate.

(41) But Henry Fitz-Empresse, grown now from a Child, thought it best a while to leave Mercury, (for it is said hee was Bookish) and to follow Mars; so knowing his preference would preferre much his purposes (for men would bee loth to hazard all for one, who himselfe would neglect all) halted againe into England, with an Armie of valiant and choice Souldiers; to whom joined the discontented Earle of Chester, Roger the sonne of Miles deceased, with many more Knights and Gallants of the English: hee therefore tooke into the North, and met with David his cosen, King of Scotland, of whom hee was most honourably received, and solemnely sacred with the Military honour of Knighthood: and thence forward sought all occasions to prouoke both King Stephen, and his sonne Euface against him: and having setled some courtes with certain Peeres for the pursuit of his designs in England, hee returned into Normandy to compose & set forward some other businesse, which might be auailable for these his ends.

(42) Where long he staid not, but that Geoffrey his Father departed this life, and left him his Heire both of Anjou and Normandy; and the yeere following, hee matched in marriage with Eleanor Duchesse of Guien and Aquitaine, lately diuorced from Lodowicke King of France for consanguinity, and adultery (saith Paris) after shee had borne him two daughters; Lodowicke fearing issue-male by this marriage to the dishonouring of his said daughters, greatly impugned Duke Henry; and Stephen suspecting his greatnes, now being Duke of Normandy, Anjou, Aquitaine, and Guien, both of them fought each way to impeach his peace: Lodowicke, with Prince Euface, in the parts beyond seas, and Stephen in England, to make fure his succellion, fought to inuelt the said Prince Euface with the English Diadem; both to prevent, and utterly deuide Henry Fitz-Empresse for euer: for calling a Councell at London, King Stephen commaunded Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury to consecrate Prince Euface for their King; which hee refused to doe, and that by commandment from the Pope (whose holy See can deale on both sides, as makes most for their advantage) alledging now, that his Father was an vnrper, and perjured Intruder: whereupon the honest Archbishop fled into Normandy, and the King seized vpon all his possessions. It may seeme, that one cause of the Popes inclining to young Henries title, was to strengthen him against his enemy King Lewis of France, who had highly offended his Holines, for casting the Popes Bull (whereby hee required the fruits of Vacancies of all Cathedral Churches in France) into the fire, saying, hee had rather the Popes Bull (should rest in the fire, then his owne (saith Mather) in hell.

(43) King Stephen thus defeated of his purpose, and seeing his Title questioned by the Church, who had before approued it, resolved to make it good by the sword: for winning the Castle of Mubey, fortified Malmesbury, and laid a trait siege vnto Wallingford, against which hee erected the Castle Crumme, to stoppe the passages of their reliefe, or coming forth. But Henry after hee had calmed the boisterous stormes of warre, in the parts beyond the seas, came ouer into England well appointed, vnto whom also resorted many of the Nobility, who yielded vp themselves, and about thirty strong Castles to the young Duke: now well furnished, halted to raise the siege of Wallingford, and there vnderooke a great enterprize; for hee incircled the Besiegers with a great and deepe Trench, whereby hee kept them from reliefe, as they did keepe the Besieged.

(44) Stephen following hastily to succour his men, (though with the lesse edge, for that hee neuer sped well in any assault of that Castle) pitched downe his

Tents, euen neere his enemy; and ready on both sides to giue bataille: the Winter stormes were suddenly so troublesome, that nothing could bee done; but those somewhat ouerblowne, and the Armies scarce three furlongs asunder, as King Stephen was busied in disposing of his host, and giuing direction for order of the bataille, his horse vnder him rising with his fore-feet, fell flat vpon the earth, not without danger to his Rider; and thus did hee thrice ere hee left, which thing his Nobles secretly muttering, interpreted for an vn lucky preface: when William Earle of Arundell, a bold and eloquent man, went to him and aduised him to a peace; affirming the title of Duke Henry to be iust; that the Nobility on both parts there present, were neerely linked in Alliances & Blood, and how these stood affected, was very doubtfull; yea, that Brethren were there assembled, the one against the other, whereof must needs follow an vn naturall warre betwixt them, & of dangerous consequence, euen to him that contested. With these and the like allegations at last Stephen beganne to bend, and a parley for peace was signified vnto the Duke. Henry already warme for the bataille, and his thoughts fixed on nothing lesse then peace, could hardly moderate his youthful affections; yet at his friends importunity, hee yielded to conferre with King Stephen.

(45) The place for conference was so appointed; that the ruer Thames parted the presence of these two Princes; so that from either banke they saluted each others, and after a long conference, agreeing on a truce, and vpon faire termes of amity departed, commaunding all weapons and attempts of warre to be laide aside.

(46) But Euface, who hitherto had attended Fortune for the Crowne, and now hopelesse to haue as his Fathers Successor, was greatly displeased with this new moulded friendship, and in a fury departed the field, purposing to raise himselfe by his owne means; and coming to Bury, vrged the Monks of Saint Edmunds for money, to set forward his heady designs: But the wiser amongst them vnwilling to bee wagers of new warres (which though ill for all sorts, yet proued euer worst to the Clergie mens possessions) denied his request; wherewith enraged, hee commanded his men to carry their corne and other prouision into his owne Castle, situated hard by. But being set at dinner, wee reade of him (saith mine Author) that euen the verie first bit that hee put in his mouth, drave him into a frensie, whereof shortly after hee died; whose body was interred at Feuerham in Kent.

(47) The death of Prince Euface so much aduantaged Duke Henry, that thereupon (the truce in likelihood expiring) many fell off vnto him, and many Castles were deliuered, as Bertwell, Reading, Warwicke, Stamford, and others; wherewith Stephen was not a little displeased, and thinking to entrappe the yong venturous Duke, with a strong Army followed him vnto Wallingford: But God himselfe looking down from heauen (saith Mather of S. Albans) made there an end of those long calamities, by stirring the minds of chiefe men in the land to labour for peace: such was Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury, and Henrie Bishop of Winchester, who hauing troubled the realm with fire and sword, moued now to repentance, wrought so effectually with his brother, that hee inclined vnto a wished peace, contented to adopt the Duke for his Son and Successor; and so committing both together to Oxford (a blessed sight to so distressed and distracted a Kingdom;) there did all the Nobles do fealty to him, as to the vndoubted Heire of the land; and the Duke to acknowledge this as a fauour, yielded him the honour of a Father, and the roialtie of all Kingly power during his life.

(48) Notwithstanding, the cleere Sunne shine of these faire daies, was somewhat darkened with a cloud of treacherie, and lowd attempts of the Flemings; who enuying Englands peace, vpon Barham

Prince Henry in danger by treachery.

Downes, intended to surprize Prince Henry in his returne from Dover, and presence of King Stephen. In this conspiracie was William the Kings son, though but yong, who himselfe meaning to haue one cast at the Crowne, instantly before it should haue been effected, was through the wantonnes of his horse cast to the ground, and with the fall brake his legges; to whose assistance, whiles euery one gathered and lamented, Henry vpon secret notice of the treason hastned vnto Canterbury, and thence to London, and soone after ouer the seas into Normandy.

(49) And Stephen now after he had reigned eightene yeeres, ten months, and odde daies, departed this life at Dover, in the Monastery of the Monkes, of an illacke palsy, mixed with his olde diseale the Emrod, the twenty five of October, and yeere of Christs Natiuitie, 1154. A most worthy Souldier, faith Paris: and (in a word) one who wanted nothing but a iust title to haue made him an excellent King; in his ordinary deportment very deuout; the fruites wherof were shewed in erecting with sufficient endowments, the Abbeyes of Cogshall in Essex, of Furnesse in Lancashire, the houses of Nunnes at Carew, and Higham, an Hospitall at Yorke, and the Monastery of Feversham in Kent, where his Queene, his sonne, and lastly, himselfe were enterr'd: but since, his body for the gaine of the lead, wherein it was coffined, was cast into the riuer. So vn certaine is man (yea greatest Princes) of any rest in this world, euen after burials, and restlesse may their bodies be also (who for filthy lucre) thus enuie to the dead, the quiet of their graues.

His Wife.

(50) Maud, the Wife of King Stephen, was the daughter of Eustace Earle of Bulloigne, the brother of Godfrey, and Baldwin Kings of Ierusalem: her Mother was Mary, sister to Maud Queene of England, wife of King Henrie, her husbands Predecessor. Shee was crowned at Westminster vpon Sunday, being Easter-day, and the two and twenty of March, in the first yeere of her husbands raigne, and of Grace, 1136. and being Queene fiftene yeeres, she died at Hedingham Castle in Essex, the third of May, and yeere of Christ, 1151. and was buried in his Monastery at Feversham in Kent.

His Issue.

(51) Baldwin, the eldest sonne of King Stephen and Queene Maud (bearing the name of King Baldwin his vn cle) was born in the time of the reign of K. Henry his fathers vn cle; and died in his infancy, during the reign of the same King. He was buried at London in the Church of the Priorie of the Trinity within Algate, which was a house of blacke * Canons of the Augustinian order, founded by Q. Maud, the first wife of the foresaid King Henry the first.

(52) Eustace the second sonne of King Stephen, & of Queene Maud his wife, being the heire apparent to them both; when his Father was King, was created Earle of Boulogne, which dignity was the inheritance of his mother. Hee married Constance sister of Lewis the seuenth King of France, daughter of King Lewis the Grasse: who afterward was remarried to Raymond the third Earle of Toulouse: for Eustace died before her without Issue by her, the tenth day of August, in the eighteenth yeere of his Fathers raigne, and of Grace, 1152. Hee was buried by his mother in his Fathers Monastery at Feversham in Kent.

(53) William, the third and yongest sonne of King Stephen and Queene Maud, married Isabell daughter and heire of William Warren, the third Earle of Surrey, with whom hee had that Earledome; hee was in his Fathers life time Earle of Surrey, Lord of Norwich and Pevensy in England, Earle of Mortayne, and Lord Eagle of Normandy. After his fathers death, King Henry the second made him Knight, resumed those things that hee held of the Crowne, restored him to all that his Father held before hee was King. And so he was Earle of Bolloigne, Surrey, and Mortayne, and being with him in his journey to Tholouze, died without issue, in his returne homeward, in the Moneth of October, the seuenth of King Henries raigne, and of Christ Iesus, 1160.

(54) Maud, the eldest daughter of King Stephen and Queene Maud, was borne before her father was King, in the reign of King Henrie the first, her vn cle; in whole time also shee deceased, beeing but yongue, (though some report shee was wife to the Earle of Milten) and was enterr'd at London, with her brother Baldwin, in the Priorie of the Trinity aforesaid, then commonly called Christs Church, and now late named the Dukes Place within Algate.

(55) Marie, the yonger daughter of King Stephen and Queene Maud, was a Nun, and Abbess of the Nunnerie at Rumsey in Hampshire; notwithstanding, when her brother William, Earle of Bolloigne, was deceased without issue, shee was secretly taken from thence, and married to Matthew the yonger sonne of Terry of Alsace, and brother of Philip Earle of Flanders, who in her right was Earle of Bolloigne. Shee was his wife ten yeeres, and was then diuorced from him, by the sentence of the Pope, and enforced to returne to her Monastery, hauing had issue by him two daughters, which were Ide and Maude, allowed by the censure of the Church to be legitimate. Lady Ide, the elder, was married to Raymond of Damp-Martine, in her right Earle of Bolloigne; and Maude, the yonger, to Henrie Duke of Lorraine.

His Naturall Issue.

(56) William, the Naturall sonne of King Stephen, is mistaken of some to bee the same William, that was Earle of Bolloigne. Others, who know that William Earle of Bolloigne was lawfully borne, do thinke that his father had no other son named William but him; wherein let William Earle of Bolloigne, the lawfull son of King Stephen, be himselfe a lawfull witness of the truth, who hauing best cause to know it, doth best prouocut; and in an ancient Charter of his, beeing written in those daies, and extant in these, doth name him for a witness, and calleth him his Brother.

(57) Geruase, another Naturall sonne of King Stephen, begotten on a gentle-woman named Dame-isa, and borne in Normandy, was brought into England by his father, the fifth yeere of his Raigne, Anno Dom. 1140. Hee was the same yeere, by his fathers meanes, made Abbat of Westminster, and so continued for the space of twenty yeeres: hee deceased there the twentie sixt of August, in the sixt yeere of the raigne of King Henrie the second, the yeere of Grace 1160. and lieth buried in the South part of the cloister, within the said Monasterie, vnder a flat stone of black marble, which is remaining there vntil this day.

former fortunes, hauing already been touched; his counsels, acts, and other affaires of greatest importance, after the death of King Stephen come now to be handled.

(2) Hee came not to the Crown vnexpected, nor vn desired; for the opinion of the man, and hope conceiued of his future gouernement, had the force to hold England in good obedience without the presence of a King, about sixe weekes, whose entrance like that of the Soule into the Body, did quicken, and enspirite the Realme, as then (in the person of England) this clozing verse, or Epiphoneme spake:

*Spiritus es, caro sum: te nunc intrante renixi.
T'hou, Soule; I Body am: by thee to life I came.*

Neither did his presence diminish the expectations raised, but was saluted King with generall acclamations, and with no lesse ioy at Westminster by Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury, annointed and crowned: the summe of whose first courtes for settling his State was this.

(3) Sundry Castles (nests of Rebels) hee flattereth to the earth, some others hee fortifies or resumes at his pleasure; chiefly such estates, as had bene alienated from the Crowne, as the hire and vnjust reward of those who withstood his claime. Others write, that hee promiscuously tooke all such lands into his owne possession, as were by Iurors found vpon oath to haue belonged at any time vnto the Crowne. Some Earles vnduly created, hee reduceth to priuate condition, and purgeth the Realme from forraine Souldiers, chiefly from the Flemings, whose mercenary swarms most pestered the same, and had most infected him. And because Government is the Soule of State, and Wifeedom the Soule of Government, he chooseth to himselfe a Body of Councell out of the most eminent persons of both sorts: such was Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury; and for that selfe consideration, he laid the Chancellorship of England vpon Thomas Becket, and held in speciall fauour John of Oxford, with sundry other Prelates of chiefest note: of the Laity, he had Robert Earle of Chesster, chiefest Iusticiar of England, Richard de Luci, Iocellin de Bailull, Alan de Neaile and others: but for a Cabanet-Counsellour at all times, he had his owne mother, Matilda the Emperesse, one of the most fage and experienced Ladies of the World. Thus then furnished, and assembling a Councell at Wallingford, hee awell for his owne securing, as for the assurance of his Children, sweares the Realme to the succession of his sonnes William and Henry, the one being in remainder to the other.

(4) But quiet consultation did not take vp the most of his time, even in the daies of these Sun-shining beginnings: for the reign of Stephen, a most gentle Prince (who thought, out of the necessity of his owne estate, that it was not safe for him to be seuered) having giuen way for many of the mighty, to maintaine fundrie insolencies; these now feeling a restraint, beganne not a little to repine: but Hugh de Mortimer, wanton with greatness, and the most arrogant man alicie, stuff his Castles of Glocester, Higmore, and Bridgenorth with rebellious Garrisons, which Henry notwithstanding reduced to subiection, though in the siege of the last named, not without imminent perill of his person, had not Hubert de S. Clare, cast himselfe betweene death and the King, taking the arrow into his owne bosome to preferre his Soueraignes life. It bound Tiberius to Seianus most of all, when a part of the banquette Caue in which they were, suddenly falling, Seianus was found to haue borne the ruine from the Emperour, with the perill of his life: but Seianus suruiued that aduerture, which our Seneca did not, saue only in the better renowne thereof, which deserues to be immortal, being an Act of piety, worthy of a Statue, with Cadmus, Curtius, Manlius, or whosoever else haue willingly sacrificed themselves for their Country, or for the Father of their Country, the King.

(5) Henrie thus hauing in some sort settled England, hasteth into France to King Leuis in the first yeere of his reign, and there did homage vnto him for Normandy, Aquitane, Angiou, Main and Tourain, which partly were his patrimony, and partly the inheritance of Eleanor his wife.

(6) His domesticke enemies being subdued or appeased, hee put his brother Geffrey by force to a pension, the summe whereof (if it be any thing to the purpose to know) was 1000. l. English, and 2000. l. Arion by yeere, wringing out of his possession all such territories, as by their Fathers last Will and Testament, were bequeathed to him in France. But Geffrey did not long enjoy the said annuity, or his brothers friendship: for in the third yeere, death brought a discharge, and Henry was disburdened of those payments. For his violence in taking away those lands, King Henry might alledge he was eldest brother: but that allegation might bee auoided with his owne consent, which once hee gaue: but the great Elisax, called Reason of State, (though falsely so called, vnlesse it bee seasoned with Iustice, and Religion) hath so transmutatue a faculty, as to make Copper seeme Gold, right wrong, and wrong right; yea, when all Pleas faile, it will stand for good, while there are forces to support it.

(7) This accord betweene the two brethren, being thus (howsoever) established, the King repaires into

England, and at Chesster enters amity with Malcolme King of Scots, on such termes, as his Grandfather had done, yet Salus omnibus dignitatibus suis, sauing to himselfe all his dignities: and the said Malcolme restored to Henry the City of Karlew, Newcastle vpon Tyne, &c. and Henry restored to him the Earledome of Huntington in England. And so iustly dreadfull did the growing puissance of this young Monarch appeare to his greatest enemies, that Hugh Bigod Earle of Norfolke, who had potent means to doe mischief, rendered his Castle to bee at his disposal.

(8) The Welsh notwithstanding forsooke not themselves, but did some memorable matters vnder conduct of the valiant Prince Owen against the English, in defence of North-Wales, and their Countries liberty, to the losse of the English, and extreme danger of the Kings owne person, whose Standard roiall was cowardly abandoned, and the King reported to be slaine: for which Henrie de Essex, the Kings Standard-Bearer at that conflict, was afterward accused by Robert de Monford his neere Kinsman, and in single bataille within lists was vanquished at Reading, where the said Henry de Essex was slaine a Monke, and died. Mathew Paris relates the whole voiage of King Henry summarily thus: That Henry prepared a very great Army against the Welsh, with full purpose to ouercome them both by land and sea; that hee cut vp the woods and Forrests, and laid open a way; that hee recovered the Castle of Ruthlaw and other fortresses taken from his Ancestors; that hee repaired the Castle of Basingwerke, and that hauing brought the Welsh to his will, hee returned with triumph into England.

(9) After this, himselfe and his wife Queene Eleanor being openly crowned vpon Christmas day, (* some say Easter day) at the Citie of Winchester, they both at the offertorie laid their Diademes vpon the high Altar, vowing neuer to wear them after; this being now the third time in which at three severall places, Westminster, Lincolne, and Winchester, he had beene crowned. This deuout act of his, did flow perhaps out of some such speculation as that of Caninius, who thought none truly worthy the name of King, but Godalone, or that, vpon which Godfrey of Bullion, refused to wear a crowne of gold in Hierusalem, where our Lord and Sauour had beene crowned with thornes. For this King had at times the pangs and symptoms of mortification and piety, and did heerein acknowledge the onely giuer and taker-away of kingdoms God Almighty; putting himselfe and Realme, vnder the protection of that Maieftie of whom hee held paramount; and professing (as it were) that from thenceforth hee would direct his actions to the glorie of his omnipotent Master, which is indecde the only finall caule of all true monarchie.

(10) Not long after, hauing established his affaires in England, hee crost the Seas into Normandie: where successfullie fundrie matters of importance fell out: as the seizure of the City of Nantes in Britaine after his brother Geffrey's death; his journey to Paris, being invited thither by Leuis and his wife the Queene; the vnprofitable siege of Tholouse laid by King Henrie, where Malcolme King of Scots was in companie with him; the vnripe marriage of his sonne Henrie to Margaret the French Kings daughter, whom Thomas Becket then Lord Chancellor had formerlie conducted with verie great State from Paris, by consent of parents for that purpose; the offence taken at those spousals by Leuis, for that the children were but infants, and that himselfe was a loofer thereby; the warre heereupon attempted by Leuis, fortifying Chaumont, which the French hauing quit the Field by flight) King Henrie recovered with aduantage; the Armies of both these great Kings, being afterward at point (as it were) to ioinc, dispersed vpon reconciliation of the two Kings, by rea-reason of a marriage concluded vpon, betweene Richard, King Henries second son, and Alice the French Kings daughter: All which and some other, not drawing with them any extraordinarie sequell, nor offering much matter for ciuill document, must not preponderate the handling of things more rare and considerable.

(11) For after these accidents, beganne the famous controuerfies betweene the King and his Arch-bishop Becket, a man of an inuincible stomack and resolution in his life, and after death reputed by some for a great Saint or Martyr; as is likewise noted of Henrie, * that he was the most politike, martiall, rich, and honoured Prince of all his time. This Prelate by birth a Londoner, (though his mother, a Saracen, * say some) by profession a * Ciuitian, was by Theobald Arch-bishop of Canterbury, both made his Arch-deacon, and also placed about the person of Duke Henrie, who being now King, advanced him in the verie first yeere of his reign to bee Lord Chancellor of England, in which high honor he carried himselfe like another King, and afterward vpon the death of Theobald, though the * Monks objected against Becket, that neither a Courtier nor a Souldier (as * hee had beene both) were fit to succede in so high and sacred a function, yet the King gaue him that Arch-bishopricke, partly in reward, and partly in further hope of his ready and faithful seruice. Which to be true, a Legend of his Miracles can best relate. Nonnullis tamen &c. Many (saith hee) iudged his promotion not Canonical, because it was procured more by the importunity of the King, then by the voices of Clergie, or People; and it was noted as presumption and indiscretion in him, to take vpon him to guide the Sterne, who was scarce fit to handle an Oare, and that being (kild only in worldly affaires, hee did not tremble to ascend vnto that sacred top of so great dignitie. Where to agree the reports of two learned Monks who then liued, (for such Authors onely we will heerein follow, as shall bee vnpartiall) * one of which testifies, that the Pope about that time calling a Councell at Tours (and the King giuing Licence to his Arch-bishops and Bishops to goe thither) Becket secretly iurued his Arch-bishopricke, which hee had receiued from the Kings hand, into the Popeshands. The * other saith, Becket himselfe confessed, that, not Canonical Election did call him, but publick power droue him in, nor the will of God, but mans pleasure, placed him in the roome. Howsoeuer, these being memorable arguments of the Kings exceeding loue; let vs now see how this great Prelate endeouored to deserue it, or how hee chanced to lose it.

(12) Great and flourishing was the state of the English Church & Common-wealth at this season; the quiet of both which, the King studied & hoped to establish by the vndoubted assistance of his great fauourite Becket, whose counsell & authority he knew might much further his princely designs, especially touching affaires of the Church, and abuses of Church men, which then were grown to a dangerous height: whereof let vs heare the Monke of Naborough speake: It was declared in the Kings presence, how that Clergy had committed aboue a hundred murders vnder his reign; wherewith the King highly offended, hee was in punishing of them, when hee too vehemently; but the blame of the Kings too much earnestness, must lie on the Prelates, in as much as they gaue the cause thereof: for, whereas sacred Canons ordaine, that Clerks found guilty, not onely of heinous and gricuous finnes, but also of lesser, should bee degraded, and thousands of such were in the Church of England, like innumerable chaffe amongst a little good cornes, yet very few such, for these many yeeres haue beene depriued. The Prelates forsooth, while they bestirre themselves, rather to uphold the liberties & dignities of Clerks, then to chastice, and cut off their vices, thinke they doe God and his Church good seruice, in protecting from publicke Discipline such heinous offenders, whom (by duty of their places) they ought to correct according to the Canons censure, whereby they through their impunity, hauing liberty to doe what they list, haue neither feare of God, (whose iudgements they thinke is farre off) neither of men in authority, sit on the one side they Prelates neglect to reforme them, and on the other side, they are thus exempt by their order from the temporall iurisdiction.

(13) This being the state of the Church and Realme, wherein some were so miured without remedy, and others so iniurious without coercion, as if neither sort were in condition of Subiects; the King (who was a man of excellent Wifeedom, Constancy, and Zeale) tooke especial care of quickning the publicke Discipline, and the rigour of ancient lawes, which thus lay neglected; for which end hee had seileld choise Ministers of Iustice through all parts of his lands, and vpon complaints brought him by his Subiects of the remissions, and other defects of his Iudges, hee accordingly by his princely prouidence applied remedies, and chastised the delinquents. The like remissions (to censure it no harder) was complained of in his Spirituall Iudges, occasioned by a murder, committed by a Priest of Sarum Diocesse, whom the Archbishop commanded to be depriued, & put into an Abbey, whereby he was freed from sharper punishment, intended by the Kings Iusticiaries: with which (and some other like affronts of his Archbishop) the King conceiued no little displeasure, as requiring, that Iustice should be ministered to all alike without partiality, & seeing this apparently to tend vnto the ruine of all roiall gouernment: the Archbishop on the other side, stood no lesse peremptory on the immunities of his Clergy and See: yea so farre, as that hee challenged from the Crown (to the Kings great offence) the custody of Rochester Castle and other Forts, which the King for securing his state had returned into his owne hands.

(14) This maine controuerfise betwixt Regnum, & Sacerdotium, the Crowne and the Mitre, Houeden (who then also liued) thus summarily deliucrs: The King would that all such of the Clergy as were deprehened in any Robberie, Murder, Felonie, burning of houses, and the like, should bee tried and aduised in his temporal Courts, as Lay-men were: against which, the Archbishops resolution was, that all Clergy men offending should bee tried onely in the Spirituall Courts, and by men of their owne coate; who if they were convicted, should at first be onely depriued of their office and benefice: but if they should againe be guilty of the like, they should then bee aduised at the Kings pleasure. The King finding himselfe to bee hereby but a Demi-King, depriued of all Soueraignty ouer one half-deale of his Kingdom, and perceiving Becket's stiffnesse, in thus contesting with his Soueraigne, to bee no way mollifiable by whatsoever his old fauours, or fresh persuasions; notwithstanding resolved to put nothing in execution, which should not first bee ratified and strengthened with consent of his Bishops of whose ready assent to so iuit demands hee had no cause to doubt: who therupon assembling at Westminster, the King, tooke both offence there, at the Archbishops thwarting his desires, and occasion also to establish sundry other Articles, which hee called his Grandfathers Customes, peremptorily vrging Becket to yeeld therunto, without any such reservation of sauing in all things his order, and right of the Church, wherewith he would haue limited his assent.

(15) The points in those Ordinances which the Archbishop principally stucke at, as * himselfe did set them downe in his letters to the Pope, and his owne Suffragan Bishops within the Diocesse of Canterbury, were principally these: 1. That none should appeale to the See of Rome for any cause whatsoever, without the Kings licence. 2. That it should not be lawfull for any Archbishop or Bishop to depart the Realme, and repaire to the Pope vpon his summons, without the Kings licence. 3. That no Bishop should excommunicate any one whomsoever, holding of the King in chiefe, or put any other of his officers vnder Interdict, without the Kings licence. 4. That Clerks criminous should bee tri-

(46) Henry therefore, among so many perplexities rising out of the Archbishops murder, saw no way to ready for the calming his own perturbations, or for the averting mens thoughts from the consideration of that scandalous tragédie, as to undertake some great and noble enterprize, which now offered it self very seasonably. For Ireland, a verie spacious and plentiful land, and lying commodiously for the vies of the English, burned in it self with ciuill diuisions, kindled among the petty Kings and Princes thereof: while Rotherick the Great, called O Conor Dui, Prince of Connaght, abusing his power and the aduantage of the times, to the oppression of his Neighbours, sought to make himselfe the vniuersall King thereof, hauing already inuaded the Title & Seile of KING AND MONARCH OF IRELAND. And this his purpose was much aduanced by the fatal and familiar error of proceedings in like cases: for the Irish Princes, either through distrust or pride, forbearing to vniite their forces against the common enemy, while each prouides for one, they are all as it were, ouercome.

(47) Moreouer Dermot Mac Murrough (in that time of the Irish Pentarchie, or five-fold Kingdome) hauing secretly stolne away the wife of Rotherick (a light woman, and consenting or plotting rather, & vrging the rape it self) added to Rothericks ambition, a iust desire of reuenge, for so notable, impudent, and publicke iniurie, so much the more odious in Dermots person, for that hee was old: neither was this all; for the causes of this change were higher.

(48) The onely disposer and transferor of Kingdomes is God, & in Ireland to moue him to offence (without which no Kingdome is transferred) against the people thereof, all such finnes abounded, as commonly forgoe the greatest changes: for not onely the manners of the Nation were extremely corrupted, but the Christian faith it selfe decayed; barbarisme ouerrunning the one, and * more then superstitions the other. But it may seeme by some * Authors, that King Henries particular inducements to that Action, were both an ancient title vnto that Kingdome, deriued from his ancestors (the kings of England) for many ages before him; and * many vn-sufferable wrongs (by their Piracies) vnto the English Nation, buying and selling their Captiues, and using Turkish tyranny on their bodies: which made the Irish Clergy them selfes confesse, that they had deserued no other, then that their land should be transferred to that Nation whom they had so cruelly handled. Notwithstanding, King Henry, who knew how great and dangerous tumults the Popes had raised on small occasions, thought his way would be much easier, if he went onward with the Popes good fauour, which hee easily obtained (so liberal is his holinesse of that which is none of his) for a fee; viz. a penny yearly to be paid to Saint Peter of every house in Ireland. Touching which point, Rossus of Warwic (no Protestant, I assure you,) saith, That Englands King is not bound to rely on the Popes graunt for Ireland, nor yet to pay that tax, because hee had claime to that Kingdome by an hereditary right: and that the Pope had no temporall interest therein (as his fauorites pretend) the often-mentioned Monke of Newborough can tell vs, who saith, that Nunquam externa subiacit diuini, Ireland was neuer subiect to any foraine command.

(49) God Almighty therefore did now put it into the heart of Henry, for the reforming of that kingdome, to make a Conquest thereof, hauing in his infinite wisdom before hand fitted all circumstances needfull to concur, for inducing 'so warie and frugal a Prince to such an enterprize, which thus tooke beginning.

(50) Dermot Mac Murgh, being in possession of his fatal Helen (the adulterous wife of Rothericke) was pursued so eagerly with the reuenging sword of his enemy (who, howsoeuer wounded in heart with the abuse of his Bed, reioiced in the colour and occasion ministred thereby, for him to scile vpon the flourishing Prouinces of Leinster) as hee was driuen to flie from place to place, and at the length to quitte his kingdome also, the subiects whereof his tyrannic and vices had vnited, in their affections toward him. Thus desperate of help at home, his last deliberations were to draw in foraine aides, the necessity of his case requiring it; and for that purpose, finally resolues to repaire to the court of the wife and potent Henric, King of England, being then in Aquitain: neither could Dermot but knowe, that it had heeretofore bene in Henries designs, at such time as hee ment to subdue it for William of Anglou, his youngest brother, and also, because his present Dominions did halfe (as it were) enuiron it. In which hopes he was not decieued; for Henric listened therunto verie willingly, as to a thing which hee had indeede a some yeeres before projected.

(51) King Dermot therefore was heard in his suite. But, because the thing, as at that time, neither seemed great enough, for such a Prince as Henric to undertake directly, nor as yet was held sufficiently discovered to his hand; that therefore the Ice might be broken by inferior means, and as well the conueniences, as inconueniences, founded to the depth, (without engaging the roiall person, name, or power,) it was by the Kings letters permitted to Dermot (the exiled Prince) to draw what * aduenturers, or voluntaries, either the commiseration of his estate, or other respects, of pietie, profit, or delight in armes, could allure to the action. Now whether it were, for that he, whose Countreis lay toward the coasts of Wales, (and within ken vpon a cleere day) by commodity thereof might entertaine intelligence, as well as traffike, with the inhabitants of those parts; or, for that the fame of their Cheualrie did inuite; or, for that his acquaintance at his arriual grew there first; or, for that these and many other circumstances mette in this accident: sure it is, that Dermot raised his first, and principall succours from among the English Colonies there.

(52) The Welsh had then in their hands a valiant Gentleman of Norman race, one Robert Fitz-Stephen, who by Gilbert de Clare was entrusted with the defence of the towne of Cardigan, but through * treachery the Towne being surpris'd, Robert was also deliuered vp to Rhese ap Gruffydd, Prince of South Wales, who would hearken to no other endements of his liberty, but onely, that he should for euer abandon his possessions in Wales. Whereupon (the opportunity of Dermots quarrel giuing hopes of new fortunes) immediately hee entered into contract with the Irish King, promising by a certaine day to come to his succour, with as many Voluntaries, as his remaining fortunes, or the hope of the voyage could stirre: which he * did accordingly performe, leauing it very disputable, whether with more successe or courage. But Dermot well knowing that the fortunes of this Gentleman (to whose valor nothing seemed impossible) were viable to vndergo the whole weight of the vnknowne worke, had formerly deale with that renowned Lord, Richard of the house of Clare, * Earle of Pembrooke, furnam'd Strang-bow: the man whom the Fate of Ireland did expect.

(53) Dermots persuasions to the Earle were of this kind: That the enterprize, besides the facultie thereof, was full of pietie, honour, iustice, and commoditie: That it appeared so to King Henry himselfe, by whose leaue hee was free to gather what forces he could: That hee was driuen out by the cruell ambition of Neighbours, & * treacherie of wicked Subiects. That Leinster was a Kingdome, and though but a part, yet cleere-ly the best and richest part of Ireland. That multitudes offered themselves to his aid, but his cares were not onely for a Generall to lead them, but for one to whom hee might leaue his kingdome also.

also: That the Earle was he, as the onely man, in whose person all the respects of birth, honour, bounty, valour, youth and fortunes did happily meete: That the Earle (in his conceit) did dwell but narrowly (considering what hee was worthe of) pent-vp in the straights of an Earldomes title, for whom a great Kingdome was not great. That they who would not allow Leinster for a kingdome, did forget, that England once was brooken into lesser Rates; and if Dermot were not a King, neither then were Ells, Cissa, Vffa, Sigbert, Crida, and the rest in the Saxon seven-headed government: that the quantity of Dominion made more or lesse strong, but not more or lesse a King. That he was rightfull King of Leinster, as Sonne and Heire to Murgh King of Leinster: that if hee must forgoe his inheritance, it should be to such as had done him no wrong, and were worthy of it; to Richard Strong-bow and his followers, and not to Rothericke and Rebels. That hee was not vnking'd, though vnkingdome'd: that Eua his daughter (Eua the pearle and Harre of Ireland) should indeed be Eua to his enemies to bring vpon them death, and iust confusion: that yet in defeating the Tyrant Rotherick of his hopes by plaiting Earle Richard and his Forces, hee should prouide for his Country, not destroy it. That if it did fall out otherwise, yet his disloiall people had their iust deserts, who obiecting vices to their Sovereigns, did themselves commit vile treasons. Indeed (quoth he) I was neuer such a King, as that I was not also a Man. But for those matters betwene God and me, here is now no place to account, for though his iustice hath found me out, yet his mercy hath left me more friends at home, then the number & measure of my finnes deserue: My quarrell is most iust, as against most wicked rebels and vlturpers: Restore me then (my Lord) by your puissance to my native soile, and my lawfull rights therein: restore with me Religion and Discipline to the ancient splendor thereof, which was not greater in any Realme about vs then in Ireland: reduce the stray, enlighten our ignorance, polish our rudeness, and let not such abundant matter of merite and immortal glory escape you. God himselfe will prosper the enterprize: sholy Church hath long since approued it: and vpon such Authors what can miscarry? And though in this noble and Christian courage nothing can weigh so much, (and these I see worth mightily) yet to satisfie all respects, Thou shalt haue far larger territories then here Thou canst possesse, and goodly lands to distribute for reward among thy friends and followers. My last offers now shall not shew a more desire to vithy forces, then aloue to thy person & vertues. They are not trifles I propoſe, but that of which God himselfe doth seeme to me to haue laid the ground; seeing it is his holy will that thou at this time shouldst bee without a wife. Know thou then, that I haue that one daughter Eua, the heire of my Crowne, and comfort of my age: let thine owne eye tell thee how faire and worthy: this I dare auouch, that thou wilt thinke far broader seas wel crost, for view of so honest beauty: the in the first blossome of her youth, a vertuous virgin, and by both Parents borne of Princes, shall at thine arriual, with this right hand, bee made thine, and with her after my death, my whole realme, and other my rights whatsoeuer: which were they infinitely more; (despite not such loue, nor the alliance of one distressed, but neuertheless a King,) I would repute them farre too little for such a sonne in law: who though thy selfe as yet no King, art come of Kings, and it is my whole and last ambition, that I may liue to make thee one. The Earle accepted the conditions, resolute to serue Dermot againe, and for that purpose bound himselfe by soleme contract, to the full performance of his part within a certaine time.

(53) Dermot hauing thus negotiated his affaires and set it in so good forwardnes, while his friends in England prepared themselves and their Forces, left hee should seeme to rely vpon foraine aides, and so to diminish with them the reputation of his owne valour and alliances at home; hee failes backe into his Country, carrying with him the promises of confederates, and there; both by his presence and persuasions did the best hee could to facilitate the entrance of the English, whose honourable entertainements, deuotions, ciuility, riches, valours, wisdom, and victorious greatnesse he spared not to celebrate, as instruments aduancing his own designs: which raised no little expectation, mixt with contrary affections of desire and feare.

(54) The next year, when the season grew fit for an Army to take the field, Robert Fitz-Stephen accompanied with Maurice Fitz-Gerald his halfe brother by the furer side, & * a competent number of Souldiers, repoling (vnder God) their chief hope in their swords and courages, set saile for Ireland; and in the beginning of May came on shore, at a place called by the Irish, Bunn (by the English at this day commonly, Bagg and Bunn) which in our language signifies Sacred: a word which (so much as names may be prefaces of things) did as it were hallo the attempt of the English with a lucky and gracious omination, whereof the Inhabitants at this present retain this rime.

At the head of Bagg and Bunn, Ireland was lost and won.

(55) The next day after, Maurice de Prendergast also, with * other men of Armes, and many Archers in two shippes arriued there, being parcell of Fitz-Stephans Forces and Companions of his Fortunes, who ioining themselves together, immediately marcht to the City of Weisford vnder their Banners, and that in the greatest brauery they could, (the Knights and Men at Armes in their Coates of Arms & Colours) to draw thereby now at the first the greater reputation to themselves, and with opinion so gotten, to fill vp the finalnes of their numbers: in which manner affailing the City, the Irish therein rendred themselves, and in reward of the seruice, being also * according to capitulation, and encouragement of others, who were to proceed in this warre, Dermot, to whose vie the English Generall had taken it, bestowed the City it selfe, and the Country about vpon Robert Fitz-Stephen, at his pleasure to be disposed off: and there the first Colony of our Nation was planted, which hath euer since innumereably maintained their abode among innumerable changes in the world, retaining at this day the ancient attire of the English, and the language also it selfe, though brackish with the mixture of vulgar Irish, which therefore by a distinct name is called Weisford speech, current onely in that City, & the County about.

(56) But Robert Fitz-Stephen thus aduanced, for his more assurance, beganne to raise a * Town at Carricke, making the place which nature had already fortified, much more by Art defensible. This entrie into Ireland being by him now made (vnder the name of Henry King of England) and the successe exceeding hope, Richard Strong-bow receiuing aduertisement from Dermot, and the new Lord of Weisford, of all occurrences; thought fitt, first to dispatch * some supplies to Fitz-Stephen, which about the beginning of May, vnder the conduct of Raimund le groſſe (a Gentleman of the Earles family) were accordingly sent: and after Raimund the Earle himselfe in the same yeere set forth: His Forces were about * two hundred men of Armes, and a thousand other Souldiers, with whom he came late to Anchor in the Bay of Waterford, vpon the Vigil of Saint Bartholomew, August 23. (the Irish name of Waterford) and upon the very next day tooke the City by force, and sacrificed the armed Inhabitants to the reuenge of Dermot, so the rather to make room, and security for themselves, to the exceeding terrour, and iust dismay of all about, as they who found, that howeouer the preence was to reuenge Dermot, the purpose was to seat the English for euer.

(57) But Dermot, Author of this calamity to his Nation, resolute in his purpose, in full complement of his Contract, doth openly in solemn manner bestow his promised daughter Eua, vpon the Conquerour in marriage, with his owne right hand giuing her in the Church: at which time, the famous Strong-bow did not celebrate his particular Wedding-day, but the indissoluble knot of the Irish allegiance to the English Soueraignie, with the same Ring which circled his Viues finger, affiancing that Iland to this our Country.

(58) The Marriage performed, it was far from the mind of the Earle to spend much time in reuels and feasts, but consults with his men of warre what was next to be done for the settling his Father in law King Dermot, and for finishing the Conquest which was now so happily begunne, in two severall parts of Ireland at once. Leaving therefore a sufficient Garrison to make good the places already gained, & to secure the lading of fresh supplies, he sets forward with his selected Companies, to whose victorious weapons the whole Realme lay open, so farre forth, that Rotherick himself was very well contented (notwithstanding his lately usurped, & swelling title of Monarch of Ireland) to hold himselfe within the bogs and fastenesses of his peculiar Realme, the wild, and mountainous Connaught; meane while, Strongbow keeps on his way ouer the bosome of Ireland to the principall City thereof, Dublin, taking in (as he marcheth) all the places about, and securing himselfe by pledges, of their loyalty, or otherwise, as he saw most fitt. In which journey, pleased with the delight and fertile situation of Kildare, he resolved there to settle his abode, and to erect a seate to his posterity.

The conquest of Dublin being speedily, and most happily achieved, not long after, Dermot Mac Murrough, Father in law to the Earle (whom the Irish for his affection to the English, call Dermot Ninn-gall, that is, Dermot the Strangers friend) breathed his last at Ferrydyng, (splenis derum.)

(59) The fame of these successes waisting ouer the Irish seas, and comming to the King, made him resolute to passe in person thither, that he might haue the honor of the Conquest; and not approving such forwardnes in the Earle, who (as some say) went against his expresse commandement, (and indeed * Giraldus, who liued at that time, calls his leaue no better then an Ironicalle leaue) and for that hee knew not to what insolvency such faire fortune might in time allure, as also for that they seemed to handle the Natives too rigorously; * thereupon hee forbids by his Proclamations, any vessel, to carry any thing out of his Dominions into Ireland, and commands all English to returne before Easter, and leaue off their attempts, or their estates in England should be seized for the King. By which Edict these affaires were brought into fearefull extremity, which was changed into better condition by the trauell of Heruicus de Monte Marisco, on the behalfe of the Earle, and the aduenturers, who finding the King in Glocestershire with an Army for Ireland, appeared his displeasure vpon these termes: That the King should haue the head City of the Kingdom, Dublin, with the adiacent Cantredes, with all the Coast townes and Castles, the rest to remaine to the Conquerours to hold of the King, and of his Heires, and so to be under his protection, as Subjects ought, and as they were before; which subiection it seemed to the King they ment to haue renounced.

(60) The Kings goodly Nauy lay in Milford haven, to which as hee iourned, hee thundered against the Welsh Nobility, comming to entertaine him, for suffering Strongbow to depart: At last being imbarke, he had a faire Gale which set him safe in Ireland with all his Forces at Waterford, where first hee commits to prison Robert Fitz-Stephen, whom the Citizens presented bound, hauing held him in custody, vnder color of doing good seruice, because hee had entred Ireland without the Kings particular leaue; yet soon after the King released him, but deprived him of weissford and the territories. Then takes he the hostages of such petty Kings, and principall persons of the Irish as repaired, dismissing them in honourable sort, meaning to winne them by gentle, and not exasperating courses; and marching through Offryrie to Dublin, he takes Rotherick the King of Connaughts homage by Hugh Lacie, and William Fitz-Aldein: lastly, at Dublin he kept his Christmas in Royall Rayle, which to behold, very many of the Irish Princes came thither.

(61) Mindfull now of his duty to God, the Iland being calme, and silent through the preence of such a mighty Monarch, the most noble King of England, and triumphant of Ireland (as mine Author (Ileth him) cauleth a Synode to be holden at Castles for reformation of the Irish Church, where amongst sundry other constitutions, to which the Irish Clergy did willingly submit, it was decreed, That all the Church-lands, and their possessions should be altogether free from the exaction of secular men, & that from thenceforth, all Diuine things should be handled in euery part of Ireland in such sort, as the Church of England handleth them. For (saith the Constitution) "it is most iust, and meete, that as Ireland hath by Gods mercy obtained a Lord, and King out of England, so also that from thence, they should receive a better forme of life, and manners, then here- tofore they vfed."

(62) The King continuing his politicke ieaousies, and thinking Strongbow to be as yet too great, draws from his dependency Raimund, Atlo Cogan, William Makarel, and other of the best Capitaines, & makes them his owne by bounty. But before hee could fully establish that Kingdome (the inseparable euil fate thereof, which would neuer suffer it to enioy the blessed benefite of exact ciuility) other affaires which hee esteemed more necessary, call him away, and therefore hauing left Hugh Lacie at Dublin, hee sets saile for England vpon Easter Monday, and landed happily at Saint Dauids in Pembrooke-shire, from whence with all speed hee posteth into Normandie.

(63) In Normandy there attended for his arriual two Cardinals, sent as Legates at his owne request, for taking his purgation concerning the death of the Archbishop of Canterbury, whereof, vpon oath that hee was no way consenting to that cruel, and sacrilegious reuenge, and declaring withall his infinite sorrow for hauing in his anger giuen occasion by rash words for others to doe that deepe, and giuing further oath to performe enioined penances, he was by them absolved. The condition of his absolutions were, That hee should at his owne charge maintaine two hundred Souldiers for an whole yeere for defence of the holy land. That hee should suffer Appelles to be made freely. That hee should reuoke all customes introduced to the preiudice of the Churches liberty. That hee should restore and make vp the possessions of the Church of Canterbury. That hee should freely receiue all such as were in banishment for Becketts cause, &c. Not long after Thomas was canonized by Pope Alexander, and so not onely the victorie clearly giuen him against King Henry, but a triumph also.

(64) Now beganne the wombe of rebellion, and vnnaturall conspiracies to disclose the mischiefes which were ordained to exercise this right redoubted King and Warriour, hatched here at home by the malice (some say) of Eleanor his Queene, at such time as hee was absent in Ireland, so that as * one writes writes, God stirred up the Kings owne bowells against himselfe. Causes of this vnhappy diffention, there were many: First a Queene and Wife, violentie vindicative for wrong done vnto her Bed by the King, who was immoderate addicted to variety of lous: then Ambition in an euill-naturd Child, and lastlie, pernicious Actors and instruments, who, for their owne ends, nourished this cursed mischief; so as if we should out of our flories recapitulate the fullall occasions taken by the sonne against the father, wee should rather shew you the colours, then the causes: For none of these causes which his Son pretended, seemed great enough with men that feare God, to beare out such continuall diuisions as followed.

(65) The head of this conspiracy was verie great, and iustly verie terrible: for on the side of King Henry the sonne, there were the Kings of France and Scotland, * Richard and Geffrey, two yonger sonnes of the King of England, whom by their mothers persuasions they forooke, to follow the yonger King; David the Scottish Kings brother, Philip Earle of Flanders, (a Peere of France, and a potent Prince), Matthew Earle of Bologna, Theobald Earle of Blais, Hugh Earle of Chester, Thomas Earle of Leicester, Hugh Bigot Earle of Norfolke, Roger Mowbray, and other great ones, in great numbers, so as nothing seemed wanting, but onely a good cause, which (such as it was) Queene Eleanor, like an Alecco, kept alive, so much as lay in her, with perpetuall fomentations. And indeed the scope of these confederats did require no lesse a combination, it being to depole the Father, whom it pleased them (for countenance of their vngodly armes) to repute no King, because hee had crowned his sonne.

(66) Though nothing then could come more greuous, to the bleeding heart of a most louing father, then such a warre; yet not to bee vnprouided, hee (like a fouldier) prepares himselfe, when faire meanes faile, and found multitudes ready to liue, and die with him; the indignitie of the vnnaturall reuolt, did so much inflame all honest courages, which acknowledged him their Soueraigne.

(67) The particular accidents of the wars would fill a volume. At one time Normandie, Guien, and Britaine were invaded by the confederats in France, and at the same time Cumberland by the Scots. But the King of England had friends in all those parts, and himselfe hearing that Vernuil was * besieged by the French King in person, hee beganne at last to kindle, hauing like a sleeping Lion, sitten still all that while, and (for that the place had, vpon parole, agreed to render if aid came not by a day) hee arriued to their succour within the time, * sending King Lewis word that hee should gette him forth of Normandie with speed, or he would without faile, come, and see how hee did vpon that verie day. Lewis, meaning nothing less then to put his owne Crowne in danger, while hee sought one for his sonne in law, and therefore in all the warre-time, would neuer set vp his rest vpon a battell, but willing otherwise to doe to King Henry the father, all the harme hee could, by countenancing the faction, and supporting the reuolted malecontents with his best meanes, and knowing King Henry was a slower and terrible Prince when he came indeede to fight, immediately raised his siege, and with as much hast as hee might, abandoned the place * leaving his Camp, tents, and warlike prouisions behind, and retired into France.

(68) And though King Henry, beginning now indeede to shake his dreadfull sword, had many faile daies of his enemies, mixt with some losses both of men and other strengths, though not great, nor many, in regard of the ouerthrowes which on his behalfe were giuen: For that in Britaine his forces had in battell vanquished Hugh Earle of Chester, & Ralph de Foulers, and slaine about one thousand and fife hundred of their army; & in England, Reignald Earle of Cornwall, and Richard de Lucie, had in bloudie battell * ouerthrowne the insolent Earle of Leicester, and

* entered the towne of Leicester by force; and that he had the persons of the said * Hugh Lupus Earle of Chester, Ralph de Fulgiers, and verie many other prisoners of especiall note and Nobility: yet Lewis the French King mouing a parole, the father desirous to vie the good fortune of war, to reclaim his rebels, was so willing to make peace, that hee might seeme to haue outgone expectation in the qualitie of his offers, but through such wicked persuasions, as were vfed, preuailed not.

(69) A violent firebrand in this diuision, was Robert Earle of Leicester, being matched with a Ladie no lesse proud, and stomachous then himselfe; who at this meeting, was not contented to haue affronted King Henry the father, on the behalfe of his yonger Lord, and Master the sonne, but (after many words of reproach) is said to haue laid his daring hand vpon his sword, with purpose to haue stricken the King, had hee not been with-holden: (and where such spirits had to doe, it is easie to gesse what kinds of counsell were like to be embraced and pursued,) hauing forsaken the father, not for that the others cause was more honest, but for that (saith Thomas Walsingham) the father King, labouring to enlarge the regall power, sought to set his foote vpon the neckes of the proud and haughtie.

(70) But God, who ment to chastise the King, and not to deliuer him vp into his enemies hands, destroyed those hopes, that moued the sonnes to their vnnaturall attempts; for it was not long after, when newes came into Normandy, that his faithfull friends and seruants, * Richard de Lucie, and Humfrey de Bohun his Constable of England, together with the powers of Reignald Earle of Cornwall the Kings vnle, Robert Earle of Glocester, and William Earle of Arundell, not farre from Burie, courageously encountered with the Earle of Leicester, and his * Flemings, of whom about * fife thousand were slaine, or taken, and among the prisoners was the Earle himself, and * his Amazonian Countesse, whose persons at his commandement were not long after, brought ouer into Normandie.

(71) This * great victorie and other good success, did so much aduantage the King, that Lewis beginning to distrust the enterprize, fought for fixe monethes truce for himselfe, and had it granted; but because there were yet in England, two principall men, * the Earle of Norfolke, and Roger Mowbray, which held out; hauing Leicester for their Randenou, and seat of warre, with no small numbers of partakers, notwithstanding that Geffrey (the Elect of Lincolne, the Kings base sonne) had taken two of Mowbrays Cattles, and done other good seruice for his Lord and Father, the truce serued the enimie for no other purpose but to breath, and to repaire himselfe.

(72) The father (of whom Lewis said, that hee seemed not to goe, but to flie, he went with such celerity from one place to Kingdome to another) in the meane while, recouers Xaints from Richard his violent sonne, weakening that partie by so much, and would haue weakened it farr more, but that aduertisements came post, declaring such matter, as made him speede into Normandie.

(73) Thither * came vnto him out of England, Richard (the Elect of Winchester) sent with all hast by the Kings Iustitaries, to lay open vnto him, the dangerous estate wherin the Realme at that time stood. For after that Philip Earle of Flanders had solemnely sworne to invade England, in supportation of yonger Henries quarrell, sundrie forces arriuing and ioining with Hugh Bigot Earle of Norfolke, had taken and spoiled the Citie of Norwich, and done otherwise much harme, whereby the yonger King and his faction had taken great encouragement, as if the die of warre were turned, and allwell the yonger King as the Earle of Flanders, were come with forces to the Coasts, there to transport for England: * Moreouer, Robert Earle Ferrers of Derby (who was slaine from

(75) The next day he took his journey towards Canterbury, where (as it appeareth) the residue of his penance enjoined him at his Absolution, was to be performed. For, besides the fore-mentioned conditions, the Legates enjoined him (saith the Author of Becket's life) some other thing secretly, which came not to our knowledge; yea the Legates themselves wrote in their owne letters, that hee then promised to do (voluntarily, if yee list to beleue it) some things which was not fit for them to lay open in writing. And well might they be ashamed thereof; but if it were so vnfit to be written, how vnfit was it to be imposed on such a Soueraigne Prince? what it was, let Housden report. The King comming towards the Church, where the late Archbishop was buried, clad all in wollen, went three miles barefooted, informing, that the very ground where hee went, was bloody, as was evidently seene, much blood running from his tender feet which were cut with the hard stones. Neither yet was this the worst; for after all this, He receiued Discipline at the hands of the Bishops, of a great many Priests, and of the Monks. Gervasius names Abbots also, whereby appears, that euery seuerall fort were to haue a hand in that seruice. Matthew Paris can tell you more plainly what that Discipline was: viz. he receiued the Discipline of rods on his bare flesh, receiving of euery religious man, (a great multitude of them being there gathered) 3. or 5. strokes a peece: whence we may easily beleue, Baronius and his * Author spake within compass, who acknowledge hee receiued 80. lathes. To such height was the Papall tyranny and pride grown towards those of whom God had said expressly, Touch not mine Anointed.

(76) Yet some Monkes of that age, attribute the happy and great successe which ensued, to the reconciliation which King Henry thus made with God for the blood of Thomas, because it pleased God to deliuer his enemy William King of Scots into the hands of his souldiers about that very time, & did also with stormes beat backe into France his disobedient sonne the young King, being now vnder saile for England, scattering the whole Fleet, and almost sinking it with tempest:

(77) The Kings other actions till his next returne into Normandy, which was not long after, (because Lewis King of France, and his sonne in law the young King Henry, the head to which all this putrified humour drew, with the Earle of Flanders had laid a strong siege to the City of Rouen) * Thomas Walsingham comprehends in these few wordes; He tamed his Rebels, put his enemies to flight, seized on their fortresses. And so hauing in a manner miraculously quieted the Realme, hee takes with him the King of Scotland, the Earles of Leicester and Chester, with other his chiefe Prisoners * (whom hee after wards first imprisoned at Cain in Normandy, & then at Faleis) but leauing his seditious wife behind him vnder straight custody, hee arriues with his puifance in Normandy, which being vnder tooode in the Confederates Campe, the same * brake vp, and first setting fire on all the engines of warre, retreated into France in such sort, that the English souldiers laid hold vpon much munition and warlike furniture. Roger Housden (a very sure Author) saith * that the confederates had onely besieged Rouen vpon one side, and that Lewis hearing that the victorie was to King Henry was within Rouen, did first send away the weake, and worst of his Armie, and then deceiuing the English with a solemne promise of returning the next day, to enter into a conference with the King about making a final agreement, did depart; so that Housden aggravates the dishonour of the retreat, with the note of faith-breach.

(78) Let the greatness and felicity of this King bee now but slightly looked vpon, and it will appear, that no Prince of those times was hitherto so much bound to God for manifold fauours as hee. The King and power of Manifol, after so many attempts with the young King of England, and all their forces, flying at his presence without any stroke stricken, the valiant king of Scotland prisoner, and the chieftest of his Rebels vnder his foote, England assured, Scotland dismaied, Ireland retained, Wales ministering souldiers, Normandy in possession, and all the coasting Regions, Britaine, Angion, Poitou, Main, Tourain, Limousin, Gascogne, Guien, &c. from thence as farre as the Mountains which separate Spain from France, vnder his dominion; and the blessing of Peace shortly after ensuing, vpon such termes as himselfe could reasonably wish, made him like another Salomon to bee sought vnto: his Wisdome and Magnificence being in such high credite through the Christian World, that the Kings of Castile and Nauarre chose him sole Arbitrator in their debate, which to both their contentment he most wisely determined; and then * at one time in his Palace at Westminster were seene together, the Ambassadors of Manuel Emperour of Constantinople, of Fredericke Emperour of Romans, of * William Archbishop of Triers in Germany, (a mighty Prince) of the Duke of Saxony, and of Philip Earle of Flanders. Moreover he had the government of France for a time, the Kingdom of Ierusalem offered him, but refused, and two of his daughters married to the two Kings * of Castile and Sicilie.

(79) There was first therefore a truce taken betwixt the three Kings, Lewis and the two Henries; wherein Richard (who stood out) was left to his Fathers prosecution, who seeing himselfe thus destitute after many flashes of preparation to resist, and great conflicts with himselfe, put himselfe most humbly into his Fathers mercy, and throwing himselfe * with teares at his feet, obtained the pardon hee begd, and a full restitution to his most inward grace and fauour. A most christian, fatherly, wife & happy Act; for Richard ouercome with this vnexpected and incredible goodnes, neuer desisted till hee had brought the young King to a finall attone-

ment, armes being laid apart vpon all hands. The chief points of that wished peace were: 1. That Henry the young King with Richard and Geffrey his brethren should returne, freed from all oathes of confederation, to the King their Fathers obedience, as to their Lord and Father. 2. That Prisoners should be set at large without ranfome on all hands. 3. That William King of Scots, the Earle of Leicester and Chester, Ralph de Fulgiers, & other, who had compounded for their ranfome, before this conclusion, should haue no benefite of this exemption. 4. That King Henry the Father should take assurance of loyalty toward him by hostage, or oath of such as were charged. 5. That King Henry the son should ratifie that Grant which his Father the King had made to his son Iohn, of some Castles, & yerely rents in England, &c. The Scale it selfe, wherewith the young king made this mentioned Ratification, we haue here annexed.

(80) Touching King William of Scotland, his fore-mentioned compounding: our Historians all agree not, * some saying more, * some lesse: but * Hecfor Boetius (a Scottish Historian of some credite with that Nation) writes; 1. That King William was to pay 100000. l. Striueling for his ranfome, the one half in present coin, the other 50000. l. vpon time. 2. That for assurance of that summe the Earldomes of Northumberland, Cumberland & Huntingdon should rest in mortgage. 3. That K. William should moue no warre against England for the retention of those lands. 4. That, for the more security of the premises, the Castles of Berwick, Edenburgh, Roxburgh & Striueling should be deliuered to the English.

(81) In the meane while, King Henry according to Couenants, discharged out of captiuitie nine hundred sixty and nine men of Arms, taken in thole late warres; and King Henry the sonne discharged about one hundredth; and hauing accomplished whatsoeuer might content or secure his Father, they prepared for England, where the ioiois letters of their comming written by the Father, had begotten great and longing expectations in the subjects, which hee did, (saith Paris) That whom the generall danger of warre had afflicted, the common gladnesse might recomfort. In their trauaile thitherward the confidence was such vpon this fresh reconciliation, that one Chamber and table serued both, for whom before one Kingdom was not wide enough. They landed at Portsmouth vpon Friday, 20. of May, 1175.

(82) The face of England at this present, was like that of a quiet skie and sea, no blast, no billow, no appearing signe of discontentment; which the better to continue, King Henry the Father accompanied with the King his sonne, omitted no office of a iust and prudent Gouverneur, visiting a great part of his Realme in person, consulting, ordering and enacting such lawes and courtes, as might most establish the good of Peace. Hence it came, that at London both the Kings were present in a Synode, in which Richard lately chosen Archbishop of Canterbury, did publish (* with the Kings assent) certain Canons for the better government of the Church of England, beginning thus; At the true fountaine of all happy rule, that is to say, at the honour of God, and establishment of Religion & Discipline, &c. amongst the rest, this one Canon in especial words is enacted, both by authority of the King & Synode, (and indeed worthy for euer to bee in force) That euery Patrone taking reward for any presentation, should for euer loofe the Patronage thereof. And the same Kings not long after being at Woodstocke, in accomplishment of such holy purposes, by aduise of the Clergy provided men to such Bishopricks, Abbacies, and principall cures as were vacant, where King Henry the Father forgot not his true friend Iohn of Oxford, whom he preferred to the See of Norwich.

(83) From hence comming to Turke, he set those parts in peace, whither William King of Scots repaireing, sundry matters of importance were handled betwene the two Kings: as likewise afterward at Windsor (where the King had called a great assembly of the Lords Spirituall and Temporall) Robert King of Commanche in Ireland (at the suite of his Ambassadors, the Archbishop of Thamoin and Tommund, & others of that nation, subjects to Rotherick) was receiued into protection & fauour, and became Tributary: K. Henry being vnwilling * to fill him with hooke of gold, which in warring vpon Ireland hee should seem to do. In an other Parliament, not long after at Northampton, he caused England to be diuided into six circuits, & to each Circuit three Iusticiars Itinerants deputed, and allowed to giue his lawes more free passage, as also the better to secure himself he threw to the carth sundry * Castles which had bin formerly kept against him, as Leicester, Huntington, Walton, Groby, Stutesbury, &c. and had the rest both in his English and in his French Dominions committed to his disposition.

(84) The young King * about these times discovered fresh alienations in his mind against his Father; who yet dissembling all, did arme notwithstanding vpon the defensive, and replenished both England and Normandie with Garrisons, which drew the sonne the sooner to come in.

(85) But the old King not vnwilling perhaps (left the Brethren concord might proue no better then a conspiracy against the Father) that his warlike Children should contend, * did nourish debate among them: Certaine it is, that to diuert the warre from himselfe, hee appealed his sonne the King with an encrease of maintenance for himselfe, amounting in the whole to an hundredth pounds Annuum by the day, and ten pounds of the same money for his wife the Queene: and whereas Alice (daughter of Lewis then King of France, who was married at three yeares of age to Richard (second sonne of King Henry) when hee was but leuer, and now demanded of King Henry the Father, to the intent that Richard her husband might enjoy her, the old King who was

* suspected to have deflowered her, for that time shifted of the delivery of her person, in such sort that peace was not hindered thereby.

(86) But while the young King by his Fathers * instigation fought by force to constrain young Richard to do homage to him for Aquitaine, and King Henry the Father for the same cause commanded Geoffrey his third son, Duke of Britaine (whom some for his extraordinary perfiduousness in this service toward his Father, and manifold sacrilege, calls the * Child of Perdition) to aide and assist his said elder brother; while also the jealous Father (out of the strife of his sonnes) fought his own safety, and in nourishing it, had by the treachery of the said sonnes bin twice endangered, and had at both times been wonderfully preferred; and while the young King by profound dissimulations, plotted to bring both his Father and Brother Richard into subjection; behold the hand of God by taking away the young King at Martell not farre from Linoges, where his Father lay at siege, gave an end to this odious, fowle and intricate contention.

(87) Thus was his life cut off like a Weauers threed (say * Authors) who had by dying cut of the hope of many: But what fouer his life was, which God thus shortened at his age of twentie and eight yeeres; certainly his death was not inglorious, but worthy to be set out in Tables at large as a pattern to disobedient Children: for his Father refusing to visite him (fearing his owne life,) but sending his Ring in signe of forgiveness; the dying Prince most humbly with floods of teares kissing the same, made a most sorrowfull confession of his finnes, and feeling death approach, would needs be drawne (as an unworthy sinner) out of his owne bed, and laid vpon another, strewed with ashes, where his soule departed in a most penitent manner from his body; which being related to the Father, hee fell vpon the earth, weeping bitterly, and (like another David for his Absolon) mourned very much, O quam nefandum est, saith "one most grauely: O how hainous a thing it is for "sons to persecute the father! for neither the sword of the "fighter nor the hand of an enemy, did avenge the fathers "wrong: but a fever and a flux with excoriation of the "bowels. His body was buried (by his owne desire) at Roan; (which yet was not done without trouble, as if the factions, of which hee was the cause in his life, did by a kind of Fate, not forsake him being dead; for the Citizens of Mauns having entered it, they of Roan without menaces, and the fathers expresse commandement, could not obtaine it, who thereupon was taken vp againe,) but his wife Queene Margaret was sent backe into France, and his surviving sonnes were once againe reduced to due obedience, nor any enemy daring to appeare.

(88) Who would not haue thought, that this stirring Prince, should haue had opportunitie to end his daies in peace and glorie? but it was otherwise ordained by God, and ancient writers hold, hee was principallie scourged, for being drawne, by seeming reasons of State, to put off an holy enterprise, the occasion whereof, was laid as it were at his foote. For Heraclius Patriarcke of Hierusalem, drawne with the supereminence fame of King Henries wildome, valour, riches, and puissance, traualled from thence into England, where, * at Clerkenwell by London, in an assemblie of the States purposefully called, the king made knowne to them: That Pope Lucius had by earnest letters, commended the lamettable state of the Holie-land, and the Patriarcke Heraclius vnto him: That Heraclius (there present) had stirred compassion, and teares, at the rehearsal of the tragically afflictions of the Easterne world, and had brought with him (for memorable * signes, that the suite was by common consent of the Countrey) the Keyes of the places of Christs Natinitie, Passion, and Resurrection; of Davids Tower, and of the holy Sepulchre; and the humble offer of the Kingdom of Hierusalem, with the Ensigne or Standard of the Kingdom, as * duilie belonging to him, who was right heire thereunto, to wit, the sonne of Geoffrey Earle of Anion, whose brother Fulke was king of Hierusalem.

(89) Neutrality, (the King hauing, at left-wile formally, adured the Lords to aduise him, that which should be most for his soules health) it was thought fit, to aide the cause with money, but not to employ his person, nor the person of any child hee had, which was the Patriarcks last request; and thereupon (to the vnpeakeable griefe of the said Patriarcke, and of the whole Christiantie of the East) hee refused the said Kingdome, and abandoned as noble an occasion of immortall renowne, as euer any King of England had been offered; but gave leaue * to all such as would, to take vpon them the Crosse and seruice. This Heraclius is hee who dedicated the Temple Church in London, as by this Inscription ouer the Church doore in the Stone-worke doth appeare.

ANNO AB INCARNATIONE DOMINI M.C.LXXXV. DEDICATA HEC ECCLIESIA IN HONOREM BEATE MARIE A DNO BRACLIO DEI GRATIA SANCTER SVRRECTIONIS ECCLESIE PATRIARCHA II IDVS FEBRVRII Q. RAM ANATIM PETENTIBVS DE INVICTA S. PENITENTIA LX DIES INDVLST.

(90) Thus the sorrowfull Patriarcke being dismissed (not forgetting as * some doe write, to thunder against the King for abandoning the cause) brought back nothing but discomfort and despair, the Westerne Princes (by the Diuels malicious Arts) being wrapt and knotted in mutuall suspitions and quarrells indetermined, whereupon shortly after, ensued, with the losse of Ierusalem, the captivity of Guido King thereof, and of innumerable Christians besides; whom Sultan Saladin, Prince of the Mussulmans or Saracens, to the griefe and disgrace of all the Christian world, did vanquish.

(91) But King Henries mind was more fixed on settling the state of his already-poffessed Kingdomes, and therefore in a great Parliament, held at Oxford, (vnto which came Rhefus and David, Kings of South-Wales and North-Wales, with other their chiefe Nobles, which al did there sweare fealtie to the King) hee being desirous to aduance his sonne John (whom hee exceedingly loued, and commonly in sport, hee called Sans-terre) hauing assured vpon him certaine Lands and Rents in England and Normandie, did there verie solemnly giue him also the title & Kingdome of Ireland; for, (besides the foresaid Bull of Pope Adrian the fourth, who for signe of inuestiture had also sent a * ring of gold, which were laid vp in the Records at Winchester) Giraldus (who liued in that age) tells vs (to omitte what hee writes of one Gurguntius that Guillelmus King of Ireland, was tributarie to the famous Arthur: that Baion (whence (saith hee) the Irish came) was at that present vnder King Henrie the second; and that the Irish Princes had voluntarily submitted themselves, as vnto him who by the * Law of a Sociall warre, was become their Soueraigne. But that Author had not seene belike, or did not remember (when thus he went about to proue a legal right in the King) what others write of * Egfrides vngodly spoiles in Ireland, or of * Edgars Charter, in which is said to bee contained, that hee had vnder his rule the chiefe City of Ireland Dublin, and the greatest part of the kingdome also. But King Henrie strengthening his other rights with Grants of the Popes, Adrian, and Alexander, obtained also of Yrbane the third (for Lucius the third, who was Alexanders successor, would not gratifie the King therein) that it should bee lawfull for him, to crowne which of his sonnes hee would, King of Ireland, to whom hee sent a crowne of Feathers woven with gold, in all their Grants referring to the Roman See, the Peters pence, and rights; whereupon the King gaue the same to his sonne John, whose Coronation (tong with the like before) his father only did delay, at such time as two Cardinales offered to celebrate that solemnitie.

(92) At Windsor therefore his father giuing him the * Order of knight-hood (at which time hee was about * twelve yeeres old) sent him forthwith into Ireland, where the Arch-bishop of Dublin and the State, entertained him, but (by reason of such parsimonie toward his souldiers as was vsed) hee returned the same yeere without doing much, but not without hauing wasted the most part of his Armie, in skirmishes with the Irish. His Seile in his scale of Ireland (though Houden faith, his father made him Regem, a king) was onely, Sigillum Iohannis filij regis Anglie Domini Hibernie, Lord of Ireland.

(93) King Henrie, hearing now that his martiall sonne, Earle Richard, had fortified in Poitou against him, and vanquished Geoffrey Earle of Britaine, * prepares a puissant armie, vpon terror whereof, Richard came in, rendering vp Poitou to his mother Elenor, (whose inheritance it was) at his fathers commandement. The same yeere wherein the West was thus desiled with vnnatural diuisions, the East was likewise polluted with the cursed Apostasie of one Richard de S. Albane (whom wee shame to thinke, was English) who renouncing the Christian beleefe (vpon the Patriarcks discomfortable returne) became a principall Commander vnder the Sultan of Babylon, Saladine, whom the Christians drave, with losse and slaughter of his armie, from Hierusalem. But on the other side, reuenge of disobedience still pursued Geoffrey, sonne of King Henrie, who was in a * Torment at Paris troden to death vnder the horse feete. A miserable end, and a fearful.

(94) About which times, betweene the French and English all things stood vnstirred, now warre, then peace, and warre againe, by reason that Philip (who had been crowned King some yeeres before, during the life of Lewis) challenging the custodie of Arthur, the Posthumus sonne, and heire of Geoffrey Earle of Britaine, and sometimes one thing, and sometime another, could not haue his will: Whiles Earle Richard turning to Philip against his Father, but obtaining a truce for two yeeres, such amity (if there be any amity among mighty Princes) grew between king Philip and Earle Richard, heire apparant of England and Normandie, &c. that one bed and boord serued both. The Father perplexed, calls his sonne home, who pretending many griefes, as the detention of Alice his Spoule, the doubt of disinherison, and other things, stood out againe, and againe after a while submits to his Father. Then bursts forth Philip into Armes; and things so standing, the heauy newes of Ierusalem lost, flew into Christendom. When this City was formerly recovered by Godfrey of Boheim, an Yrbane was Pope, a Fredericke was Emperour, an Heraclius Patriarcke; so now when it was lost, an Yrbane was Pope, a Fredericke was Emperour, and an Heraclius Patriarcke.

(95) Vpon these newes Henry and Philip meet, and for the honour of God, laying downe displeasure, in presence of William Archbishop of Tyre, at which time some say a Crosse appeared in the aire, take vpon them, as Souldiers of Christ, the badge of the Crosse, and there the better to distinguish themselves, it was agreed that the * French should weare read Crosse, the English White, and the Flemish Greene. And this determination was seconded with warlike preparations, leuies of money, and institution of martiall Discipline: all which notwithstanding nothing went forward.

(96) At Richard began the breach of this honourable confederation, who taking reuenge vpon certaine Rebels of his in Poitou, who brooked not his hard hand; one mischiefe drew another, and at the last both the Kings of England and France became parties to the quarrell, greatly against the minde of

K. Henry, whose heart was firmly fetted (as it seems) to reuenge the cause of Christ vpon Sultan Saladine: for that in his * answer to the Patriarch of Antioch, imploring aide, he concludes, That among other Princes himselfe, and sonne, reiecting this "worlds glory, and despiing all pleasures whatsoever, and setting behind, all things which were of "this World, would in their owne person with "their whole Forces by the fauour of the Lord "speedily visite him. And sure the state of those parts required it, Saladine hauing slaine many of the Knights Templars and Nobles, and about thirty thousand footmen, with innumerable other in Cities and Townes by him subdued. Among all which grievous accidents, we cannot (to reason lower thereby with sweet) omit one noble protestation made by the chiefe crossed Lords, Philip Earle of Flanders, the Earle of Blois, and other, who being required to "take parts, made answer: That they would not "contrary to their promise to God, put armour on, "against any Christian, till they had done their deu-

"uore against Saladine.

(97) In the treaties therefore between Henry and Philip, the demands of Philip on the behalfe of Richard were such, and so vnwise for the King (as that all his subjects should sweare fealty to Richard during the Fathers life, but yet reseruing their allegiance to the Father) that Richard apparently fell off, and became Liegeman for Normandie, &c. to Philip King of France; and at a new Treaty (by mediation of a Cardinall Legate) the demands of Philip being more hard then before, as that King Henry should not onely settle the Kingdome vpon Richard, but take John also with him into Palestine, or that otherwise Richard would not goe (being iealous of his brothers grace with his Father) Henry would consent to none of those insolent propositions, but disdaining to seeme to be enforced, they betooke them selues on all sides to their swords.

(98) The effect whereof was, that former good fortunes forsaking King Henry, hee sustained many losses by the Armies of King Philip and Richard, & was driuen out of Mentz in Mauns (the city where he was born, & which hee loued above all other places) by firing of the Suburbs before the enemy came, being casually consumed, hee was glad to yeeld to such conditions as it pleased Philip to prescribe. It is written "that at the meeting of these two Kings, the skie being cleare, a thunderbolt stroke betweene them, and after a little pause coming together againe, it thundered more terribly, so that Henry had faine off his horse, but that his people sustained him; whereupon hee came presently to an end, though it were to his vnpeakeable griefe; his Kingly heart being vsed to giue, and not to take conditions.

(99) Fearefull was the speech which King Henrie, when hee abandoned Mentz by reason of the fire, vttered against Richard; which was, That sith hee "had taken from him that day the thing that hee "most loued in this world, he would requite him, "for after that day hee would deprime him of that "thing which in him should best please a Child, to "wit, his Heart. But after the peace concluded, (vpon mediation) between the sides, another thing struck neerer; for finding the name of his sonne John first in the Catalogue of the Conspirators against him in that action, hee bitterly cursed the howre of his birth, laying Gods curse and his vpon his sonnes, which hee would neuer recall, for any perswasion of the Bishoppes and others: but coming to Chinon fell there grievously sicke, and feeling death approach, hee caused himselfe to be borne into the Church before the Altar, where after humble confession, and sorrow for his finnes, hee departed his life.

(100) It shal not (in contempt of humane glory) be forgotten, that this puissant Monarch being dead his people presently left him, and fell to spoile all hee had, leauing him naked, of whom * one saith trulle "and happie as to fee three of her fonnes, aduanced to the Crowne, and so vnhappy as to fee two of them in their graues: for the liued till King Johns time.

His Issue.

(102) William, the eldest fonne and first child of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor his wife, was borne before his father was King, and while hee was but Duke of Normandy, in the eighteenth yeere of the raigne of King Stephen, 1152. and the fourth yeere after, (his father beeing then King, and in the second yeere of his raigne) the Nobilitie of England fware vnto him their fealties, as to the heire apparant of the Kingdome, at the Caffe of Wallingford in Berkeshire; but he decaied the yeere following, being the third of his fathers raigne, and the fifth of his owne age 1156. He was buried in the Monastery of Reading at the feete of his great Grandfather, King Henrie
the first.

(103) Henrie, the second fonne of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, beeing borne the last of Febru-arie 1156. was their heire apparant, after the death of his brother William; was Duke of Normandie, Earle of Arion and Maigne; and was crowned King of England, at Westminster, by Roger Arch-bishop of York, the fifteenth of Iulie 1170. His wife was Margaret, daughter of Lewis the Tonger, King of France, married to him at Duburgh in Normandy, the second of Nouember 1160. crowned Queene at Wincheſter, by Ratvocke of Warwicke Arch-bishop of Roan, the 21. of Nouember 1163, and furiuing him was remarried to Bela, King of Hungarie: He died without issue, before his father, at Marcell in Touraine, the eleuenth of Iulie, the twentie fixe yeere of his fathers raigne 1182. and was buried in the Church of our Lady at Roan.

(104) Richard, the third fonne of King Henrie, and Queene Eleanor, was borne at Oxford, (in the Kings Pallace there, called Beau-Mount), in September the fourth yeere of his fathers raigne 1157. He proued a Prince of great valor, and was therefore furnamed in French Coeur-de-Lion; in English Lions-Heart:
hee was created Earle of Poytiau, and had the whole Dutchie of Aquitaine, for which he did his homage to King Lewis the Tonger of France, in the eighteenth yeere of his fathers raigne 1170. yet afterward he conceiued some discontentment against his father, and maintained warres vpon him, but was reconcil-ed againe into his loue, and fucceeded him in his Kingdome.

(105) Geffrey, the fourth fonne of King Henrie, and of Queene Eleanor, was borne the twentie third of September, in the fifth yeere of his fathers raigne 1159. Hee married Constance daughter and heire of Conan Duke of Britaine, and in her right was Duke of Britaine, and did his homage to his brother Henry for the fame Dutchie, and receiued the homages of the Barrons of the fame: hee died at Paris, in the thirtie two yeere of his fathers raigne 1186. in the nineteenth of Auguft, and is buried in the quire of our Ladies Church there: hee had issue Arthur Duke of Britaine, borne after his fathers decaie, the heire apparant of King Richard, and by some fupposed to bee made away by King John; and alfo Eleanor called the Damfell of Britaine, who died in prifon in the raigne of King Henrie the third.

(106) Philip, the fifth fonne of King Henrie, and Queene Eleanor, may bee miftrufte, to be miftaken by Antiquaries of our time, as mifunder-ftanding the ancient writers, who mentioning the birth of Philip the Kings fonne, might by good likelihood, be thought to meane, Philip fonne of Lewis the Yonger King of France, who was borne about this time, and was after King of the fame Countrey. But Mr. Thomas Talbot, an exact traualier in genealogies, hath not onely fet him downe in this place, amongst the children of this King, but alfo warranteth the fame, to bee done with good authoritie: howfoeuer, it is apparent, his life was verie fhort.

(107) John, the fixth and yongest fonne of King Henrie, and Queene Eleanor, was borne in the thirteenth yeere of his fathers raigne, in Anno 1166.
hee was iclinglie furnamed by his father Sans terre,
in English without Land, becaufe hee was borne laft, as if there had beene nothing left for him: Notwithftanding foone after, hee was created Earle of Mortaine, and had more-ouer by degrees, the Earle-domes of Cornwall, and Glouceſter, the Counties of Derby and Lancaster, the Honors of Wallingford and Nottingham, the Castles of Tikkhill, Marlborow, and Ludgarſhall, with many other great Seigniories, and (about them all) was alfo Lord of Ireland, and at the laft fucceeded his brother Richard in all his Dominions and was King of England.

(108) Matilda, the eldest daughter of King Henry, and Queene Eleanor, borne in the third yeere of her fathers raigne, married to Henrie, furnamed the Lion Duke of Saxonie; Lothar that died yong, Otho the fourth German Emperour, and William borne at Wincheſter, progenitor of the Dukes of Brunſwicke, who bare for their Armes, the Coat of England, with the two Lions, as King Henrie his Grandfather bare, before the match with Queene Eleanor, and Matilda married to Geffrey Earle of Perch: Shee furiuing him, and died in the first yeere of the reign of her brother King Richard, and was buried by her husband, in the Church of S. Blafe at Brunſwicke.

(109) Eleanor, the second daughter of King Henrie, and Queene Eleanor, was borne at Roan in Normandy, in the eight yeere of her fathers raigne, 1162.
She was married to Alfonſe, the ninth of that name, furnamed the Good, King of Caſtile in Spain, and had issue by him Sanchez, that died in his infancy: Per-dinando

dinando that died in his youth, Henry King of Caſtile after his Father, Blanche Queene of France, wife to King Lewis the 8. and mother of Saint Lewis.
Berengar married to Alfonſe king of Lion: Præca Queene of Portugall, and Eleanor wife of Tames king of Aragdon.

(110) Ioane, the third and yongest daughter of king Henry, and Queene Eleanor his wife, was borne at the City of Angiers in France, in the month of October, the 13. yeare of her Fathers raigne, which was the yeere of our Lord, 1166. when thee was eleuen yeeres of age; thee was with great honour conueied to the City of Palermo, and there married to William the second of that name, king of Sicill, Duke of Apulia, and Prince of Capua, vpon Sunday the 13. day of Februarie, 1177. and was crowned Queene the fame day at the fame place. Shee had a fonne by him named Boamund, whom his Father when hee was returned from his Chriftning, created Duke of Apulia: but the child died first, and the Father after, leauing no issue. And the furiuing, married againe, and was the third wife of Raimund the fourth of that name, Earle of Thoulouze, by him thee had Issue Raimund the laft Earle of that houfe, Bertrand Lord of Branguell, Montelore, and Salutac, and a daughter married to Berald of Elbeine, Prince of Oreng.

His Naturall Issue.

(111) William the Naturall fonne of king Henry, born of Rofamund, the daughter of Walter Lord Clifford; which Lady for her incomparable beauty was reputed (with alluſion to her name) Rofa mundi, the Roſe of the world: the deare affection the king bare her, cauſed both burning iealouſie in the Queene, and fatall ruine to her ſelfe, albeit the amorous king, for her ſecreſie and ſecuritie, (but what wallies will not iealouſie eie pierce through?) had built for her a moſt artificiall Labyrinth at Woodſtocke in Ox-fordſhire, with ſuch cunning windings and intricate paſſages, as had not Fate, and Heauens reuenge on Adultery, ſhewed the way, the enraged Queen had not ſo ſoone beene rid of her Riual, nor that wanton Dame of her life. Shee was buried in the Nunnery of Godſtow by Oxford with this Epitaph.

*Hac iacet in Tumba Roſa mundi, non Roſa munda;
Non redolet, ſed olet, quæ redolere ſolet.*

(Roſe,
This Tombe doth here encloſe the Worlds moſt beauctous
Roſe, paſſing ſweet ere while, Now nought but odour vile.

But Hugh (called the Saint) Biſhop of Lincolne, thought the Hearſe of a Harlot no fit ſpectacle for a Quire of Virgins to contemplate, & therefore him-ſelfe in perſon cauſed her bones to be caſt forth of the Church; which yet thoſe chaſt filters afterward recollected, and placed there againe with much honour, erecting a goodly Croſſe, thus inſcribed to the honour of her memory:

Qui meat hac, oret, Signumque ſalutis adoret, Vtq; tibi detur requies Roſamunda, precetur.

*All you which paſſe this way, This Croſſe adore, and pray,
That Roſamunds Soule may True reſt poſſeſſe for aye.*

The first Sonne which by her King Henry had, was the ſaid William, furnamed in French, Longſpee, in English, Long-ſword. He was Earle of Salisbury, in right of Ela his Wife, Daughter and heire of William Earle of that Countrey, ſon of Earle Patrick, by whom hee had Issue William Earle of Salisbury, Stephen Earle of Viſter, Ela Counteſſe of Warwicke, Ida Lady Beucham of Bedford, and Iſabell Lady Veſci:
his ſonne Earle William the ſecond, had Earle William the third, Father of Margaret, Wife of Henry Laſie Earle of Lincolne: hee died in the Caſtle of old Salisbury, and was buried in the Cathedral Church of the New City, in the ninth yeare of the raigne of king Henry the third.

(112) Geffrey an other Naturall ſonne of king
Henry, was borne of the Lady Rofamund aforeſaid:
This man in his tender youth, was (by his Fathers procurement) made Archdeacon of Lincolne, and after Biſhop of that See, which hee held aboue ſeauen yeeres without conſecration. and then re-ſigning it, in the yeare, 1181. into the hands of Ra-chard Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and his Father; hee was made Chancellour of England, and afterward by his brother king Richard, hee was aduanced to the Archbiſhopricke of York, (being conſecrated at Tours in France, An. 1191.) which See he gouerned with good approbation. But in the time of his Brother King John, hee vnderwent many difficulties, by oppoſing the Kings purpoſes, who therefore made ſeizure of his whole ſtate, and An. 1207. he left the Land and after ſiue yeeres baniſhment, died, viz.
Ann. 1213.

(113) Morgan, an other Naturall ſonne of King Henry, is thought by * ſome (becauſe ſo ſmall mention is made of him) to haue bene of no long life after his birth, and to haue bene borne of ſome woman in Wales, where this Chriſtian name is moſt commonly vſed, and whither this King vpon many occations, ſometimes reſorted. But * ſome others (whoſe ſtudiouſ paines, deſerue much thanks of poſteritie) report, that hee was gotten on the wife of one Rodulph Bloeth (or Blewet) a knight, and liued both to bee Prouoſt of Beuerley, and to be elected to the Biſhopricke of Durham, when coming to Rome for a diſpenſation (becauſe his Baſtardie made him otherwiſe vncapable) the Pope willed him to pro-feſſe himſelfe Blewets lawfull ſon, and not the Kings Naturall, promiſing to conſecrate him on that condition: but he, vſing the aduice of one William Lane his Clerke, told the Pope, that for no worldly promotion, he would renounce his father, or deny him-ſelfe to bee of roiall blood: ſo blind were ſome Prelats of thoſe times, who eſteemed ſpiritual functions, to be but worldly promotions.

paid) the Castles of Rochesbrough, and Berwicke (cautionarie Castles, or gage places, for part of his ransom) should be restored. 2. That he should have all such deeds, instruments, and charters, made by him to the late King Henrie, which had by constraint or duress been obtained: and himselfe to be freed from all encombrances, claimes, or pretensions whatsoever. 3. That he should have all such dignities, as his brother Malcolm held in England, (for which King William did there make fealties) and all such Lands as his Ancestors did hold of the English Crowne.

(14) The State of England being thus in the maine, and other meane points established, King Richard crost the Seas into France to Philip King thereof, according to appointment, that from thence, with minds & forces united, they might set forward under the Ensigne of the Crossie, which after some stay (occasioned by the death of the French Queen) they did, upon these Christian and friendly termes; 1. That each of them preserve the others honour, and beare faith to him for life, and member, and earthly dignity. 2. That neither of them shall faile the other in their affaires; but that the King of France shall helpe the King of England to defend his land, even as hee would defend the City of Paris, if it were besieged; and Richard King of England, shall helpe the King of France to defend his land, even as he would defend his City Rouen if it were besieged. This * being fairly engroft, and afterward ratified with oath, and sent by the kings themselves in person, the Earles and Barons sware in solemn manner, that they would not trespass against their fealty, nor stirre any warre in either of the kings Dominions, so long as they were in that pilgrimage: on the other side, the * Archbishops and Bishops did firmly promise (in verbo veritatis, in the word of truth) that they would accuse and excommunicate all such as did transgresse this agreement.

(15) Thus (after some necessary staies) these two the greatest Monarchs of the West, set forward over land (toward the publike service of Christianity) with such numbers as themselves thought best; which were so great, that having advanced (not without some little losse of people by the fall of the Bridge over the river Rhene at Lions, which brake by reason of the throng) beyond the said violent streame, they parted company; Philip passing over the Alpes into Italy, and Richard to the Sea-side at Marisilia, there to meete with his Nauie, which being compact of all the chiefe Ships in England, Normandy, and other his French Dominions, was there appointed to attend.

(16) But the voiage being very long, and King Richard comming to the Port before his Fleet, after eight daies expectation there, waxing impatient of delay, embarkt himselfe * in twenty hired Gallies, and ten great hulkes or Busses (a kind of shipping as it seemes peculiar then to the Mediterranean seas) and set saile toward Messana in Sicilia, the Rendezvous of both the kings and of their Armies: in which passage, lying at Anchor (on occasion,) in the mouth of the river Tiber not far from Rome, * Ottavianus, the Bishoppe of Naples repaired unto him, desiring him in the Popes name, that hee would visite his Holinesse; which the King denied to do, saying to the Popes charge many blamefull matters touching the Romish Simony, and Couetousnesse, with many other reproaches, alleading that they took 7000. Markes for consecration of the Bishoppe of Atians, 1500. Markes for the Legatine power of William Bishop of Ely, but of the Archbishop of Burdanx an infinite summe of money: whereupon hee refused to see Rome. Thus (after sundry accidents and commings on land) hearing that his Nauy was safe, hee * staid for them by the way, and then came to anchor not long after (to wit, 23. of September) before the City of Messana, with so great a shew of power, and sound of Warlike Instruments, and other signes of Maicesty, in the sight of Philip and his

French, and of many other Nations there assembled, that it stroke horror into the Inhabitants, (saith Houeden) and moued no small enuy in the hearts of his confederates.

(17) From this time forward, as it may seeme (the Enemy of Concord feeding the maleuolent passions of men with perpetual matter of debate) the king of France was neuer truly king Richards friend in heart, but upon the same day (whether streightned in prouisions or otherwise) hee left the king of England; but by contrary wind was driuen backe before night, where (after many troubles and quarrels betweene the English and Sicilians) the two kings peaced againe, and fetled a new & as firme a league, as they could, during that martiall pilgrimage.

(18) Tancred was at that time king of Sicilia by vsurpation, after the death of William, who had married Joan sister of king Richard, whom (at that time upon displeasure and quarrell being prisoner) Tancred set at liberty, sending her in honourable manner to her brother, and did yeeld to sundry Articles, and also present payments of ample summes. Feare wrought on both parts; for Richard being among strangers, and not very sure of the French, leised vpon a strength of the Griffons (people much redoubted in those parts, till the arrivall * of the English) & in a tumult took the City of Messana it selfe, where hee displaced his Ensignes, till for the French Kings loue hee was content to disaunce them, and to entrust the City to the Knights Templars and Hospitallers, vntill Tancred had fulfilled all such things as Richard did challenge to be due, being many.

(19) Vpon great deliberation therefore, the Sicilian King made answer, that hee had already paid to his sister, late Queene of that land, a very great quantity of coine in recompence of her Dowry or Iointure, and would satisfie all his other demands (concerning the Legacies intended by his Predecessor king William, to the Father of king Richard) as far as hee ought according to the custome of that kingdom, and thereupon gaue vnto him for the quiclaime of his sisters Iointure, twenty thousand ounces of gold: and further to bee acquitted of all other claims & pretences, as also in consideration that Arthur Duke of Brittain, nephew & next heire of king Richard (if Richard died without issue) should take to wife the daughter of K. Tancred, hee paid him other twenty thousand ounces of gold, and of his owne accord, and for King Richards loue, and for the loue of the English Nation (which, saith our * Author, was then in great reputation through the kingdom of Sicilie) as also to bee the more assured of performance, hee gaue him other twenty thousand ounces of gold, besides afterward foure great Ships, called Vrsers, and fiftene Gallies.

(20) King Richard on the other side, not to be wanting to any matter, which in honor and equitie might be expected of him, besides letters Patents, hee put in vpon their Oaths for his sureties, two Arch-bishops, and two Bishops of his owne there present, and twentie great Lords, and principall men his subiects, whose names (because many of their posterities doe yet stand) are heere inserted out of the said letters Patents, as they are vpon record in Houeden.

Jordanus de Humex his Constable, Wilhelmus de Curci, Richardus de Camilla, Girardus de Tabeot, Robertus Sablul, Guido de Croun, Garinus filius Geroldi, Bertramus de Vardun, W. Chamberlangus de Tankerville, Robertus de Nouo-burgo, Hugo Bardolf, Wigain de Chereburg, Gilbertus de Wascuil, Hugo le Bruin, Johannes de Piller, Amauri de Munford, Andreas de Chawenni, Wilhelmus de Forz, Gaufridus de Rancune, Amauri Torell, and other not named.

(21) Moreover for final assurance, hee offereth that Pope Clement should undertake for performance of his part in the said agreement; and that the said Clement would accordingly undertake, hee requests him by most officious letters, giuing him leaue without any reluctance) to put his dominions (vpon any his breach) vnder severest censures.

(22) This peace and accord being happily thus concluded, King Tancred (having most royally and lovingly feasted the King of England for three daies and three nights in a Castle of his) discovered, vpon the way at Tauernim in his returne, a foule and vnprincipally conspiracie of Philip (whome one of our Writers calls the vain-glorious King) against the head and safety of King Richard, which comming to be scanned betweene the two Kings, the French charged the English with picking of quarrels; and added, that valcise Richard married his sister Alice, according as hee ought, having beene contracted long before together, hee would be his enemy while hee breathed; whereunto King Richard (being pressed) did replye: That his * sister during the time of her abode in England, had a child by his Father Henry King of England, which hee was ready to proue by many witnesss there present: so that King Richard had farre more cause then a supicion of dishonesty (which * some write) to refuse the marriage. This falling out so shamefully, Philip (vpon certaine conditions betweene Richard and him) left him at liberty to take a wife where he thought good, but neuer (as it may seeme) forgave him his euill will while they two liued together.

(23) And because acts of Christian remorfe and humility are too rare among the Great ones of this vaine world, it were a crime to pretermitt the exemplar humiliation of this famous General K. Richard, at this time, who (to vse my * Authors words) inspired with diuine grace, and studying to fitt himselfe for the great attempt hee had in hand, was stung at the foule with so iust compunction for his finnes, that calling before him his Archbishops and Bishops into a Chappell, at the house where hee was lodged without the walles of Messana; hee blushed not to make a penitent confession of his manifold excesses, humbly praying God of mercy, and them (as his subordinate Ministers) of Absolution; & God (saith Houeden) respected him with eyes of Mercy, and gaue him a penitent heart, so that from thenceforth hee proued a man fearing God, eschewing euill, and doing good. * O felix illius, &c. O happy he, who so fals, that "he may rise more strong: O happy he, who after penitence, relapseth not into fault and ruine."

(24) Whereupon adding his mind to diuine contemplations, & meditation of the christian Church, whole Champion now hee was; hee desired conference of one Ioachim (a Cistercia Abbot) whose great learning and deepe understanding in the Scriptures, with an opinion of a Prophetical inspiration, made him so famous ouer the world, that King Richard sent for him, being then in Calabria neere Sicilie, whom at his comming hee heard preaching and expounding the Apocalypse of S. Iohn, touching the afflictions of the Church, and of Antichrist, which (saith hee) was then borne, and in the City of Rome, and shall bee aduanced in the See Apolliticke, of whom the Apostle said, hee should extoll himselfe aboue all that is called God, and that the seuen Crownes were the Kings and Princes of the earth which obeyed him. Surely, neere about this very time hapned that in Rome, which might seeme to giue great probability to that Abbots opinion, especially, if Emperours and Kings bee truly called * Gods, ouer whom Antichrist also should extoll himself: for in the same moneth that Richard left Messana, was the Coronation of Henry the Emperour, and his Emperesse Constantia, in S. Peters Church; where Pope Celestine, the very next day after his own consecration to the Papacie, sate in his Pontificall chaire, holding the Emperiall golden Crowne betwixt his feete and the Emperour (as likewise the Emperesse) stooping low, receiued on his head the Diadem from the Popes feet; and presently againe the Pope strake the Emperours crowne with his foot, and dasht it to the ground, signifying that hee had power to throw him (vpon his demerites) out of his Empire: but the Cardinals catching up the crowne, put it againe on the Emperours head.

(25) The same day in which Philip & his French Forces set saile out of the Hauens of Messana, arrived Alienor King Richards mother, accompanied with Berengaria his new intended Spouse, daughter to * Sanctius King of Nauarre, whom afterward he tooke to wife in Cyprus; but his Mother after a short stay returned by Rome into England, leaving the young Lady with Joan Queene Dowager of Sicilie, both which accompanied the King toward the holy Land, his whole Nauie being * one hundred and fifty great ships, and fifty three Gallies well appointed for the warre, and * many other Sailes and Vessels: and (not to omit the same because it is recorded as a singularity) hee had among all these, * thirteen Buce or Bucies, which had each of them three course of Sailes to saile with: but no Writer (so farre as we yet find) declares what numbers of Souldiers were in the English Armie.

(26) This Nauie roall betweene the Isles of Rhodes and Cyprus, (for the honor and good of King Richard) was scattered by God with a terrible tempest, some one or two of which suffered wreck vpon the Isle of Cyprus, whom * Cusae (or as other call him Iakius, Emperour of the Griffons) being a tyrant did spoile, and contrary to Christian Religion, (which was his profession, though, some mistake) and all honour and humanity, hee would not (among other his vnprincipally, or rather barbarous behauiours) suffer the Kings sister, and Lady Berengaria, with other of that tender societie, to come into harbour, to their great discontentment and perill, a * Shippe or two sinking there: but neither would God, nor King Richard forgive it him.

(27) For the said vnworthy Prince hauing thrice refused to make restitution of his vnlawfull seizers and prisoners, was entred vpon by the English, driuen from the shoares with great dishonour and slaughter; the City Limefawn left for a prey to the victors, and himselfe beaten againe out of his Campe, and taken, and after an escape made by him, his onlie daughter and heire yielding her selfe, and her Father lastly comming againe of his owne accord (as despairing to lie hid) vnder custodie, and thrust into fetters of gold and silver, the whole land (with all the people, strength, and riches thereof) became subiect to the King of England, and both Father and Daughter led away into captivity.

(28) There arrived at Limefawn, to salute and honour King Richard within three dayes after his first victory, Guido King of Ierusalem, Geoffrey de * Leizant his brother, Raimund Prince of Antioch, Leir Boemond his sonne, &c. offering their seruices, and swearing to bee his against all men; with whose priuaty King Richard seised the flourishing and spacious land of Cyprus, by antiquity celebrated as the very seat of Venus, which that it might so proue to himselfe, in the ioyous moneth, hee solemnly took to wife his beloued Lady Berengaria.

(29) The person of the Emperour (for by that lofty title Writers call him,) was sent to Tripolis in Syria, vnder the custody of Ralph Fitz Godfrey, Lord * Chamberlaine to King Richard: his daughter was committed to the two Queenes Berengaria and Joan: the land it selfe was entrusted to Richard de Camule, and Robert de Turnham his Viceroyes, with competent force and prouisions, and the Islanders suffered to enioy all such lawes and liberties, as they held in the time of Manuel the Emperour of Constantinople, or (as now they call it) of Stamboli.

(30) This fame of Richard was much enlarged by his conquering a mighty * Argoſcy, called a Dromond, wherein were aboard one thousand and five hundred Sarazens (though disguised vnder French Flagges) furnished, besides all other prouisions, with fire-works, barrells or cages of venomous serpents, and the like, for the vse of the Sarazens at Acon, (anciently called Pholomias, to the siege whereof hee was then sailing,) thirteene hundeath of which Miscreants, he sacrificed to Mars & Neptune, keeping the rest for ransome.

(31) Philip King of France, (in hope perhaps to conquer Acon before the English could arrive, and to winne thereby that glory intire) came safe before that City in Easter weeke; but as yet had not forced the same: at which time (that the Reader may observe the general disposition of the western Christians in those dayes) there engirded Acon (omitting the many great Prelates, Princes, Earles, and Honourable Cheifes) these Nations following, the Genoayes and Florentines, the English vnder Hubert Bishop of Salisbury, afterward Archbishop of Canterbury, Flemings, Almains, Danes, Dutch, Frislanders, Pisans, Lombards, besides the Knights Templars (collected out of all Nations) and beside the aides of the Assians: all which lay quartered at the Seige in order, as here they are placed, at that time in which the King of France arrived. But Richard King of England with his victorious and triumphant Nauie (which when it went out of Cyprus, being much belike augmented) did containe 254. tall shippes, and about 60. Gallies brought terror & dismay to the besieged, and comfort to the Christians, vpon the Sunday after Pentecost, being about the middle of Iune.

(32) The seige was so vehemently plied, that (notwithstanding sundry dissensions between Philip and Richard, the two competitors of glorie in this voiage) after severall breaches and assaults, the last whereof was made by the Pisans and English, vpon the twelfth of Iuly following, many offers of composition made by the Saladines, being utterly refused, the City of Acon was rendred to the Christians vpon these conditions. 1. That Saladin (Prince of Miscreants) should by a certaine day restore the holy Crosse. 2. That he should set at liberty fifteen hundred Christian Captives. 3. That the City with all the things contained therein should remain and be to the Christians. 4. That the Turks or Sarazens should haue their liues only saved, if these conditions were performed. 5. That they should pay twenty thousand Bizants, (peeces of gold) toward the charges of the Kings. To take possession for the French, there was sent in Dragon de Merlou, and one hundred men of Armes, and for the English, Hugo de Gurnay with the like number, who equally parted the City, goods, and people, betwene them.

(33) And euen now Philip King of France, as well because the Earle of Flanders died at the seige without issue, whose countries hee long had coveted, as for euill will to Richard, whose noble Acts so farre outwent his, and because, as some write, hee had taken bribes of Saladin, meditates nothing but return, asking licence of King Richard to depart, being then but the tenth day after the Cities surrender; so badly his enuious eyes could, as it seemed, endure the splendor of his companions glorie. The chiefe commanders of his Army hearing this, shewing themselves true French-men, and sensible of their obligation to God, and honour, with many teares besought him not to forsake that holy affaire, ita impudenter, so shamefully. In what Prince would not this haue kindled a desire of a better resolution? But impotent passions carrying him, and mis-carrying him, he persisted to get leave of Richard, who but two dayes before, would haue had him swear to a stay of three yeeres longer in that seruice; but hee who had other cogitations farre more vnworthy of a King, would needs depart, giuing his oath vpon the holy Gospels, without which oath King Richard would not grant his good will. That he would well and faithfully keepe the lands and subiects of the King of England, and neither doe damage nor grieuance to them by himself, nor suffer it to be done by others till his returne.

(34) The King of France thus leauing Acon, in the Castle whereof King Richard, his Queene and Sister were lodged, and the Duke of Burgundie remaining behind with the French host, (to whom King Philip, not without sundry secret instructions, had with it committed a great part of his treasure) King Richard in the same day set forward vpon a new enterprise; but it is true which one writes, that by reason of the dissention betwene the Kings, which of them should seeme the greater, little or nothing prospered; & iust cause had King Richard to complain in his letters, that Philip to the eternal reproch of himselfe and Kingdome, had foully forsaken his purpose and vow vnto God.

(35) But when the Saladin could not by any means obtaine a longer day for performance of the said Articles of composition, hee cut off the heads of all his Christian Captives; in reuenge whereof King Richard brought out his Turkish Captives, (being about two thousand and five hundred) and in the sight of the Saladines host caused their heads to be chopt off; the Duke of Burgundie doing the same to the like number, nere vnto the walls of Acon, seuen onlie being kept alive by the Christian Generals, whereof Karakey Saladines foster Father was chiefe. But Richard proceeding in his vndertaken action, and in his march to Ioppa, being set vpon by Sultan Saladin (who had put the Duke of Burgundie to flight, and slaine the valiant Iaques de Auenius, who onely with a few in the Regard made resistance) so courageously encountered him, that the Saladin with the losse of three thousand his choicest Souldiers was glad to turn his back and flie: whilst therefore this Champion is thus imploied in the Holy-land, let vs looke backe a litle how the affaires of his Kingdome are managed at home.

(36) John the Kings brother, making vse in England of such discontentments, as the incredible insolencies, and intolerable tyrannies of the Chancellour (who carried himselfe both like a Pope and a King) had bred among the Nobility and people, to aduance thereby his owne designs, stirred against him (though strengthening himselfe like a General in the field,) so powerful opposition, that in the end, (vpon warrant of a new Commission sent from the King his Brother) hee with the rest of the Peeres suddenly thrust him out of all commaund, and shortly after most reprochfully (as it happened, for he fled, and was taken in a Curtesian attire, il becoming a Popes Legate) out of the Kingdome also, vpon occasion, as of other foule demerites, so particularly of a sacrilegious and barbarous outrage, committed by the Chancellours commaund, vpon the person of Geoffrey Eleet Archbishop of Yorke (natural brother to King Richard and the Earle) on pretence that he entred England contrarie to his oath giuen to his brother King Richard, whereas he then came to take possession of his See, to which hee was aduanced by the Kings owne procurement, and by Queene Eleanors owne traualle to Rome in his behalfe. And albeit this punishment & shame deferuently followed the Chancellours pride and oppression, yet in one maine point of opposing the Earles Ambition, (who sought to assure to himselfe the remainder of the Crowne, which in right of blood belonged to his Nephew Arthur) his seruice to the State had bene very commendable, if it had proceeded from loyalty of affection, and not from a swelling desire of greatness, which hee hoped still to enioy, if Arthur (a child) should succeed in the kingdome, whereas he knew Earle Johns aduancement could not be without his apparant ruine.

(37) But Philip King of France in all places labouring by wrongfull and vnprincipally aspersions to deface the renowne of King Richard, though finding small credite to his words (because the man had done nothing himselfe) deuiled after his return how to trouble and endamage his friends dominions; and had effected it, if the Lordes of France whom he solicited to that wicked worke, vpon pretence of the composition made with King Richard at Acre, had not (to their immortal glory) refused to assent therein, till Richards returne, as well in regard of their owne oaths, as because the sentence of excommunication was denounced against all such as did attempt to endamage him in his absence.

(38) King Richard notwithstanding that the relation of these things greatly troubled him, gave not ouer as yet, but after sundry other matters of importance performed, did march vpon within the fight of Ierusalem, where he skirmished with the enemies, & ouerthrew the Conuoy or Carauan of the Saladines, which came laden from Babylon, guarded with ten thousand men; whom King Richard valiantly encountering with five thousand selected souldiers, put most of them to the sword, and took three thousand Camels, and four thousand Horses and Mules, besides those that were slaine, and so gained the rich spoile of all the Carriages.

(39) After this, and many other worthy things done, as the rescue of Ioppa, and repulse of Saladin from thence, &c. the King indefatigable in his braue attempts, desirous to regaine Ierusalem, and the City Barnek, was abandoned in that enterprise by the Duke of Burgundie (who is said to haue bene apparently corrupted with gifts from Saladin, and the regiments of French vnder his conduct) whereupon he was the rather perauised by the Knights Templars, and chiefe of the Christian host, not to refuse Saladines offers for a surcease from hostility, considering that hee had a purpose to returne with reinforced numbers and means; that his present powers by diuisions, by sickness, by battales were wasted, and that the dangerous estate of his owne Dominions did require his presence, (the greatest motive, for hee had supplies of money for his Souldiers wages from Pope Celestine) by reason of some vndue practises at home, and the rancour of King Philip his vnreconcilable aduersary abroad. Whereupon a truce was taken for three yeeres, and Saladin repaid such charges as Richard had been at in fortifying Askalon, which was brought to the same estate, as in which King Richard found it.

(40) But the King of England, though hee had very far excelled all the Christian Princes in great exploits at that iourney, because he had neither conquered Saladin, nor Ierusalem, did mourne, and parted pensive. In the holy-land hee left Henry Earle of Champagne, (who vpon taking the said Barnek was to haue bene crowned King of Ierusalem, which Guido had resigned) and hee left Guido de Lusignan (the late King of Ierusalem in Cyprus, to whom hee had passed it, in exchange for the other, to aduance his Kinsman the said Earle of Champagne, which, vpon that Title, the familie of Lusignan for many decades after did possesse and enioy. Thus Richard hauing ordered his affairs in the East parts, setts saile homeward. The Queene Berengaria his wife, and Ioan his sister, with the Captiue Lady, Daughter of the Cypriot Emperour, vnder the conduct of Stephen de Turnham (hearing of the Kings most heauie fortune) sojourned at Rome about fixe moneths, for feare of Richards enemies, & afterward came saile by Marilia in Poitou.

(41) God, whose cause was onely pretended in this voyage of the Christians, did not seeme to approve the said truce; for hee scattered the English with a terrible tempest, and the opportunity of Conquest was so lost, that hitherto it could neuer be regained, and the King of England letting it slippe when God had almost put the same into his hands, did miserably fall into his enemies hands. Certainelie, the name of Richard was at that time growne terrible to Saladin, who had received diuers losses, foiles and ouerthrowes at his handes: Moreover, the Saladines whole estate being endangered by such of his own sect as reputed him a meer vsurper, hee could not long withstand the double impression of the Christian Chieftaine, and of his owne Allies and Countreymen, as indeed not long after he died, leaving his Empire fowly, but iustly, distracted by ciuill confusions: whereas by this Truce the crafty Turke made the world see, that the powers of two so potent Monarkes had in a manner effected nothing; & Richard could neuer haue time to return for accomplishment of his designs; for which all Christendome hath at this howre reason to bee sorrowfull, and hereof himselfe was very sensible, so that hee would oftentimes cry out, that hee was not alwayes wise, alluding to this occasion lost.

(42) But the noble King, hoping to pierce with speed through Germanie in disguise, tooke to him the name of Hugo a Merchant, the haire of his head and beard growne very long, being the fitter to conceale him; but in his iourney ouer land, was nere to Vienna vnexpectly discovered by the profuseness of his expenses, when hee saw hee could not escape them, in contempt of his fortunes, hee put on roiall garments, and refused to yeeld but onely to the Duke himselfe, who came with ioy as to a prey which hee sore longed for: but the rascal multitude cried things worthy of themselves, calling him (O barbarisme) Traitor, and some saying, stone him, some cut off his head, & others hang him: and because the inhumanity of this vage may be suited with rimes as rude and ragged, you shall in such heare the cause of this Arch-dukes malice, growing first at Acon, where the Author speaking of King Richard saith;

*He gate it soone with his great Ordinance,
And on the walles his Banners full high set,
The Kings Armes he set up also of France,
And King Guyes Armes of Ierusalem well bet,
The Duke of Ostrich Limpold without let,
Set up his Armes after about them all,
Which King Richard did cast downe from the wall.*

(43) And though it is certaine that this Author faimes not this fact, for that some such matter (and told by some with more disadvantage to Richards cause) is by others related, yet the grauest Authors agree (that next to the common enie at his vertues) the greatest pretence was the murder of the Marquisse Conrad committed at Tyre, by two cursed Assasins, a certaine sect in the East, living vnder a Senior or Ruler, whom they honor as a Prophet, by whom they are sent forth to murder such Princes as fauor them, not promising themselves the reward of immortality by obeying him in all things, though with the losse of their owne liues. Of which barbarous fact Henrie the Emperour, and Leopold the Arch-duke (whose neer kinsman Conrad was) would seeme to beleue that Richard was the Author, though therein they touch his princely reputation and integrity, most iniuriously, for that the chiefe of that sect by their owne publike letters (written with the blood of the shed-fish called Murex, wherewith Scarlet vied to be dyed) acknowledging the fact, declared the true cause thereof, which was a particular Act of iniustice in Conrad himselfe: There wanted not sundry other pretences, as in such cases is usual, as that Richard had entred league with Tancred King of Sicilia the Emperours enemy, and that hee had thrust the Cypriot (their kinsman) out of the Empire, and kept his onely daughter Captiue. But this booty, being too great for a Duke, the Emperour got into his custody, meaning to coine much gold and siluer out of his most vniust affliction, by sharpe imprisonment: which could not make him in any act or speech, or gesture of his, shew beneath the Maiestie of a victorious Prince and King of England.

(44) The difmal newes thereof flying through the world, presently disclosed who were found or vnforeseen sorrow and dismay was euery where among his owne. His carefull mother and other his fast friends friends swaere the realme to be true to King Richard, watch the coasts, and prouide for the security of the State with singular vigilance, assuring the Cities & good Townes with Bulwarkes, Walles, and Munition. On the contrary, Earle John being (by the cunning inueigling and suggestions of his brothers professed foes) not only put out of all hope of his releasement, but also incited against him for intending the Crowne to his Nephew Arthur, entered into an vnbrotherly attempt against his Soueraigne Lord, the summe whereof, take in the words of Thomas Walsingham, who faith, that John with promises allured many to him through the whole Kingdom, did carefully and speedily fortifie his holds in England, and passing the seas, entered into league with the King of the French, that he might vtterly put his Nephew Arthur, Duke of Britaine from that hope, which the Britaines had conceived of his promotion. The Normans giuing any way to his disloial practices, hee swears fealty to Philip King of France (his brothers most mortal enemy) and also that he would take to wife the Lady Alice King Philips sister, though polluted by his owne Father, and for that cause reiectd by King Richard. Out of Normandy he posts into England, sollicites Peeres and people, and was loyally refuted: but hee not quieted so, labors to fire the Scot and Welsh to ioine in an inuasion with him: the French and Flemings assuring them that his Brother King Richard would neuer be set at liberty: but William King of Scots would neither giue assent, nor countenance to such vndutiful practices, or rather madnesses.

(45) In this most perillous time the valour and loyalty of the City of Roan (the choicest of Normandy) did most clearly shew themselves to the euermlasting commendation thereof: for Philip comming before it with a puissant Army (solicited the reuolt, promising mountaines. In stead of answer* they fet open the gates, telling him that hee might enter if he would, for no man hindred him: but the* vaine-glorious King being better aduised, (for the inhabitants, yea & the damels of the City, whose heads were pold like as mens, powdered molten pitch, and such like matter vpon the besiegers) retreated from the walles, and marche away confounded: and being certainly aduertized that the Emperour and King Richard were agreed, hee sends ouer to Earle* John, bidding him looke to himselfe, for the Diuell was now let loose. Hee thereupon crost ouer the seas to Philip, who* excited him to vsurpe the Kingdome of England.

(46) Neuertheless by Queene Elianors negotiation (who in person trauelled to the Emperour) the King her sonne was come to be assured of his liberty vpon these conditions. 1. That hee should pay to the Emperour one hundred thousand Markes sterling. 2. That he should pay fifty thousand Markes of like money to the Emperour and Duke. 3. That he should marry his Nece, (sister to Arthur Duke of Britaine) to Duke Leopolds sonne. 4. That the Emperour should secure him, till he were vnder saile with a fore-wind. 5. That hee should set the Cyprians person at liberty, and deliuer his daughter to the Duke of Austria, who was her vncle, and should deliuer 67. hostages for assurance of all.

(47) But to colour this vnreasonable and vnprincipall extortion, the Emperour by his Imperiall Charter giues vnto King Richard, Prouince, and sundry other ample territories, containing 5. Arch-bishopricks, and thirty three Bishopricks (sometime parcell of the Empire, but both then and a long time before out of possession) & thereof crowns him King, writing magnificent letters into England, with such like offices.

(48) Now when King Richard (who had wonne to himselfe wonderful honour and respect, euen of the couetous Emperour, by the prooffe of his innocency, and by his most noble and constant carriage) did expect his liberty at an assembly or diet, where the greatest Princes and States of the Empire were in person, to wit, The three Archbishops of Mentz, Colon, and Saltzburg. The three Bishops of Wormes, Spire, and Leige; The three Dukes of Swane, the Emperours brother, Austria, and Lorraine; The Count Palatine of Rhene, &c. which had vnderaken for the Emperour, whose officers had already receiued the greater part of the ranfome: behold eue then the Emperour shewes a willingness to breake off, producing the letters of Philip King of France, and of John Earle of Morton, in which they offer an huge summe &c. too impious and diuclish to speak of: but the Princes who had vnderaken to King Richard for good dealing, went to the Emperour reproving him for his auarice, who would so dishonourably trauesse and start backe from the agreement: * vpon the fourth of Februarie therefore being Friday, the Archbishops of Mentz and Colaine restore him * after fifteen moneths imprisonment, to Queene Alienor his mother, free from the Emperour, all that were present weeping thereat for ioy.

(49) This Archbishop of Colaine was hee, who entertaining the King in the Dominions of his Archbishopricke, with great ioy for his deliuerance did celebrate diuine seruice in this manner: Now know truly that the Lord hath sent his Angell and taken me out of the hand of Herode, and the expectation of the common people of the Tewes, &c.

(50) And indeed it was Gods Angell did it: for after all this, whiles the King staid for a wind, and other preparations at the Sea-shore, the Emperour repenting him of his releafe, sent speedy guards to apprehend him againe, vowing hee should neuer be freed from bonds while hee liued; but some secret message (as Princes Courts neuer want Spies) speedily premonished him, and so by a verie little time hee preuented his surprisers, landing happily at Sandwich, in April the Sunday after Saint Georges day: where in stead of all other triumphs, or particulars of ioy for his returne, wee will content our selues with onely one, as signe of the rest. When the King drew neere to Rochester, the venerable new Archbishop of Canterbury Hubert (who had bene with him at Accon in the Holy-land) went ioyously forth to meet him, whom when the King law, hee dismounted from his horse, and hauing bowed his knee, fell vpon the earth, in like sort the Archbishoppe lay right against him; at the last both of them rising from the ground, they ranne into each others arms, comforting themselves with mutual embraces & weeping with ioy.

(51) The iniustice of a true history will not suffer vs here to forget, in what sort the iniustice of this vnnoble captiuation of Richard King of England, was punished by God, and on Gods behalfe. The Duke of Austria Country, and people, being visited with these five plagues, Fire, Water, Barrennes, Worms, & Pestilence: the Fire, casually burning his Townes, the Riuer of Danubius drowning ten thousand of his Subiects, in an ouerflows, the earth waxing drie and fear; the Wormes destroying such fruit and graine as grew; and the stroke of Pestilence killing the principall Nobles and Gentlemen of his Dominions: The Duke for all this continued obstinate like another Pharoa, swearing to cut off the heads of K. Richards Hostages, vnlesse all Couenants (though extorted by cruell Duresse) were exactly and speedily performed. Baldwin de Betun (one of the Hostages) is sent to the King with this bloodie message, but before his returne, vpon S. Stephens day in Christmas, the Duke* spurring his horse in sport vpon a Cattle of shew among youthes, which were counterfeiting a fege, and an assault, with the slip of his horse, brake his foot in such sort, as it came to be cut off, and within a while feeling himselfe perishing vponward, so that his death was certaine, could not be absolved of his Bishops from the sentence of Ex-

communication which had by the Pope bin denounced, till hee and his Lords had sworne to releafe all the laid matters betweene the King of England and him; but his sonne after his death refusing the performance, his Fathers body lay stinking about ground eight daies, for that no clergy man durst burie it, being but conditionally absolved, till the son did yeeld to the performance; yet (if some may be credited vpon his bare word) the sonne did voluntarily condiscend, and not vpon this compulsion.

(53) But albeit the Emperour * to declare himselfe wounded with some remorse for his vngodlike violence, or to engage others in the impietie, gaue three thousand Markes of King Richards ranfome to make siliuer Censers through all the Cistercian order, who generally refused the gift, as parcell of an accursed spoile (for as for those* twenty thousand marks, which hee forgave to King Richard, with as bad a purpose (being to hinder peace betweene him, and the French) as hee had taken the other vnjustly, they are not to be accounted as restitution, but as the wages of sinne); reuenge forooke him not, being pursued by his owne wife (the Heire of the Crowne of Sicilia) in reuenge of some cruelties done to her Countreymen; and after reconciliation with her, falling dangerously sicke, hee died at Messina, excommunicated for King Richards cause. And albeit hee had in his life time sent his Chancellour out of Burgundie, of purpose to offer King Richard recompence for the injuries hee had sustained, and although Constantia the Emperesse had sent the Archbishoppe of Messina (while the Emperours body lay about ground without buriall) to Pope Celestin in humble manner, praying Christian buriall, yet * vnlesse the money which hee had extorted from the King of England were restored, hee could by no entreaties obtaine it: which accordingly was promised.

(54) Neither were the King of Englands afflictions vnprofitable vnto him, for they gaue him occasion to reforme his life, taking home to him his Queene Berengaria, whose society for a long time hee had neglected, though shee were a roiall, eloquent, & beauteous Lady, and for his loue had ventured with him through the world.

(55) King Richard after his ioyous returne into England, hauing at the Abbey of Saint Edmunds, in performance of his vow (as may seeme) offered vp the rich Imperiall Standard of Cursac, Emperour of Cyprus, which hee tooke among the spoiles of the Griffons Campe: thence hee marched, and tooke in by surrender such Castles as the seruants of his brother John (beleeuing that the King was not returne ned) held against him; but Henry de Pomeray, who had fortified Saint Michaels Mount in Cornwall, hearing for certaine that King Richard was come, died for very feare. And now, forty daies of fummons being expired, which were allowed to Earle John, & Hugh Bishop of Cowntrey, for making their appearance, to answer to such heinous matter as was prepared, and they not appearing, John was adiudged by the Peeres and States of England, to haue forfeited all that hee might forfeit in the Realme, and the Bishop to be punishable by the Ecclesiasticall censures, as hee was a Bishop, and likewise as an Officer of the King, by the Laitic. Richard afterwarde bestirred himselfe to draw in money more greedilie, then did become so great a Maiesty, wherein yet (faith * one) hee was rather to be pardoned then accused, for that hee was presently to lead a mightie Armie against the French.

(56) But first of all, to wipe away both the fadnes and contumelie of his late restraint, for a better fortunes beginning, hee caused himselfe to be crowned againe at the City of Winchester, which celebratie was honoured with the presence of William King of Scotland, who bare sword before * King Richard: betweene which two Princes, there* followed great amity and tendernes of loue; then being granted to him, and his successors Kings of Scotland, a certaine pension, with sundry other allowances, and princelie attendances, from the first day of their friendlie entrances at any time into England, till their returne.

(57) The King likewise caused a new broad Seale to bee made, requiring that all Charters granted vnder his former, should be confirmed vnder this, whereby he drew a great masse of money to his Treasurie, subscribing such renewed Charters thus: This was the tenor of our Charter vnder our first Seale, which because it was lost, and in the time of our being captiue in Almaine was in the power of another, wee caused to be changed, &c. Some haue obserued, that as this Richard was the first of the English Kings who bare Armes on his Seales, as appeareth by the * former: so was hee the first who carried in his shield, three Lions passant, borne euer after for the Regal Arms of England. And whereas we see heere the Moone in her full, which in the other was but a Crescent, (which is the Turkish Ensigne,) it may seeme to be done Emblematically, in that sense, as wee read of another Prince (who going against the Turkes) gaue a Crescent with this word, Plenior redibo, I will returne more full. The true draught of this second Seale we haue here annexed.

(58) A good * Author reports, that after this, the King being at dinner at Westminster, and receiuing aduertisement of the fege laid to Vernon, by his restlesse enemy Philip of France, swaere that hee would neuer turne his face, till hee had gotten thither with his Armie to fight with the French; whereupon hee caused the wall to be cut through, (the signe of which breach appeared * about two hundred yeares after) neuer resting, till with his hundred great Shippes hee had crost the seas from G g g g 2

King Richard amendment of life and daily exercise.

Portsmouth into Normandy, where the onely rumor of his approach made the French King raise his siege, and without stroke or sight of his magnanimous Enemy, (but not without loss and shame) to quite the field.

(59) Neither was his clemency less then his courage, whereof needs no greater testimony, then when upon Earle John's dutifull submission, & his mothers intercession, he so freely forgave him, as that he calmly said, * Would that thy fault may so be forgotten of me, as that thy self mayst keepe in memorie what thou hast done; and * afterward restored his possessions vnto him; the Earle from that time forward becoming his true Knight, & doing him very noble seruices, (especially against the French who had seduced him) as a loving brother, & faithfull Leegeman, whereby he made amends for his former excesses, and fully recovered the hearty affection of his Lord and brother.

(60) There were after this sundry skirmishes, takings of Prisoners and Townes, and conferences betweene the French and English, moued belike, by such as religiously rendered the effusion of Christi- an blood, so as no great matter was yet effected; that which was, being rather by * Stratagems and starts, then by battle; but within * thirty seuen daies after the French mens flight from Veruill, King Richard (in reuenge of that defolation which the French King had brought vpon the City of Euxenx, where he neither spared age, sexe, nor Church) comming to Vendome, with purpose to surpris the King of France, had the spoile of the French Campe, their King (at thing almost incredible) now the second time flying without battle. Many of the French were slaine, and taken, together with * much treasure, the Chappell roiall, the Indentures of such as had left Richard to serue King Philip, and all the * tents, cariages, and other furnitures for warre; and from hence marching in Poitou and Angoulême, hee had such successes (howsoever the silent partialities of forraign Writers smother them) that * himself wrote ouer to his deereft Hubert Archbishoppe of Canter- burie, That by Gods fauour, who in all things considers the right, hee had taken Tailleburg, Marfiliac, and all the other Castles of Geofrey de Rancune, the City of Engoulême, and all the Castles and Territories of the Earle thereof, and almost three hundred Knights, or men of Armes, and about forty thousand armed Souldiers.

(61) We will not here ouerpass, that which Houden reports, (being an example of Christian repentance in Princes) of a poore Hermits comming to this noble Monarch, and preaching to him the words of eternall life; and bad him bee mindfull of the subuersion of Sodom, and to abstaine from things vnlawfull, otherwise (saith he) the deferred vengeance of God will come upon thee. The Hermit being gone, the King neglected his words: but not long after falling sicke, hee more seriously berought himselfe, and afterward waxing found in soule, as well as body: his daily exercise was to rise early, & not to depart from the Church till diuine seruice were finished: whereupon (saith Houden) how * glorious it is for a Prince to beginne and end his actions in him, who is beginning without beginning, and ind- geth the ends of the earth. Moreover, hee bounti- fully releued every day much poore both in his Court and Townes about: and restored gold and silver vessels to such Churches, from which to pay his ransom they had beene taken away.

(62) After this passed sundry interchanges betwixt the French and English, sometimes of warres, with waits and spoiles, sometimes of truces with interuiewes and Parties; in one of which, the Lady Alice, (cause of much mischief) K. Philips sister, was restored (according to the contract of Messina) to her brother, who forthwith bestowed her in mar- riage, vpon John Earle of Pantif. In the mean while the Kings sought to make friends vpon all sides; but King Richard by his munificence, and other means, drew from King Philip a mighty party of his secret neighbours: * Baldwin Earle of Flanders, Raimond Earle of Tolose (to whom also King Richard gaue in * marriage, his sister Joan Queen of Sicilia) the * Ché- panois and others: so that Philip was faine to trust wholly vpon himselfe: for whereas hee had larely married the sister of the King of Denmarke, of pur- pose to vse the Danish shipping against the English, that affinity proued enmity: for the * next day after his wedding, hee put her away, pretending (be- sides other things) that hee was of too neere a pro- pinquity of blood; albeit most vntrue, as her brother, the King of Denmarke proved before the Pope, though he could not be heard, the King of France more preuailing either by force or fauour.

(63) About this time, John the Kings brother & Markadey Captaine of the Brabanters, called the * Rowtes, had made an incursion vnto Beauu, where the Bishoppe, being also an Earle of the Roiall Blood, and the eleuenth Peere of France, valiantly fighting, was * taken in the skirmish, armed at all points, and brauely mounted on whose behalfe the Pope (vpon the Bishops humble suite, pleading the Clergies immunity) wrote somewhat earnestly to King Richard, to let his verie deare sonne, for so hee called the Bishop, at liberty: The King in a kind of pleasant earnestnesse, caused the Habergeon and Curaces of the Bishop to be presented to the Pope, with this question (alluding to that of * Jacobs chil- dren to their father, concerning Josephs garment,) * Vide an tunica filii tui sit an non, sed whether it bee thy sonnes coat or no. Whereupon the Pope replied, that * he was neither his sonne, nor the sonne of the Church, and therefore should be ransomed at the Kings will, be- cause hee was rather indged to be a seruitour of Mars, then a Souldier of Christ. Whom the King of Eng- land (in * reuenge of many euill offices, especiallie in the time of his captiuitie with the Emperour) handled sharply. The Bishop at length waxing impatient, writes a passionate letter to the Pope; whose answer in parts here set downe, for that it notably defends the King of England. If (saith the Pope) thou hast had ill success, it is no mar- uelle, for putting off the peaceable Prelate, thou didst put on the warlike Souldier, and rashly too- kest a shield in stead of a cope, a sword for a Stole, a Curace for an Albe, an Helmet for a Miter, a Lance for a Bishops staffe, peruerter the order, & * count of things: neither meant you (as you al- ledge) to repell violence but vertue, nor did you fight for your Country, but against it: for of your France we can now publicly pronounce; wee to that land whose King is a Child. For your King was strictly bound by corporall oath to the King of England, not to damne his territories, &c. at least wile till his returne from the iourney of his Pilgrimage: neuertheless, contrary to his faith and oath, hee without all shame seized by force the good townes of the said King, and cruellie wasted his Dominions with hostile hand: but that King returning at last out of captiuitie, man- fully encountered your King, notrepousing hishope in multitude, but in Almighty God, &c. Humili- ty therefore against pride, right and equity against wrong, measure and modesty against intempe- rance and arrogancy, haue certainly hitherto fought for the King of England, &c. Wee haue notwithstanding directed our supplicatorie let- ters to him on thy behalfe, &c. for in such a case we neither can nor ought command, &c. Meane while beare your bands and sorrowes patientlie, &c.

(64) While thus sundry warlike matters passed betweene the English and French, the King of Eng- land encreaseth his side with new associates, Arthur Duke of Britaine, the Duke of Luain, the Earles of Gynes, Boloin, Perche and Blois with others; and * Houden recites three seuerall times within a short space, in which the King of France was driuen with loss and dishonour out of the field by King Richard, beside the loss of Saint Omers, of Air, and of other Townes wonne by Baldwin Earle of Flanders, and besides the waite of the French Dominions by many inuasions. But the greatest of the three victories was the second, which King Richard gained at the battaile betweene Curueles and Gysors, where the K. of France himselfe fell into the riuier of Elbe, the bridge breaking vnder him, with the throng of peo- ple which fled for their liues before the English Li- on: neither was hee easily saued (twenty of his men of Armes being drowned by that ruine) but before hee could be drawne out, water had gotten into his belly.

(65) This was a famous victory; for besides a long Catalogue of great names extant in Authors there were taken by the Kings Arme, 100. Knights and Seruitours on horse-backe, and footmen without number, besides thirty men of Armes, and other inferior Souldiers not countable, which Markadey (General of the Rowtes) had for prisoners. There were also taken 200. great horse, whereof fifteen score had barbs, and caparions armed with yron. King Richard in his owne person did most nobly, for with one speare hee threw to the earth Mathew de Mum- merance, Alan de Rufet, and Fulke de Giffrull, &c. took "them. So haue we vanquished the King of France "at Gysors (saith the King) howbeit wee haue not "done the fame, but * God and our right by vs: and "in this fact we did put our owne head and king- dome in hazard about the counsell of all that were "ours. Howsoever therefore the French or others may flubber ouer such a noble Iourney, wee haue not doubted vpon so good warrant to record the same.

(66) The warre continuing still, many vertuous men laboured to make a final accord; and the new Pope Innocentius the third, hauing proclaimed a new vndertaking of the Holy-warre, sends a Cardinall Deacon to atone the two mighty Kings of France and England. At length Arreicles of peace were drawne, but Richard (being farre before hand) was nothing halie to conclude, and therefore put it off, till his returne from Poitou, whether hee went to chastise his rebels, though * some say, hee did then conclude the peace.

(67) At this enterview or treatie, Philip King of France, * (the power of strife, though he fought peace) shewed to King Richard a deed, in which Earle John newly yeelds himselfe Liegeman to King Philip, a- gainst his brother. A wonderful thing (saith Houden) that Richard should beleene it (being perhaps but a Copie of that deuce or trickie, if it were a deuce which they once had iointly put vpon the same John, as in the end of King Henry the second you heard) who thereupon forthwith disfiled the Earle his brother euery where. But the Earle hauing scar- ched and learned the cause of the Kings sudden dis- pleasures, (whose loue hee had before redeemed with many loiall seruices) Hee sends two men of Arms to the French Court, who should on his behalf, in what for- soever defend his honour and innocency, against any his accusers: but there was no man found in that Court, nei- ther King nor any other, who would undertake the proo- or maintenance thereof; whereupon euer afterward Rich- ard held his brother more deare, and gaue lesse credite to King Philips words.

(68) But now ensued the fatal accident, which drew the blacke cloud of death ouer this trium- phall and bright shining starre of Cheualrie, the vnworthy occasion of which misadventure makes it the more lamentable; which notwithstanding, for a document to the Great ones, against the outrage of Auarice and Cruelty, God sufficed thus to fall on him. widomare, Vicount of Limoges hauing found a great * horde of gold and silver, sent no small por- tion thereof to King Richard, as chiefe Lord, with which being not contented (as pretending that trea- sure was wholly his by vertue of his prerogatiue royall, or else mistaking that the Vicount should make the partition) came with a power to a Cattle of the Vicounts called * Chaluz, where hee suppo- sed the Riches were; the Garrison of which place offered to yeeld the fame, and all therein, if onlie their liues and limbs might be saued: but hee would not accept of any conditions, bidding them defend themselves as they could, for hee would enter by the sword and hang them all. It grieues me to thinke that such a Prince should so forget himselfe: but be- hold the severity of Gods iudgement. An Arbale- ster (or Archiballista) standing vpon the wall, & seeing his time, charged his Steele bow with a square arrow or quarrell, * making first his prayer to God, That hee would direct that shot, and deliuer the innocen- cy of the besieged from oppression. Whereupon dischar- ging it, as the King was * taking a view of the Cattle within the danger and distance of such an Engin, & the King (vpon hearing the bow goe off) stooping with his head, was mortally wounded in the left shoulder; the anguish & perill wherof was extreme- ly augmented by the butcherly and vnskillfull hand of the Surgeon, who hauing drawne out the wood and not the * enuened yron, * mangled the arme with cruell incisions before hee could preuaile; the paine wherof hastned his end.

(69) Concerning the name of this tragick Ar- cher, there is so much variety, as that we could wil- lingly take that vncertainty for a warrant to silence it: being loth to ennoble him with our pen, it being a thing worthily punishable with vter obliuio, to haue shed (though defensibly or but casually) the blood of such a King. Mathew Paris * in calling him Peter Bassili, seems to allude to some ominous conceit in Bassili (which with the Greeks signifies a King;) him Thomas Walsingham follows therein, as Mathew Pa- ris followed * another: there want not * some who also giue him a third name; but Houden who deli- uers this accident, as all the rest of this Kings life, in the most probable and fullest manner, calls him Ber- tram de Gurdonn, applying vnto him certaine * verses of Lucan, in commendation of his vnappalled constan- cy, when hee came before King Richard: where thou maist perhaps (for satisfaction of thy mind, with be- holding some reuenge) desire to know what became of the Actor. After that the Cattle by continuall assaults was taken; and (by the Kings command) none left aliue but hee (as being refused) perhaps to some more shamefull death) the king (vpon a christi- an magnanimity) forgave him the fact, which the party (without shew of dismay) did neither deny nor excuse, but alleged the necessity of his case, and the iustice of Gods worke in it, for that the king had slaine his Father and two Brothers with his owne hand: being hereupon set at liberty, and one hun- dred shillings sterling giuen him by the king: Mar- kadey (Captaine of the Mercenary Rowtes) after the king was dead, tooke him, lead him quicke, & then by hanging ended his life.

(70) King Richard feeling the approach of certaine death, disposed his worldly estate, thus: to his brother John hee gaue the kingdom of England, and his other dominions, with three parts of his Treasure, commanding such as were present to sweare him fealty: to his Nephew Otho king of Armaine, he be- queathed (as it * seems) all his goods and chattels, money excepted, and the fourth part of his said trea- sure hee gaue to his seruante, and the poore. And hauing thus discharged his last cares toward the world concerning his transitory state, he prepared himselfe for the presence of God, strengthening his soule * with hartie contrition, confession, and par- ticipation of the holy Sacrament: commanding further, that when he was dead, * his bowels should be buried at Charrou, among the rebellious Poite- uins, as those who had only defured his worst parts: but his Heart to bee entered at Roan, as the City, which for her constant loyalty had merited the same; and his Corps in the Church of the Nunnerie at Font-Ebrard in Gascoigne, at the feet of his Father King Henry, to whom he had beene sometime disobedient: and God affording him gracious leasure till hee had thus disposed of all; the venomous vapour ascended to his heart, and draue the spirite forth, with whom (say * Authors) the glory and honor of Militarie skil expired.

(70) There hath been an opinion, or fancy, that this King was called Cordelyon, because hee encountered a Lion in prison at the Emperours Court: but (saith * one very truly) these are fables imagined by English tale-tellers to aduance their King Richard, as the Brittaines, by the like, aduanced their King Arthur. The like deuice (though more lofty and Mathematically may their seeme, who coniecture, hee was called so of the famous * Starre called Cor Leonis. But how the conceite of killing of a Lion should come vpon, as it is not worth the while to enquire, so certainly, Hugo de Neuille (one of King Richards speciall familiars) is recorded to haue slain a Lion in the holy-Land, driving first an arrow into his breast; and then running him through with his sword: whence perhaps that achievement is transferred from the man to the master; and the story applide to the by-name of King Richard, whereof the true reason is that which * Thomas Walsingham mentioneth, saying; That for the magnanimity of his heart (grōstūdinem prestans, saith an * other, meaning, as it seemes, that his materiall heart it self, was bigge and massiue, which * another also saith was inexpugnable) this King was both by the English & Normans stiled Cœur de Lion.

His Wines.

Alice the daughter of Lewis the seuenth, King of France, by Queene Alice daughter of Earle Thibald of Champagne, is by * some reputed the first wife of King Richard, though indeede she were * onely contracted to him (being both children) and committed to his Father, but when he demanded her, his father refused to deliuer her, or the to com to him, or both: Wherefore being King, conceiuing displeasure against King Philip her brother, and more then suspecting her continency with his owne father (by whom hee alledged she had a child) he refused to take her: yet * gaue a hundred thousand pounds to Philip, pro queta clamantia, to be quite freed from her. She became the wife of William Earle of Ponthieu, and had issue Queene Ioan of Castile, the mother of Queene Eleanor, wife to King Edward the first.

Berengaria the second wife of King Richard, was the daughter of Sanches the fourth of that name, King of Navarre, sonne of King Garcia the fourth: her mother was Beatrice daughter of Alfonso, the seuenth King of Castile, called the Emperour of Spaine. She was conueied by Eleanor the kings mother vnto the king in Sicily, and married to him in Cyprus, whence she accompanied him to the Holy land. The king (vpon what cause we find not) neglected her company for a while, but vpon more cooled thoughts, he resumed her againe to his loue and society, but had no issue by her.

His naturall issue.

Philip, the naturall son of king Richard, seemeth to haue been begotten, while he was Earle of Poytoun, of a Gentlewoman Poytoun, and to haue had of his fathers gift a towne in Poytoun named Sumac, to haue taken also his surname, and title of the same towne; and to haue beene the Progenitour of a familie of Gentlemen of the same surname & title, in the same Country.

Isabel (by * some who mention not Philip at all) is reputed the Naturall Daughter of king Richard, (whose mother the Author nameth not) and that she was married to Leoline Prince of Wales.

Three other Daughters, (Bastards no doubt) he is said to haue, of whose names and matches wee will report as we finde recorded. Whiles hee was in France employed in his warres against king Philip, Fulco a French Priest, came vnto him, telling him he had three very bad Daughters, which he wished him to bestow away from him in marriage, or else Gods wrath would attend him: when the king denied, he had any daughter, yes (quoth the Priest) thou chertest three daughters, Pride, Couetousnesse, and Lecherie. The king apprehensiu of his meaning, called his "Lords there attending, and saide: My Lords, this Hypocrite hath found that I haue three Daughters: "which I maintaine, viz. Pride, Couetousnesse, and Lecherie, which he would haue me bestow forth in marriages and therefore (if any such I haue) I haue found "our most fit husbands for them all. My Pride I bequeath to the haughty Templars & Hospitallers, "who are as proud as Lucifer himselfe: My Couetousnesse I giue to the white Monks of the Cisteraux "Order, for they couet the Diuall and all: But for "my Lecherie I can bestow it no where better then on "the Priests and Prelates of our times, for therein "haue they their most felicity. Doubtlesse these marriages proued so fruitfull, that their issue hath now ouerflowed all kingdomes of the earth.

To the fullacting of which Tragedy (for such it was, and so we must now present it in this our Theatre) concurred as principall Actors, the two (though these Patients rather, as the issue proued) vnfortunate

Corrivals for the Crowne, John Earle of Moreton Brother to the late King, and his Nephew Arthur, the Posthumous sonne of Geoffry Duke of Britaine, the Earles eldest Brother: their two Female (and therefore more emulous and restlesse) Solicitors, Queen Eleanor and Lady Constance, each ambitious of their owne, in their Sonnes aduancements: their two reuengefull Abettors, Otho the Emperour for John, and Philip King of France for Arthur: thereupon, the two vniust Intruders on the Crowne; Lewis the French Kings Sonne, and Innocentius the Pope, the one by vnprinckly forces, the other by vnprinckly fraud: and lastly, their two sorts of treacherous Instruments, of the Laitie for the one, and Clergie for the other; all which, like so many Tragick fire-breathing Furies, set this State in so horrible combustion, as that the smoke is not as yet, so many ages after, quite allayed.

(8) The breach betwixt these two great Kings, was the more irreconcilable, by reason of the hatred betwixt King Philip and the Emperour Otho, King Iohn's Nephew, whose advancement to the Empire (himself perhaps aiming to it) Philip still endeavoured to impeach, not regarding that the Pope (whose power Kings then regarded only, while it made for their purpose) had thundered his Anathema against all his opposers: and Otho in gratitude to King Richard, who procured him the Diadem Imperial, and in tender regard of his vnclen honour, sent him aduise, not to hasten any final atonement with the French King, for that himself would bring him his utmost Imperial assistance. Notwithstanding, by the Cardinal-Legates assiduous interceding, a Truce was concluded till the Feast of Saint Hilary: at which time, the Kings comming to a Treaty betwixt Wallin and Butantun Castles, it was agreed: that Lewis the Heire of France should marry King Iohn's Niece, Blanch, Daughter of Alfonso King of Castile, that King Iohn should give for Dowry the City and County of Euxes, with sundry Forts in Normandy, and thirty thousand Markes in siluer; vowing also not to aide his Nephew Otho with men or means to attain the Emorie: & further, promising to leave (if he died without issue) unto Lewis all the Territories he held in France, all which Articles were formerly engroled, but finally concluded betwixt Butantun, & Gulem (the one, K. Iohn, the other, King Philip's Cattle) the Oathes of Saint Iohn Baptist, when, these Counties were actually surrendered to Philip, the Lady Blanch espoused to Lewis his son, Duke Arthur (Philip once vowed, but now vnualued charge, yielded ouer, and made a servant and Homager to K. Iohn for his own Dukedom; whom yet his vnclen was content to leaue with King Philip, who had now so left him, and erst had upheld him, only as the baite of his owne aduantage. If Princes can be so vnprincipally degenerate, what trust can men repose in baser vassals? King Iohn hereupon proued much more fast to Philip, then either Philip was to him, or himselfe to Otho the Emperour, who sending his two Brethren Henry Duke of Saxony, and William (surnamed of Winton) to demand the Counties of York and Poitou, with the Treasure and Jewels which King Richard bequeathed him: King Iohn denied to yield thereunto, only in regard of his Oath which he had passed to Philip, to yeelde no kind of aide to the Emperour. And further to testifie, (yea further then he ought) his faithfull meaning to preferre intire this amity with Philip, by his aduise he diuorced Hawis his wife, as too neere of Blood, by sentence of the Archbishop, and Bishops of Burdeaux, Poitiers, and Xanton, and by the Archbishops hands espoused Isabel, Heiress of Ailmar Earle of Angouleme, a faire young Lady, but defined to another bed.

(9) This Final Concord (so called, but not prouing so) with Philip, who now acknowledged Iohn the rightfull Heire of King Richard's Crowne, gaue him more leaue, to receive peaceably all Submitties, and bring in forcibly all outlanders of those his transmarine Dominions, and after to look home to the affaires of his Kingdome, from which hee had bene (and wether following him) too long absent. Yet in the heate of those forraim im- ploiments, hee on occasions had his recourses hither to settle his State-affaires, and Crowne-Reuenues, to enact wholesome lawes for forraine and domestick Commerce, to collect an Ayde for his Nieces great Dowry, and Martiall vses, which later (being three shillings on euery k Carrucat,) though his first and onely Subsidie since his comming to the Crowne, caused much heart-burnings especially by means of his owne brother Geoffrey Archbishop of York (touching whom the King was forewarned, that hee would bring a Sword, & not Peace into England) who bearing himselfe too bold on his bloud and place, forbade the Collectours of that Aide in his precincts (though it were granted to the King generally for all England) and also being required by the King to attend him into France, to conclude the Peace, and his Nieces Elspouall, he very vnclerfully denied his seruice. The King justly moued with those his disloyalties, caused all his Temporalities to be seized on by his Sheriffe, whom therefore Geoffrey (adding fuel to the fire) did solemnly excommunicate, caused the Kings Officers to beate blows, and interdicted the whole Province of York. So partial, and vnhistorical, is the report of one, a Stranger by birth, but more strange for bold vntruthes, who faines the onely continue of such indignation in the King, was that Prelates reprehension of his Rapines on the people. For (to give a further taste of that Authors vehement fond malice, iustly so taxed) what ancient Iudiciall Writers call an Aid necessarie for Warres, that hee enfileth Rapines and Spoiles, where they make Iohn his Brothers Heire by Will, hee makes Arthur they say hee was a valiant man, hee faith hee was a Coward, where they make him a pursuing, and Philip flying, hee chargeth him to haue made onely plaints, when he should haue drawne swords; where they charge the Peeres for drawing backe from his Warres, hee makes them the onely Hasteings, and Iohn the Hinderer; briefly, if at first shooting Meteors appeare about, it portends Heauens fury on Iohn; if the watry Element ouerflow, it bodes Iohns fury on his Land. But surely that part thereof, which fell on Geoffrey, it was (you see) not vndeferred: notwithstanding, vpon the Kings returne into England, and Geffreys to his more loyall carriage & submission, his Peace was made, at the very time, & for the more celebrity, of Queen Isabel's Coronation, with whom the King himselfe was againe crowned at Westminster by Archbishop Hubert.

(10) The Pompe of that solemnity ended, the King resolved of ending a long depending contro- uersie with King William of Scotland, who formerlie (before Iohn was proclaimed King) had challenged, as his patrimoniall Right, the Counties of Northumberland, and Cumberland, and afterward seeing hee got but words and delays, was ready, (King Iohn being then in France) with an hotter and more forceable argument, to winne, what hee could not craue: but being in dark deuotion all Night at Saint Margarets Earle, the still true English-hearted Queen perswaded him by a Dreame (for certainly it was no other) not to infect England her native soyle, who therupon sent backe his Army. But now hee commeth with a more friendly traine, vpon King Iohns sending to him, in Honourable Embassage, the Earles of Huntingdon and Hereford, King Williams Brother and Nephew, his three Sonnes in Law, Lacy, Percy, and Ros with others, to desire him to giue him meeting at Lincoln, where accordingly they both meet with kindly curtseys; and the next day, King Iohn to auspicate his Temporal Affairs with Spirituall deuotions, (and yet to shew what hee thought of some superstitious follies of those times) went vndoubtedly into the Cathedral Church, being much disswaded by many, (for Monkish Impostures perwaded many it was very ominous for a King to enter that, and certaine other places) and there offered a golden Chalice on Saint Iohns Altar, which no King before him durst doe. Where his Deuotions performed, the two Kings (in presence of three Archbishops, thirteene Bishops, the King of South-Wales, with a multitude of English, Scottish, French, and Irish Princes and Peeres, ascending the toppe of that conspicuous & high hill, on the North side of the Citie, did there in glorious solemnity, sweare a mitie and faithfull loue, vpon the Crozier of Archbishop Hubert.

(11) That Spectacle so roial to the beholders, was seconded with another no lesse Honourable to K. Iohn, (for Humility in such great ones is more glorious then their glory,) when the King hauing lately left left Hugh Bishoppe of Lincoln (called the Saint, for the opinion of vnfaigned integrity, though ble- mished with some obnoxious, and surcharged with Legends of fained Miracles) at London very sick, (where himselfe with gracious care went to visite him, and both confirmed his Testament and promised the like for other Bishops after,) now hearing hee was dead, and his Corps then bringing into the gates of Lincoln, hee, with all that princely Train, went forth to meete it; the three Kings (though the Scottis was to depart that very day) with their roiall Allies, carrying the Hearie on those shoulders, accustomed to vphold the weight of whole kingdomes: from whom the Great Peeres receiued the fame, and bare it to the Church Porch, whence the three Archbishops and Bishops con- uiait it to the Quire, and the next day (it there ly- ing the meane time open faced, mixed, and in all Pontifical Ornamentes, with Gloves on his hands, and a Ring on his finger) interred it with all solemnities as- surable. Yet here the King rested not to giue proofe, in so great a height, of his lowly mind, and then benigne (how euer afterward auctored) to the Clergy; when twelue Abbots of the Cisteriaux Habit (whose whole Order had displeased him, by refusing to giue Aid towards his great payment of thirte thousand pounds) came now to Lincoln, and all prostrate at his feet, craued his gracious fauour, for that his Forerunners had driuen out (for so the King had giuen command) of his Pastures and Forreys all their Cattle, wherewith themselves, and Christs Poore were sustained. The King touched with remorse on so venerable a troope of Suppliants, (though so great offenders) commaunded them to rise, who were no sooner vp, but the King inspired with diuine Grace, fell flat on the ground before them, desiring pardon, adding, that hee not only admitted them to his loue, & their beafts to his Pastures, (a special fauour which Kings had graunted that Order,) but would also build an Abbey for men of their sort, (if they would designe some choice seat) wherein himselfe meant to bee en- terred. Neither did hee promise then more then hee performed, nor were those wylie Humiliates regard- lesse of choosin a delicate plotte for the purpose, where hee built a goodlie Abbey of their Order, de- ferredly for the pleasure of the place, named Beau- lieu, and of which Reuenue, and excellent Priuilege; continuing long of great reuynne, as a Castle of refuge inuoluable, our Ancestors thinking it most hainous sacrilege, thence to draw any, though wilfull Mur- derers or Traitors: wherein the Founders of such vnchristianised Sanctuaries, & Temples of Mercy (so they called the) throughout this Kingdom, seemed rather to take Romulus for their President, the Moles, who granting fauour to casual Manslaughters, yet commanded wilfull Murderers to be drawn from the Altar to the slaughter.

(12) By what degrees, men not onely of such re- puted religious habit, but also of the Secular Clergy, fell afterward more and more from such fauours of the King, and hee from theirs, a man that will not purposely winke, may easily behold, both sorts stand- ing so stiff on their persons, and their possessions Exemption from Regall command, that whiles the Pope could haue all for any superfluous im- ploiment, the King could get nothing, though his Kingdome were in hazard, as you heard by the dis- loyall obnoxious both of the Archbishop of York, who denied the King his personall attendance, and those Cisteriaux Monks, whose Officers were thus lockt against him. The like pretended Exemptions of their Clergie-Precelies (as well as of their Persons and Purues) wrought also like offences, both with former Kings, and now with King Iohn, who on the death of Bishop Hugh, refusing to conferre by gift, (as his Ancestors did, and himselfe elsewhere lately had) that See, on some whom either merite or affection had endeared to him, (the rather, because men of those places in those dayes, were vually their Soueraignes bolom-

Counsellors) hee was with peremptory affronts withstood by the Cannons there, who very bolde on the Popes vpbearing, reckt very slenderly their Princes displeasing. It is not vnlike that Arch- bishop Hubert (left Canterbury might be thought in- ferior to Iohn in daring boldnes, as being Papal Le- gate, in secret bolstering them had a hand, though closely carried in a gloue: for that the man, who lately, gloried the King was wholly his, now finding hee had not the sway hee expected, and thought hee deferred (by obligation of his first Agency about the Crowne, not onely studied to make vpp that by his Legatine Glory which hee wanted by his Princes countenance, but further, (as one who thinks hee extolles his vertue, paints forth his disloyalty) hee repented now more then any thing in all his life, that hee had so aduanced King Iohn to the Crowne. Certes about this time, hee shewed slender respect to his Soueraigne, (for as God is in his, so are Kings dishonoured in their Ministers dis- graces) when being prohibited by Fitz-Peter, the Kings great Iustitiar and Minister (in the Kings ab- sence) of regall command, from holding a General Councell of his Province, (neuer vided to be held, but by Soueraigne permittance) his pleasure for to take any countenance, but from him especially, who, in calling his inferior, by ioynt defers to- wards the King, but his Equall, was now, in nece- nesse and fastnesse to the King, become farre his Superiour. But what I speake of confronting a subordinate power? did hee spare to out-beard his Soueraigne himselfe? It seemes no. For hauing notice, the Feast of the Nativity now approaching, that the King intended with his Queene, at Gifford to keepe that feastiuitie with great magnificence; hee whole Pallace ordinarily, for splendour, multitude of Attendants, and sumptuous intertainments did striue with the Kings (as one of his own Successors auows) thought this a fitting time, to shew, both his great state, and little regard of his Princes discountenance, by paralleling to the Kings, his owne sumptuous pre- parations, with rich attires, and costly gifts for his Attendants at Canterbury. The King as Kings brooke not to bee braued by Subjects, nor is it wisdome for disfauourites to doe it,) moued with great in- dignation, thought the man had too much riches, & too little Discretion (which seldom lodgeth in the braine, where Pride dwels in the Heart,) and there- fore to abate somewhat the one, and learne him more of the other, hauing first bene in the North parts to gather money for his better vses, hee meant not to lauish it in keeping his Easter, which hee chose rather to doe at the cost of Hubert the Riche, & not to spare him, who spared not himselfe, hee increas- t that great expence with a greater, of His, and his Queenes sollemne crowning againe on Easter day, in the Cathedral Church; where, in lieu of his expence, Hubert had the formall honour to sit on their Crownes, but yet not the grace to sit neere the Kings Throne.

(13) Such being the first ouertures of hart-bur- nings betwixt the King and his Clergy, which after by additament of dayly fueling, braist forth into a more fearefull flame; the Lay-Peeres were so farre from labouring to quench it, that they made it the fiercer: for these Bellows of Rebellion, which be- fore their Homages did condition for their Rights & Liberties, were not all this while sparing of their breath, to inflame other Nobles with the like heat of fury. Hell it selfe (whence all Rebellions spring, and thither fall againe) could not with a siter oc- casion to broach and actuate such a mischief. For the Poynoning with King Philips coniunction, (taking aduantage of King Iohns absence, and Springs ap- proach) were vp in Armes, dislodged his Garri- sons, beleagured his Castles; tidings whereof recal- led King Iohns thoughts from his Domestick Pompes, to his Transmarine Affaires; for the pre- sent, hee gaue command to his Seneschall of Nor- mandy, mandy to attempt on them some Counter-services, to withdraw the Seigers, (whom also King Philip, hearing King John was in person coming over with an Army, forthwith recalled, and published his general summons, that his Barons, Barons, and all that held by Knights-service, should be ready at Portsmouth with Horse and Armes, on Whitsonday then instant, to crosse the seas with him. The tumultuous Earles knowing, that the King then needed their present helps, and therefore might be forced to any Capitulations, in a conventicle held at Leycester, by a joint conspiring, sent an audacious messenger to the King, that they would not attend him, unless he would first restore their rights, with which disloyal refusal, the King justly incensed, by some means too precipitate advise, considering the hazardous time which needed a saluer rather than a corasive, seized into his hands some of their Castles, to prevent their further attempts, of some he took their children for pledges, and others, whose Purges were likely to doe him truer service then their owners, hee released upon payments. At which prefixed time, he dispatched before him William Earle of Pembroke, and Lord Roger Lacie with two regiments to ioine with Normandies Seneschall. What a graue Author iudged of those bold Barons here, and other turbulent Great-ones then abroad, may be gathered by this; that as soone as mention fell in of those refractory Lords, he freighted felloff, to shew how in that very yeare, Pope Innocent then reigning in Rome, Saffadine the Turke in Jerusalem, Alexander the Patriarch in Constantinople, (for so he yoked those three together, with some others following them) the great Doctors preached, that then was the time (propheied by Saint Iohn) when after a thousand years restraint, the Diuell was let loose, to seduce the Nations like a Serpent, and trouble the world like a Dragon: which how true it proved in this our Nation and little World, (in whose Tragedy the Diuell also, amongst the first named Actors, comes now to play his part,) the Diabolical enfeign practices, both of fraud and fury, will hereafter demonstrate.

(14) The King, though thus diffurnished of his principall home-helpers, yet entrusting the custody of the land, especially those Southern parts, with Hubert de Burgo Lord Chamberlaine, and receiving to full reconciliation (for more security of the Northerne, Geoffrey Archbishop of Yorke, whose Churches large Priviledges then he ratified, without delay at Portsmouth hee put forth to sea, with Isabel his Queene, though in sundry Bottomes, and with differing success, a sudden gust departing the Fleet, whereby the King was driven backe on the Isle of Wight, but the Queene with much ado, arrived safe in Normandy, whom soon after the King followed thither. Upon whose arrivall, the French King perceiving the power of his adversary, presently confided to another personall (but very private) Parley; wherein each gaue and received such reciprocal satisfaction in their desires, that thereupon, not only the former bonds of Amity seemed to continue strong, but were also more strengthened with a new knot of Association, wherein sundry great Lords of either side were by indentment of Writing, made parties to the counter-part, with condition, that whither of the two Kings did first violate the Covenants, all his cautionary Lords should be released of their allegiance to him, and become Leegemen and Assitants to the Prince offended. And that the world might take more notice of their combined loyes, they both agreed to contribute to the Holy Warres, (which now began to bee on foot) the fortieth part of the whole Revenues of their Crowns, sending their Letters abroad into their Dominions, to encourage all their Nobles & people, by their examples to doe the like. With which intercourses, & other complements, three daies being spent betwixt them, King Philip the deeper to serve himselfe into King John's good opinion, (the surest way to overreach another in any commerce) by intreaty obtained his company, first to S. Denies Palace, where hee entred with a pompous Procession of the Clergy, and lodged with royall entertainment by the King, and the next day, to Paris, where hee was received with very rich Presents of the City, and great applause of all sorts, to see so noble arguments of affection betwixt two so great princes, lately so mortal enemies: where the French King betaking himselfe to a more private mansion, left his owne pallace to accommodate and honor Englands King. After some dayes there bestowed in princely delights, and entertainments, King John conducted forth of the City by King Philip, and parting with mutual attestations of love neuer to be parted, took his journey towards Normandy, in full hope to enjoy thence forward the contentment of quiet to himselfe, and peace to his Dominions: but those windy hopes soone changed with his change of the aire.

(15) For whilst at Chinon hee was roially entertaining Queene Berengaria his sister (whom hee there also bounteously satisfied in performing the Joynture promised her by King Richard, giving her the City and Signiory of Baion, two Castles, and their Demaines in Anjou, with a thousand Markes yeerelie for tearme of life,) and at Argentan in Normandy, where hee kept his Christmas, was joining himselfe with his faire Queen Isabel, the Earle of March, Hugh, surnamed de Bruns, a Peere of great power and alliance, to whom Isabel was first promised (though for her vnripe yeares he neuer bedded her) enflamed with love of her, who was now thought worthy to bee a Queene, drew on other Fortune Nobles, to thinke that hee was unworthy to bee a King, who wrongfully had taken her from him, and would, if not prevented, doe the like in time with them. So, once againe young Arthur, whose former hopes were all cold, is re-kindled by these fire-brands, and set up by their malice, to supplant his vncl, but by Heavens Decree, to overthrow himselfe; howsoever the Brittaines, then facinated with his ominous Name, dreamed that the ancient Great Arthur was risen againe in him, and that the Translation of the English Kingdom was now by him to be effected. Neither was the French King, for all his late painted pretensions of love, deafe to their suggestions, who laboured to incense his hatred against John; whereto hee had thence further inducements; that King John might quicklie waxe too potent a Neighbour in that Continent, if his quiet and power were not timely rebated; that now the means to worke it, were more then before, the English Peeres being alienated in affection from him, for denying their claimed Liberties; but chiefly, that hee profited (such base ends can some propose of to Noble a Band) which hee hoped for by his amity (being the enjoying of those Signiories in the Continent, if hee died sans issue) was now in a manner cut off. Queene Isabel beginning to give apparant hopes of some faire fruit from so faire a stemme. Thus whilst Earle Hugh out of his love, Duke Arthur out of Ambition, King Philip out of Avarice, (ah that the noblest person should have the basest end,) but all out of Hatred, were contriving King John's ruine: hee was farthest from suspicion, when nearest his danger, and yet they, who thus were forward to vndermine his Greatnes, were themselves formost to bee cruell with the weight thereof.

(16) But these lie Serpents throwed in secret their envenomed heades, till the warmth of the Spring (a time suiting for martiall mischiefs) called them forth; when King Philip (having newly cast his skinned, and as most able, so was most willing to break the way) desired another interview with King John: who coming thither (the place was twice Vernon and Lisle Dandale) with expectation

tion of some fruits of those lovely courties which their last meeting seemed to have engrafted, he there found that this last winter had nipt all those faire blossomes. For Philip, forgetfull of all former Compacts, and pretending some imaginary wrongs, in outrageous manner required him without delay to redeliuer into Arthur's hands, all his Transmarine dominions, Normandy, Turayne, Anjou, Poitou, or otherwise as Lord Paramount of those Countries, which John held by Homage, he peremptorily cited him personally to appeare in Baister Terme at Paris, there to answer what should bee laide to his charge, and to abide the Arrest of his Court of Justice. The colour on which hee thus did cite him, was (say some) King John's sharpe repressing of some rebellious attempts of Hugh le Brun the former year, wherof the Earle complained to King Philip, as to the chief Lord. King John much amazed to see, not only hony so soone diltented into gall, but the French King also turned into an Apparour, so disdained both his Citation and Commands, as very vnnooble for Englands King to accept, or the French to offer; neither indeed did Philip thus put the matter to daying, as intending any such legitimate proceeding, but only to make his adversary secure of any other assaults, then by Petty-foggers. For whether it be true or no, that King John for his non-appearance, was by sentence of the French Peeres adjudged to loose all his Territories in the Continent: certaine it is, that no sooner was the Conference with indignation broken off, but Philip (hee had before prepared to effect what hee had prolected) with power and fury assailed Burton Castle, whose Turrets (high-reared by King Richard) hee beleuelled with the Foundations, and thence sodainly like a flash of lightning, beganne to invole the neighbouring partes with rafsakings and ruines, till giuing an assault, (which had held him eight dayes) to the Castle of Radeport, King John coming to the rescue, forced him with shame to speed away. To repaire which dishonour, and to empaire the English forces by distraction of imployments, returning to Paris, hee there appointed for Arthur (to whom hee had now affianced his younger daughter) both certaine selected Nobles to bee protectors to secure and guard his person, & also bands of Souldiers to attend his command, amongst which were 200 of the choicest Knights of France, all which in very pompous Troopes followed him, (with Philips directions, and also supply of great summes of money) into Poitou, to reduce those partes to his Allegiance; which was no hard matter to effect; the greater part of Commanders there (being fore-wrought) expecting nothing more, and the better part suspecting nothing lesse, then these perfidious assaults.

(17) Queene Eleanor Regent of those provinces, attended with a very slender guard, yet strong enough for daies of quiet, (which both her Age did now desire, and her Homage done to Philip, and Philips faire shewes to her did promise) having no speedier notice of those incursions, then the vnpleasing effects thereof, (for on Arthurs good success, King Philip proclaimed him Lord of those Dominions) be took her selfe into Nirabeau, one of the most notable townes in Poitou, sending to King John, (whose forces were then in Normandy and Mayne, repressing or preventing Philips attempts) for present aids. Which yet could not so speedily come, but Arthur (who knew that upon seizure of such a prize as Eleanor, hee might draw her sonne to any conditions) had prevented them, besieged her, and possessed himselfe of her towne, though not of her person, as some by mis-understanding have misrelated. For the retiring into the Castle, made it good against her Grandchildes incessant batterie, about which, whilst he, with his continuall supplier of Poitou and Anjou princes, was indefatigably busied, King Johns Army were at hand (for his expedition both by day and night to his mothers relief, cue, is recorded as admirable) brought the neives of their owne approach; which caused the great Army of the Leagers to indultious before to impeach others, no lesse sollicitous now to defend themselves. Both Armies martially ranged, & Arthurs Battalions not only undauntedly, but also very pompously coming on to the shocke, the fight proved most fierce and terrible, each side resolving, by reason of both the Competitors presence in the field, that the End and vphor of all their designs, depended on that dayes success: which in the end by the fortunate prowess of King John and his English, fell disastrouslie on Arthur, his French, and other Assitants, who after a great slaughter made amongst them, turning their backs to him, from whom they had before turned their Faithes, took their flight towards the Tourne, to shelter their liues within those walles, which so late the Seat of their triumphs, became now the cage of their captivation, and the Tombes of all Arthurs ambitious hopes, though himselfe so vnhappy as to surue the victor: for together with the tumultuary flyers, the victorious King & his Armie entered, renewed a most bloody fight, repossessed the Town, freed his mother, enthralld his Enemies, and recovered all the provinces which had revolted.

(18) This victory was so glorious to King John, and so dreadful to his Enemies, (for King Philips two chiefe confederates, Arthur and Hugh Brun, Raymond, Father to Guido the husband of Constance, & all the Peeres of Poitou and Anjou, about 200. French Knights and others of command, besides the vulgar multitudes were taken prisoners) that both then King Philip, though very hote in the siege of Argues in Normandy, presently cooled and contented with newes thereof, brake vpp his fortnights siege, and returned home; and since, the French fawning fauourites, and King Johns maligners have sought to extenuate the matter, auerring against all truth of record, that it was exploited before the French were come to Arthurs aide, and when all his Souldiers were both unarmed and unarmed. But, as others highly extolling King Johns valour herein, interpret those fore-doomes of Merlin to have beene ment of him, that he should be crowned with the head of a Lion, should cut out the tongues of Bules, and lay on chains on the backs of roving Beasts (and indeed hee chained them hand and foot, and to conuay them away in Carts, a kind of riding till then vnusall with them,) so King John himselfe, duly acknowledging the greatness of Gods goodnesse therein, sent his Letters to all his Barons whersoever (thereby to encourage the loiall, and hold in awe the tumultuous) inciting them to render all prayse unto God for so admirable a worke, and so grations assistance: and soone after hee dispersed his noblest Captiues into sundrie Castles in Normandy and England; Arthurs sister Eleanor, called the Damoiselle of Britaine, being committed to Bristow Castle, where shee long liued with very honourable age. And though the Kings displeasure was iustly incensed against her brother Arthur, for so frequent wauering in his faith, yet meaning to trie all means of winning him who had thus lost himselfe, hee sent for him (being then at Salaisie in the custody of S. Hubert L. Chamberlain) and entreated him very gently, promising him all honourable respects, if as yet he would resolve to forsake the French kings amity, and frame both his mind for hearty love, and his Actions for peaceable observance towards him, his vncl and Lege Lord. Which exceeding clemency, the ill-advised young Gentleman (for what wildcome is it to shew pride where wee neede mercy, and to give threats beyond possibility of performance) required only with arrogant and undutifull language, furiously obraidng the king with violent and fraudulent detention of the English Crowne, which menacingly hee there required of him, and aliother King Richards Countries, as his lawfull inheritance.

Kings assent, and leave to elect, and therefore to prevent both his * interposing and displeasure, till it were too late for him to redress the wrong; the same night they caused their Electio to enter * caution by oath, neuer to carry himselfe as Archbishop, nor to make it knowne to any man living, till he had further speciall warrant from them, upon prooffe of the successes it might find at Rome, whether forthwith they sent him for his dispatch.

(31) Reginald taking Flaunders in his way, was both so * proud, * perurious, and * impudent, (the ver-tues of their most choice man) that he could neuer conceale the purpose of his journey, and boast of his dignity from any mans Eares, nor from their Eyes the Conventual letters ratifying the same. Whereof when the Couent had notice, vehemently incensed against him who had thus divulged their secret, and pro-vidently calling how to evade the Kings offence, out of hand they bespiced certaine of their Cruce, to craue both * pardon of their fact, and licence for choice of some worthier Primate. There was then in high grace and imploiment about the King, John Gray Bishoppe of Norwich, a man of great wisdom, learning, and integrity, (qualities truly befitting that high place) whom the King much desired to advance, commending him, as one * most deare unto him, and of his secrettest Counsels of which, some say, hee was President most behoofull for the Commonwealth, for Himselfe, and them: which message from the King faithfully deliuered, all of them glad thus to redeme the favour, which they had hazarded, with unanimous consent elected him; and sending for him from Torke (where hee was in the Kings affairs) the King himselfe graced his entrance into Canterbury with his presence in great pompe; and the next day, the King with a multitude of People assembling in the Metropolitane Church, the Prior did there publish his Electio solemnly, and in due forme performed; where the Monkes carrying him with Te Deum to which the Altar, did forthwith enthronize him in the Chaire of his Principales. The King there in presence of them all, giueing him actual possession of his Temporalties. This louing correspondence betwixt the King and his Clergy, gaue great hope of more blissfull fortunes henceforward vnto them both; but the Infernall Author of debate, and his chiefest Agent, took a hint hereby to intrude a Tyranny both vpon Clergy, King and all.

(32) Little thought false Reynor what was doing at Canterbury, whiles hee was trotting to Rome; whither when hee came, and shewed his *letters of Rati-
